termination. And in People, Burby, v. Auburn, 85 Hun, 601, the decision is substantially the same as the one noticed above, where the court quoted approvingly the announcement by the court in Re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88, "that it must be the law from these cases, that where the judicial power has been confined to one judge, and if he should fail to act, there would be no means of proceeding in the matter, though interested, he may take such cognizance of the case as is absolutely necessary, so far that the party shall not be without remedy." But the two last cases, as far as they did go on the subject,—and they may be conceded to come nearer sustaining respondents' contention than any other cases cited,—were overruled in People, Pond, v. Saratoga Springs, 4 App. Div. 399, where it was held that a village trustee who prefers charges against a village officer is disqualified to sit as a member of the board of trustees on hearing of the charges, as otherwise he would act as both accuser and judge; especially disapproving People, Burby, v. Auburn, 85 Hun, 601, and further holding that the removal of a village officer by the board of trustees is illegal where the charges were preferred by one of the trustees who sat on the hearing, and without whom a quorum of the board would not have been present. And, noticing the doctrine of necessity above spoken of, it was held that the exception to the rule that judicial officers shall not act in a matter in which they are interested, in order to prevent a failure of justice, does not apply so as to permit a disqualified member of a board, the powers of which may be exercised by a majority of its members, to take part in a judicial proceeding by the board. This case seems to us to be a parallel case with the one at bar, so far as this question is concerned. The court makes the announcement that one of the rights secured to an accused person by the law of the land is that his accuser shall not be at the same time his judge. "Cases are to be found," says the court in this case, "where judicial officers, or officials acting in a judicial capacity, have been permitted to act notwithstanding the disqualification of interest; but I think, without exception, they have all been cases where, unless such officer was permitted to act, there would have been a failure of justice, for the reason that there was no other person who could act. They have been confined to cases where the judicial tribunal or body to act consisted of but a single person, and there was no other tribunal or officer before whom the proceedings could be taken, and the officer was permitted to act from necessity." It is conceded by the counsel for the respondents that this case overrules the former cases reported in the New York Supplement, but they insist that the reasoning of the former cases is better, and that the decisions are more in consonance with the adjudicated cases. But we cannot agree with them on this proposition. The principles of impartiality, disinterestedness, and fairness on the part of the judge is as old as the history of courts; in fact, the administration of justice through the mediation of courts is based upon this principle. It is a fundamental idea, running through and pervading the whole system of judicature, and it is the popular acknowledgment of the inviolability of this principle which gives credit, or even toleration, to decrees of judicial tribunals. Actions of courts which disregard this safeguard to litigants would more appropriately be termed the administration of injustice, and their proceedings would be as shocking to our private sense of justice as they would be injurious to the public interest. The learned and observant Lord Bacon well said that the virtue of a judge is seen in making inequality equal, that he may plant his judgment as upon even ground. Caesar demanded that his wife should not only be virtuous, but beyond suspicion; and the state should not be any less exacting with its judicial officers, in whose keeping are placed not only the financial interests, but the honor, the liberty, and the lives of its citizens, and it should see to it that the scales in which the rights of the citizen are weighed should be nicely balanced, for, as was well said by Judge Bronson in People, Ros, v. Suffolk Common Pleas, 18 Wend. 550, "next in importance to the duty of rendering a righteous judgment, is that of doing it in such a manner as will beget no suspicion of the fairness and integrity of the judge." The reason that financial interest or near relationship to a litigant is held to be sufficient to recuse a judge is that it is to be presumed that self-interest or natural affection will unconsciously prejudice a judge, and deprive the litigant of a fair trial. This presumption in certain cases may or may not be justified by the truth, but so solicitous is the law to maintain inviolate the principle that every litigant shall be secure in his right to a fair trial that he is accorded the benefit of the presumption. But what does a presumption amount to compared with the admitted fact that the judge will not accord the litigant a fair trial; that he will vote to remove him from his office, no matter what the evidence may be? And this, so far as this case is concerned, the demurrer to the affidavit having been sustained, must be considered the fact. To compel a litigant to submit to a judge who has already confessedly prejudged him, and who is candid enough to announce his decision in advance, and insist that he will adhere to it, no matter what the evidence may be, would be so farcical and manifestly wrong that it seems to us that the idea must necessarily be excluded by the very expression "administration of justice." As sustaining this view the following cases, cited by appellant, are found to be in point: Barnett v. Ashmore, 5 Wash. 163; Moses v. Julian, 45 N. H. 52, 84 Am. Dec. 114; Stocknell v. White Lake Twp. Board, 22 Mich. 341; Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 547; Williams v. Robinson, 6 Cush. 384. A review of the cases cited by appellant is made by the respondents for the purpose of showing that the facts decided in them are not similar to the facts in the case at bar, and, while it is true that in some of the cases financial interest was claimed, yet, as a rule, the decisions are not based upon that ground, but upon the broad ground that the citizen is entitled to a judge who is absolutely impartial. The merits of the case are not now before us.

The permanent writ will issue.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Alice WALSH et al., Admxrs., etc., of John Walsh, Deceased,

v.

William A. PACKARD, Appt.

(186 Mass. 189.)

The administrators may sue upon a covenant to pay rent to their intestate which is appended to a lease made by him, although his heirs are the only persons who would suffer substantial damages by failure to pay it.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought upon a covenant of suretyship for the payment of rent. Affirmed.

This note is limited to rents of intestate property, for the reason that where decedent left a will the question is chiefly one of the construction of the terms of the will.

In WALSH V. PACKARD it was held that the administrators could sue upon a covenant attached to a lease as follows: "In consideration . . . I do hereby become surety for the prompt and full payment of the rent and performance of the covenants as specified in the above lease to be paid by . . ." It was held that the covenant did not run with the land, and it was said "that the heirs are the only persons interested in the rent, and therefore are the only persons who suffer substantial damages by a failure to pay it. We assume that, if the administrators recover substantial damages, they will receive them as trustees for the heirs." The question decided on the facts of the case seems to be new; but treating this covenant as a purely personal contract the case is sustained by analogous cases.

Alabama.

An administrator is authorized by statute to rent the land of the decedent, and to collect the rent. Patapasco Guano Co. v. Ballard, 107 Ala. 710; Vandegrift v. Abbott, 75 Ala. 487; Palmer v. Steiner, 68 Ala. 400; Leatherwood v. Sullivan, 81 Ala. 458; Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73; Long v. McDougald, 23 Ala. 413.

So, under Ala. Code 1876, § 2446, authorizing an administrator to rent lands of the intestate, it was held that the power to rent lands rendered the administrator liable to the tenant for necessary repairs, in the absence of a stipulation. Vandegrift v. Abbott, 75 Ala. 487.

And in Patapasco Guano Co. v. Ballard, 107 Ala. 710, an administratrix was allowed credit for rents that she collected and applied to the payment of a mortgage in default on the land, where the land was not equal in value to the mortgage. (Ala. Code 1886, § 2102, authorized an administrator to rent lands.)

And 1 Brickell (Ala.) Dig. p. 937, §§ 330-333, authorizing the personal representative to intercept the descent of the heir, to take rents accruing, and to rent or sell the land when necessary for the payment of debts, modified the rule of common law that if the lessor dies rent that has accrued, that is due and payable, passes to the personal representative and rent subsequently accruing belongs to the heir; and a claim against the intestate by the lessee was a valid set-off in an action by the personal representative for the rent. Palmer v. Steiner, 68 Ala. 400.

In Leatherwood v. Sullivan, 81 Ala. 458, it was said that the personal representative was the owner of the land to a certain extent, and that he might destroy the heirs' rights to the rents or income and profits of the land by the commencement and prosecution of an action for them in his name.

In Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73, it was said that if it was not for Ala. Code, § 2446, the administrator would have no authority to rent the lands.

In Long v. McDougald, 23 Ala. 413, it was said that under Clay's (Ala.) Dig. 229, § 46, the administrator had no title whatever to the land, but only power to rent, or power to sell when ordered by the probate court.

Some statutes require this to be done by auction. Martin v. Williams, 18 Ala. 190; Long v. McDougald, 23 Ala. 413; Harkins v. Pope, 10 Ala. 493; Boynton v. McEwen, 36 Ala. 348.

So, under Ala. Dig. 199, § 6, providing that it shall be lawful for administrators to rent at public outcry the real estate of the decedent until a final settlement of the estate is effected, and the proceeds shall be assets, to entitle the administratrix to rents as assets she should rent the same at public outcry. Martin v. Williams, 18 Ala. 190.

On the death of the intestate, the lands belonging to him descend to his heirs, who hold the legal title subject to certain powers conferred by the several statutes on the administrator, as the right to rent them at public outcry if the estate be solvent until the final settlement, and if it be insolvent the personal representative should apply to the orphans' court, within three months after the report of such insolvency, for leave to sell the land. It was said the administrator may recover the rent accruing either before or after the death of the intestate upon the demise of the intestate. Long v. McDougald, 23 Ala. 413.

Under Clay's (Ala.) Dig. 199, § 36, authorizing administrators to rent at public outcry the real estate of the decedent until the final settlement of the estate, an administrator is authorized to collect the rent under a lease made with the decedent. Harkins v. Pope, 10 Ala. 493.

And where he has the authority under the statute to collect rent, he will be bound to use reasonable diligence. Patapasco Guano Co. v. Ballard, 107 Ala. 710; James v. Faulk, 54 Ala. 184; Eubank v. Clark, 78 Ala. 73.

So, under Ala. Code 1886, § 2102, providing that an administrator may rent lands of the estate without requiring personal security, as under the former law, an administrator was only bound to reasonable implication the undertaking of a surety or guarantor than they are to enlarge that of the principal party. But perhaps the word "surety," although seemingly inartificially used, coupled with the nature and object of the contract, makes the collateral undertaking as large as the principal one. We will assume that it is to be read in the broader sense. We be accountable to any person for the rents and profits. Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795.

In Campau v. Campau, 19 Mich. 116, it was said that an administrator was only given the right to receive the rents and profits while the estate was in process of settlement, under Mich. Comp. Laws, § 2904, Rev. 1846, chap. 71, § 7.

Under Mich. Comp. Laws 1857, § 2904, the administrator had the right to the possession of the real estate and rents and profits until the estate should be settled or delivered over by order of the probate court to the heirs or devisees, but this was repealed by act of March 29, 1871, Sess. Laws 1871, p. 80. It was held that the legislature could take away from the administrator the power of taking and holding the possession of rents and profits, and that this could be done as well after as before they had taken possession. Campau v. Campau, 25 Mich. 127.

Mich. Sess. Laws 1871, p. 278, authorizing executors or administrators to take possession of the realty of deceased persons, to lease from year to year and cancel or modify any leases given by the decedent during his lifetime, and to keep property in repair, and to receive rents and proceeds until the estate is settled, changed the rule, as before this statute the personal representative had no control over the realty except as power may be granted in certain cases, and the rents belonged absolutely and completely to the heirs or devisees, and this statute did not take away vested rights that accrued before its passage. Van Fleet v. Van Fleet, 49 Mich. 610.

So, where an heir was in possession under a lease made by his father, which was to terminate at his father's death, and the administrator allowed the heir to remain in possession pending probate proceedings of a will, upon his executing an agreement authorizing the administrator to withhold from his share the rent, on the failure of the heir to pay the rent the administrator was entitled to summary proceedings to recover possession, if the share of the assets in case the will was probated would be insufficient, as it was the duty of the administrator to exercise the right which the statute gave him to obtain possession and to collect rents and profits for the executor or for the distribution of the estate in case there was no executor. Wilmarth v. Reed, 83 Mich. 44.

Where the widow remained in possession of the real estate of her deceased husband it was held that on a bill of foreclosure, she could not be required to account for the rents and profits. Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 87.

Minnesota.

Under the statutes of this state the administrator is entitled to the accruing rents, as against the heirs, during administration.

In Miller v. Hoberg, 22 Minn. 249, it was said that under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 52, § 6, giving the administrator the right to the possession, and to the rents, issues, and profits, the heirs have the right to the possession as against everyone but the administrator or his tenants, and the administrator has the right to the possession as against the heirs or any other person until the estate is settled or until delivered over by order of the probate court.

And in State, Beals, v. Ramsey County Probate Court, 25 Minn. 22, it was said that under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 52, § 6, an executor or administrator was entitled to the possession of rents, issues, and profits of real estate until the estate was settled or delivered over by order of the probate court to the heir, and under § 7 he was accountable for the income of the real estate while it remained in his possession,

In Smith v. Park, 31 Minn. 70, it was said that under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 52, § 6, authorizing an administrator to lease land during the period of administration, this right conferred by the statute for the purpose of administration was limited to that period.

Mississippi.

The accruing rents belong to the heirs. But under a statute the administrator by order of the probate court could lease the plantation for three years. The administrator may become liable to heirs for rent collected by him as trustee, or at their election they may charge him for net profits if he works the plantation. An apportionment of rent is provided for by statute if a tenant for life dies before rent matures.

So, where a creditor obtained a judgment against an administrator the latter could not by a bill in equity set off the judgment by an account of rents due from the judgment creditor, as the heirs were entitled to the rents, and the administrator was liable for the debt, and there was no privity. Bullock v. Sneed, 13 Smedes & M. 293.

And under Miss. Rev. Code 1871, § 1636, giving a remedy to the executors or administrators of any person unto whom any rent is or shall be due and not paid at the time of his death, by an action of debt, covenant, or assumpsit for all such arrearages of rent, and also the remedy of distress, it was held that this section recognized the right of the personal representative to pursue any of the remedies named to recover rent due and not paid to the lessor at the time of his death, but it had no application to rent which accrued after, and the rule was the same as at common law, that rent due at the time of the death of the lessor goes to his personal representative, but rent which accrues afterwards belongs to the heirs. Bloodworth v. Stevens, 51 Miss. 475.

An administrator was probably chargeable with rents where he had voluntarily returned the rents as charges in his annual account, and the commissioners following the interlocutory decree merely transferred to the account stated by them the items in the administrator's own accounts, and he made no objection to the charge. The court said that after receiving rents for over ten years, and professing to account for them in his trustee capacity, it would be monstrous now, after the claim against him in every capacity is barred by limitation, to permit him to raise the objection now insisted on. The court further said that the rents belonged to the distributees, and they had the right to advance them or any other money belonging to them for the payment of debts, so as to protect the specific property. Crowder v. Shackelford, 35 Miss. 321.

And where an administrator carried on the plantation without authority for the heirs, he was liable for the net profits or for the reasonable hire and rent at the election of the heirs, and when the heirs made an election it was irrevocable. French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167.

In Trotter v. Trotter, 40 Miss. 704, it was said that if an administrator worked a plantation with the assent of the heirs they could not charge him as for the wrongful act with rent, in a petition in the probate court on the ground that he had obtained no order, and if the administrator carried on the business without their consent and without an order of court, he was not amenable to the probate court, but was liable, if at all, to the heir to whom the land descended immediately on the death of the ancestor.

An administrator was not authorized to lease or cultivate wild land, but was entitled to lease and have no doubt that it continues to run after the death of the original covenantor. But, supposing heirs, executors, and assigns to have been mentioned, it seems to be settled in this commonwealth that the instrument would not work like a letter of credit offering a new contract to the successors of Walsh (Saunders v. Saunders, 154 Mass. 337, 338; Abbott v. Hills, hire the plantation or farm for three years, under Miss. act Nov. 22, 1865, Pamph. Laws 1865, 140, 141, authorizing the personal representative to lease and hire for a term not exceeding three years the plantation. Murphy v. Thomas, 41 Miss. 429.

In Bloodworth v. Stevens, 51 Miss. 475, it was said that Miss. Rev. Code 1871, § 1639, providing that if the tenant for life die before the day when any rent is to become due, the executor or administrator may recover the proportion of rent which accrued before the time of his death, was an exception to the common-law rule in behalf of a life tenant who had made a demise and died and gave to his personal representatives the rent up to the time of his death proportionately.

Missouri.

The heirs are entitled to accruing rents except in certain cases provided for by statute. And the heirs allowing the administrator to collect rents may be bound by estoppel. A statute authorizes the administrator in certain cases to lease the land for short terms, and an administrator collecting rents is liable therefor. A foreign administrator has no authority to collect accruing rents. An apportionment will be made of accruing and accrued rents.

Unaccrued rent on land after the death of the owner belonged to the heirs and not to the administrator, except in certain cases provided for by the Missouri statute, subjecting real estate to liabilities for debts and the like. Shouse v. Krusor, 24 Mo. App. 279.

In Eoff v. Tompkins, 2 Mo. App. 461, it was said, under Wagner's (Mo.) Stat. 89, § 48, directing that executors and administrators under the direction of the court shall lease the real estate for any term not more than two years, and shall receive and recover rents, the rents so collected are necessarily assets in the hands of the executor or administrator.

And under Mo. act January 12, 1822, authorizing the administrator to lease out the real estate of an intestate who shall have died without leaving any heirs or legal representatives, an administrator could recover in assumpsit for the use and occupation of the house of the intestate after his death. Rector v. Ranken, 1 Mo. 371.

And in Lass v. Eisleben, 50 Mo. 122, it was said that an administrator under the direction of the probate court or courts having probate jurisdiction could make short leases of the real estate belonging to the decedent.

Where distributees neglected to take possession of land, and allowed the administrator to collect their rents and disburse them as administrator, they could not afterwards prevent the payment by the administrator of a claim against the estate by asserting that the rents belonged to them. The court said, having allowed their rents to remain in the hands of the administrator, and having allowed him to collect the rents and treat them as moneys belonging to the estate, and disburse them as such, they cannot be allowed now to recoup themselves by laying their hands upon this judgment in preference to a creditor of the estate. Tyler v. Priest, 31 Mo. App. 272.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 70, 129, 130, 143, making it the duty of an administrator to inventory real estate, and providing that he may lease it for short terms under the direction of the probate court, and that whenever the court shall be satisfied that any real estate need not be sold or leased for the payment of debts, the executor or administrator shall be ordered to deliver possession of the same to those entitled to it, rents collected by an administrator which he was not bound to collect were assets when collected, and if the administrator leased the realty without authority, and received rents, these rents would be assets, and he should account for them. Lewis v. Carson, 16 Mo. App. 342.

In Lewis v. Carson, 93 Mo. 587, it was said that under Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 70, 129, 130, 143, an administrator under the order of the probate court may lease the real estate and collect the rents. It was held that "although the executor or administrator takes possession of real estate and collects the rents arising therefrom without an order of the probate court, he and his sureties on his bond must account therefor. This is no longer a debatable question in this state." Gamble v. Gibson, 56 Mo. 592; Dix v. Morris, 66 Mo. 514."

In Hartnett v. Fegan, 3 Mo. App. 1, it is said that an administrator as such had no interest in the real estate of his intestate beyond a naked power to sell or lease under the direction of the probate court for the payment of debts, and that if he leased the land without authority from the court the rents received would be assets in his hands, and he should account in a settlement for rents received, whether with or without the direction of the probate court.

In McPike v. McPike, 111 Mo. 216, it was said that under Mo. Rev. Stat. chap. 1, art. 4, § 69; art. 5, §§ 93, 94; art. 7, §§ 129, 130; art. 8, § 145, requiring an administrator to inventory the real estate, and authorizing him under an order of the probate court to lease the real estate and collect the rents, the receiving of rents and sale of realty were clearly within the scope of the lawful exercise of his authority as administrator under certain circumstances, and if without an order of court he assumed to take the rents by color of his office, he was estopped from pleading his own failure to perform the conditions precedent, and the collection of rents and the proceeds of sale were within the scope of his duties, and his sureties were bound.

In this case it was said that "at common law the administrator had nothing whatever to do with the real estate of his intestate. It descended to the heirs. Accordingly at the common law, and in those states generally where the common law has been adopted, and only modified to the extent of permitting a sale of the lands to pay debts, it has generally been held that where an administrator came into the possession of rents from the realty or the proceeds of sale, he was chargeable therefor individually as a trustee or trespasser, but not in his character as administrator."

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 129, providing for lease of lands by an administrator in this state, such lands could not be leased by a foreign administrator. Crockett v. Althouse, 35 Mo. App. 404.

And in the absence of proof as to what was the law in Illinois the common law was held to control, and under Missouri Revised Statutes, authorizing an administrator under an order of the probate court to lease the real estate and collect the rents, he was not liable as such administrator for rents collected in Illinois, where such rents were received as the attorney in fact or guardian ad litem for the heirs, and not as administrator. McPike v. McPike, 111 Mo. 216.

Rents accruing prior to the testator's death belonged to the administrator, and those accruing after such death passed to the heirs, unless the probate court directed the administrator to take possession, but such an order of the probate court would not ratify the collection wrongfully made by the administrator previous to such order. Sealey v. Blake, 70 Mo. App. 229.

v. Jackson, 125 Mass. 807; Cummings v. Watson, 149 Mass. 262.

Nor can the administrator maintain a suit to recover rent, even as agent of the heirs, in the and profits of the decedent's land where he occupied and used it as his own. Re Missamore, 90 Cal. 169.

But an administrator occupying land would not be liable to the estate for the value of its use and occupation after the sale of the premises by the sheriff. After such time he would be bound to account to the purchaser for the value of the use and occupation. Walls v. Walker, 37 Cal. 424, 90 Am. Dec. 290.

Colorado.

The right to the rents accruing from real estate belong to the heirs, unless land has been leased under an order of court.

Colorado Stat. 1891, §§ 4750, 4761, Rev. Stat. 1893, § 96, p. 670, Gen. Laws 1877, § 2833, p. 964, Gen. Stat. 1893, § 8577, p. 1047, provides that where the personal estate is insufficient to pay the just debts allowed against the estate, the real estate may be leased by the administrator upon the order of the court.

Under Colo. Gen. Stat. § 2270, chap. 72, providing that in case any married man shall deprive his wife of over one half of his property by will, it shall be optional with such married woman after the death of her husband to accept the conditions of the will, or one half of the estate, both real and personal, it was held that one half of a lot devised to one not an heir at law became the property of the widow on the renunciation of a will the estate being insolvent. It was further held that there was no error in decreeing "that the deficit in the widow's allowance should be paid out of the rents of the real estate, including said lot, and that one half of the rents of said lot, in the hands of the administrator, belonged to the widow, as the owner in fee of one half of said lot." Logan v. Logan, 11 Colo. 44.

A person who purchased the lands of the estate from the administrator, who was not authorized to sell, was required to account to the heirs for their share of the rents and profits of the property during the period of his possession. Filmore v. Reithman, 6 Colo. 120.

Connecticut.

Conn. Gen. Stat. 1888, § 577, provides that "the executors and administrators of deceased persons shall, during the settlement of the estates of such persons, have the possession, care, and control of their real estate, and all the products and income of such real estate during such time shall vest in them as personal property, unless such real estate has been specifically devised or directions given by will in regard to it inconsistent herewith." But the family of such decedent shall be allowed to remain in the dwelling house occupied by him at the time of his death, and may occupy such other lands as the court may consider necessary until the same shall be sold.

In Remington v. American Bible Soc. 44 Conn. 512, under Conn. Rev. 1875, title 18, chap. 11, § 28, providing substantially as in Gen. Stat. 1888, § 577, where there was a lapsed legacy, it was said: "Where it is settled that the farm belongs to the heirs at law, and in the supposed case when it is known that the real estate is not needed for the payment of debts, and it goes to those whom the law points out as the owners, there would go with it in each case, as its proper incident, the rent earned by it during the period of litigation, and that they are to profit by the earnings of the land as fully as if no unfounded claim had prevented them from taking possession upon the death of the intestate," and the court held that the realty descended to the 40 L. R. A.

absence of an express contract by the tenant with the administrator.

Cummings v. Watson, 149 Mass. 262.

A surety is a favorite of the law, and his heirs at law of the testatrix, and that they were entitled to the accumulated rents.

In Staples's Appeal, 52 Conn. 421, it was said that in 1855 the legislature for the first time provided that the executors and administrators shall have the possession, care, and control of the real estate of the decedent in the same manner as of the personal estate.

Where an estate was solvent the rents and profits of the real estate belonged to the heirs, and the administrator who collected the rents was accountable only to the heirs, and not to the probate court. Goodrich v. Thompson, 4 Day, 215.

Where A leased certain premises for one year with the privilege of five years at the same rent, allowing the lessee to improve the premises and charge the expenses to A, and A died insolvent before the expiration of the year, in an action by the heirs to recover for use and occupation it would be presumed that they assented to the occupancy under the term of the original lease, and the expenses of the improvements were deducted. King v. Woodruff, 23 Conn. 56, 60 Am. Dec. 625.

Where a parol lease was made for a year by a guardian of the land of his ward, and the ward died within the year, it was held that by the death of the ward before the expiration of the term, the lease was determined, and no rent became payable, and the heir could not maintain an action of assumpsit for the rent which accrued previously to the death of the ward. Welles v. Cowles, 4 Conn. 182, 10 Am. Dec. 115.

Delaware.

Rents which come to the administrator's hands are made assets by statute; but it was held that this statute did not render the sureties on the administrator's bond liable for rents where the administrator had not been charged with the rents in his settlement.

An administrator's bond did not extend to rents. The court said that "the reason was that the condition of the administration bond did not cover rents, but was only for the faithful administration of the goods and chattels, rights and credits, of the decedent. Rents are not such." It was said that under Del. Dig. 228, a recovery might be had in assumpsit. State, Brown, v. Brown, 2 Harr. (Del.) 5.

Under Del. Dig. 226, § 13, providing that rents of the real estate of the deceased which shall come to the administrators are made assets for the payment of demands against the deceased; but it is provided that this shall not extend the obligation of the bond, —it was held that an action of assumpsit by a creditor would lie against an administrator for rents. Davis v. Rawlins, 3 Harr. (Del.) 346.

In an action of debt on an administration bond to recover the balance on administration accounts and certain rents received by the administratrix, it was claimed that prior to 1837 the administratrix's bond did not cover the rents. It was held that the administratrix should have been charged with rents by citation and account before the register, before they could be recovered in an action on the bond. State, Giles, v. Waples, 5 Harr. (Del.) 257.

District of Columbia.

Where the administratrix of a husband alleged in her bill that the deceased wished to make it appear that he was without property in order to avoid being importuned to become surety for others, and that decedent caused his real estate to be placed in his wife's name and asked for an accounting for rents by the widow, it was held that rents and profits that she might have received from the prop-contract of suretyship is to be strictly construed, and is not to be extended by implication, or by operation of law, beyond the terms in which it is expressed.

erty after the conveyance made to her during the life of her husband, and with his permission and consent, formed no part of the personal estate of the deceased, and his administratrix was not entitled to claim them, and was not responsible for them as personal assets, and where the rights of creditors were not prejudiced the personal representative had no claim against the rents. McCartney v. Fletcher, 10 App. D. C. 572.

Florida.

In Sanchez v. Hart, 17 Fla. 507; Gilchrist v. Filyau, 2 Fla. 94; Union Bank v. Powell, 3 Fla. 175, 52 Am. Dec. 367; Deans v. Wilcoxon, 25 Fla. 980; and Merritt v. Daffin, 24 Fla. 320,—it was said that the administrator was entitled to the rents and profits after the death of the intestate until the same has been administered.

Georgia.

In this state the administrator has the authority to collect accruing rents if needed for the purpose of administration.

So, under Ga. Code, 2279, providing that when the owner of real estate grants to another the right to enjoy the use of the same for a fixed time or at the will of the grantor the relation of landlord and tenant exists, and that no estate passes out of the landlord, and the tenant has only the usufruct; where land was rented for one year the right to possession and use for that year was disposed of, and on the death of the landlord intestate within the year the heirs had no right as heirs to rents accruing for that year, but the right to collect and distribute was in the personal representative. Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579.

And where an intestate left land undisposed of the heirs were entitled to the immediate possession subject to the widow's right and the power of the administrator to administer, and if there were no creditors, and the administrator rented out the lands, the accruing rents not needed for administration belonged to the heirs, although the legal right to collect was in the administrator. Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579.

A conveyance by an heir to a purchaser of all his interest in the land of the intestate, which is silent as to rents and as to the time of giving possession, passed no title to rents to become due from tenants who at the date of the conveyance occupied for the year in which the intestate died under contracts with the intestate; but if the land was occupied under contracts with the administrator it was otherwise, unless creditors and expenses of administration were unsatisfied. Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579.

Where a wife held a bond for title, and died, and the husband made a crop on the land for himself and infant children, there being no administrator, whatever was made on the land by the crop belonged to the father subject to the charge for rent. Gibson v. Carreker, 82 Ga. 46.

Where a mother was in possession of a farm, and rented it out for the year 1882, and disclaimed title in the spring of that year, and said the same belonged to her son, and she died, and it was claimed that the conveyance by her to her son was to defraud her creditors, it was said that with proper pleadings the rents, as well as the land, might be subjected to the payment of her debts if she had conveyed fraudulently. It was held that if she was entitled to rents for that year, it was not wrong for her son to receive and take care of rents payable in kind, and was not inconsistent with the interest of the creditors or of any legal representative of 40 L. the estate that might be thereafter appointed. Johnson v. Johnson, 80 Ga. 280.

Illinois.

In this state the heirs are entitled to accruing rents. The administrator is liable as trustee for rents collected.

In Smith v. McConnell, 17 Ill. 135, 63 Am. Dec. 340, it was said that the lands of one dying intestate descend to the heir, and although it is subject to the payment of debts, and may afterwards be devested by decree and sale of the administrator, the heir is nevertheless owner, and entitled to rents and profits in the meantime.

So, where a tenant had a lease on the land for two years ending September 1, at $50 a year, and he held over eight days thereafter, and his landlord died, the accruing rents for that year descended to the landlord's heirs as a chattel real, and with it the administrator had no concern any more than the land in the meantime. Foltz v. Prouse, 17 Ill. 487.

And in Dixon v. Nicolls, 39 Ill. 372, 89 Am. Dec. 312, it was said that where rent accrued on land in kind upon a lease granted by the owner in fee, and which did not mature until after the death of the lessor, it was a chattel real, and would go to the heirs, and not to the executor or administrator.

And in Stark v. Brown, 101 Ill. 395, it was said that it was not the duty of the administrator to pay the taxes on the decedent's land, as it descended to the heirs at law, and they at once became entitled to the rents and profits thereafter maturing.

Where the husband of one of the heirs leased to two parties part of the land for part of the crops as rent, and the administrator sold the land by an order of court to pay debts, the grantee was entitled to accruing rents. Foote v. Overman, 22 Ill. App. 181.*

Where a sale made by an administrator to himself was set aside upon a bill filed by the heirs for that purpose, it was held that the administrator was a trustee, and was entitled to have an account stated, and should be charged with the rents and profits received, and credited with moneys paid out on the purchase and applied to the discharge of debts and necessary repairs and reasonable improvements. Lagger v. Mutual Union Loan & Bldg. Assn. 146 Ill. 283; Kruse v. Steffens, 47 Ill. 112.

Although the heir may question the right of an administrator to collect the rents, and claim the money as his own, yet if he chooses to treat the money received by the administrator as in his hands for the payment of debts, the administrator cannot complain that he is charged therewith. Goepfner v. Leitzelmann, 98 Ill. 409.

So, where an administrator purchased property for himself at his own sale in the name of another party, and the sale was set aside at the instance of the heirs, an account was required of the rents and profits from the time of the administrator's purchase. Miles v. Wheeler, 43 Ill. 123.

And where an administrator purchased a leasehold estate belonging to his intestate in his lifetime, and charged himself with rents and profits, and treated it as assets, he could not thereafter claim it as his own property, and should account for it as assets. It was said that if the leasehold estate was personal property, of which we have no doubt, it went to him as administrator, and he had control of it, and was bound to dispose of it for creditors and distributees of the estate, and not make a profit out of it for himself. Willenborg v. Murphy, 36 Ill. 344.

Where an administrator made an application to sell real estate to pay debts, evidence was admissible ble to show that the administrator had received meane profits from the occupation of the land more than sufficient to pay the debts. Dorman v. Lane, 6 Ill. 143.

Indiana.

Ordinarily an administrator has no right to rents accruing after the death of the intestate, but they belong to the heirs. Under a statute, however, the administrator may become entitled to the rent provided that he obtains authority from the court. The administrator is liable to account to the heirs for rents collected accruing after the death of the landlord. It seems under the statute there may be an apportionment where the landlord dies or rent matures.

So, an administrator had no right to the rents accruing after the death of the intestate. Kidwell v. Kidwell, 84 Ind. 224.

So, rents which accrued from the real estate of an intestate after his death belonged to his heirs, and not to his administrator. Evans v. Hardy, 76 Ind. 527.

And in Egbert v. Thomas, 1 Ind. 393, it was said that the remedy of the heir against the widow for rents and profits of the real estate occupied by her was at law.

And an administrator was liable to account to the heirs for rents accruing after the death of the landlord, and it was no defense that the rents were used to pay debts. Trimble v. Pollock, 77 Ind. 576; McClead v. Davis, 83 Ind. 263.

And under Ind. act 1843, authorizing an administrator to lease property for the payment of debts, giving such power in instances where adversary proceedings were had to the extent of making those interested in such lands parties, it was held that if no such proceedings were had the lease would be no defense in an action by a guardian of minor heirs against a lessee of the administrator for the use and occupation of their property. Platt v. Dawes, 10 Ind. 60.

So, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2369, providing that a lease or mortgage executed by the executor or administrator under the authority of the court shall be valid, but before any such order is made a bond must be executed as required previous to making an order for the sale of real estate, an administrator was not entitled to rents and profits of land which descended to the heirs without filing a petition and obtaining an order of the court and giving an additional bond. State, Homer, v. Barrett, 121 Ind. 92.

And under 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, § 34, p. 505, requiring the administrator to make out an inventory of emblements and annual crops, whether severed or not from the land, raised by labor, the rent crop planted after the decedent's death was not part of the decedent's estate, and the administrators were not chargeable as administrators with those crops. Rodman v. Rodman, 54 Ind. 444.

In Rubottom v. Morrow, 24 Ind. 202, 87 Am. Dec. 324, it was said that ordinarily an administrator was not chargeable with the rents of real estate accruing during his administration.

Where rents accrued prior to the death of the decedent they belonged to his personal representative, but it was necessary to show that rents did accrue in order to entitle the administrator to sue for them. It was not enough to show mere continued occupancy by one of the heirs. Humphries v. Davis, 100 Ind. 369.

So, rents which accrued previous to the death of the lessor were collectible by the personal representative, and those which accrued afterwards by the heir. King v. Anderson, 20 Ind. 385.

And it is of no consequence that the covenantor is a mere stranger, and not the person who conveyed the land to the covenantee.

In Dorsett v. Gray, 98 Ind. 273, it was said that rents which accrued before the death of the lessor were collectible by his personal representative, and those accruing afterwards were collectible by his heirs.

Under a statute of Indiana an apportionment may be made where rent matures after the death of the landlord.

So, under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5223, providing that when a tenant for life, who shall have demised any land, shall die on or after the day when any rent becomes due, his executor or administrator may recover from the under tenant the whole rent due; if he die before the day when any rent is to become due they may recover the proportion of rent which accrued before his death, and the remainderman shall recover the residue,—where the lessor, who was a life tenant, died before the lease expired, his administrator could recover the rent which accrued prior to his death. Henry v. Stevens, 108 Ind. 281.

In Watson v. Penn, 108 Ind. 21, where a testator made a lease, and left a life estate in the land to his widow, and the widow died before any rent was due, in a contest between the administrator of the widow and the reversion it was held that the accruing rent went to the reversioner.

It was further held in that case that Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 5223, did not apply, as the lease was not made by the life tenant, who took her estate subject to the existing lease; and as the reversion came from the lessor, it gave the right to collect all accruing rents as an incident to the estate.

Iowa.

The heirs are entitled to rents accruing from the lands after the death of the intestate. Under a statute in this state if there are no heirs present or competent to take possession the administrator may do so and receive the rents. The administrator is entitled to rents that accrue before the death of the intestate. If the administrator improperly collects rents belonging to the heirs he is liable to them individually.

So, an administrator was not entitled to the rents of the lands of the intestate, which accrued after the death of the intestate. Crane v. Guthrie, 47 Iowa, 542.

And in Kinsell v. Billings, 35 Iowa, 154, it was said that an administrator had no right to receive the rents and profits accruing after the death of the intestate.

And an administrator who was also guardian had no right to include in his account as administrator moneys received by him for the rent of the real estate of the decedent after his death, and with which he should properly be charged as guardian. Foteaux v. Lepage, 6 Iowa, 123.

And an administrator had no right to the rent of the homestead as against the widow for use and occupancy. Huey v. Huey, 26 Iowa, 525.

In Beesley v. Burgett, 15 Iowa, 192, it was said that at common law the administrator succeeds to the personal estate, and that the real estate, if not disposed of by will, descends to the heirs, and that the administrator has no right to recover the rents and profits accruing after the death of the intestate, and that under the Iowa statute it is only when it is necessary to procure the payment of debts that he can exercise any control over the real property.

In Kinsell v. Billings, 35 Iowa, 154, it was said that at common law the administrator had no control over the rents and profits of the real estate, and such was the law in Iowa except when the statute provided otherwise, and that the law of 1866, chap. 139, Rev. § 3954, provided that if there were no heirs or devisees of the testator or intestate present or competent to take possession of real estate, the executor or administrator may, as trustee for the proper heirs or devisees, receive the rents and profits arising therefrom.

And under Iowa Rev. Laws 1866, chap. 139, p. 150, 11th Gen. Assem. §§ 3-5, an administrator could not recover the rents arising from real estate which accrued after the death of the intestate, unless it was shown that there were no heirs who were competent to take possession of the property. Shawham v. Long, 26 Iowa, 488, 96 Am. Dec. 164.

Where an administrator showed that there were no heirs present and competent to take possession of the premises, he could recover rents of real estate which accrued after the death of the intestate, under Iowa Code, § 2402, providing that if there be no heirs or devisees present and competent to take possession of the real estate left by such decedent, the executor may take possession of such real estate and receive the rents and profits, and § 2403, providing that such executor and administrator, under the order and direction of the court, may apply the profits of such real estate to the payment of the taxes, debts, and claims against the estate in case the personal assets are insufficient. Toerring v. Lamp, 77 Iowa, 488.

But under Iowa Code, § 2408, an administrator was not entitled to rents and profits where there was no order of court made to apply the rents and profits under this section. Dexter v. Hayes, 88 Iowa, 493.

In Dexter v. Hayes, 88 Iowa, 493, the case of Toerring v. Lamp, 77 Iowa, 488, was distinguished, as in that case the administrator had an order of court.

A widow and an assignee of heirs could not maintain an action against an administrator for rents and profits collected from the decedent's real estate, as, if he collected the rents, he was individually liable. On the death of an ancestor the heirs were entitled to the possession of the rents and profits. The court said that if this was to be treated as an action against the administrator a recovery could not be had without an allegation that the estate had been settled and there was a surplus. Lavery v. Woodward, 16 Iowa, 1.

Rents that accrued before the death of the decedent were assets in the hands of the administrator. Crawford v. Ginn, 35 Iowa, 543.

Kansas.

The heirs are entitled to the rents and profits as against the administrator. But where an administrator charged himself with the rents collected he was estopped from denying his authority.

The title to realty descended to the heirs, and they had the right to receive, as against the administrator, all the rents and profits. Head v. Sutton, 31 Kan. 616.

And on the death of an intestate the title of lands vested in the heirs, and they were entitled to the rents and profits of the same; but where the administrator had collected the rents, and had charged himself with the same as assets in his settlement, he would be estopped to deny that the rents so collected were assets. Kothman v. Markson, 34 Kan. 542.

In Head v. Sutton, 31 Kan. 616, it was said that if the administrator had collected the rent, and had charged himself with it as administrator in his accounts, he would have been liable for the same on the ground of estoppel.

administrator is liable as trustee for rents collected, but this liability does not attach to the official bond. A statute provides for apportionment of rents on the death of the landlord having an uncertain interest in the land.

The administrator is entitled only to accrued rents. O'Bannon v. Roberts, 2 Dana, 54; Williamson v. Richardson, 6 T. B. Mon. 603; Ball v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Ky. 501.

And the same was said to be the rule in Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215.

The heirs, and not the administrator, are entitled to accruing rent. O'Bannon v. Roberts, 2 Dana, 54; Ball v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Ky. 501; Eastin v. Hatchitt, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 789; Atchison v. Lindsey, 6 B. Mon. 86, 43 Am. Dec. 153; Rank v. Hill, 8 Bush, 67.

And the same was said to be the rule in Slaughter v. Froman, 2 T. B. Mon. 95; Smith v. Bland, 7 B. Mon. 21; Thomasson v. Lucas, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 899.

Under Ky. Gen. Stat. 1879, chap. 39, art. 2, § 29, providing that if the tenant for life of land let the same to another for a year, and die after the 1st day of March, the lessee shall hold the land until the last day of December following, but shall pay a reasonable rent from the death of the tenant for life, reasonable rent could be recovered and not that fixed by the contract, and it was not payable for the entire term fixed by the contract, but only to the last of the following December. Norris v. Cheatham, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 223.

Where an intestate had made a deed of trust for his creditors on his property, and afterwards had made a lease to another party, who died, the administratrix of the first could not maintain an action for rent, as, in order to recover rents by an administratrix, one of two things should have appeared, that the rent was due and in arrear in the lifetime of the decedent, or that the interest of the intestate in the demised premises was a chattel interest which was not claimed by the intestate but came to the administratrix. Williamson v. Richardson, 6 T. B. Mon. 603.

In Ball v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Ky. 501, which was a suit by an executor to obtain a sale of the real estate to pay debts, it was held that rents which accrued prior to the testator's death vested in the executor as assets, and the legal title vested in the heirs or devisees on the death of the testator, and so remained until it was divested in pursuance of the decree, and they were entitled to the possession and rents during that period, and the rights of creditors and purchasers did not attach to the rents until the date of confirmation of the sale.

In Thompson v. Bailey, 1 Ky. L. Rep. 321, it was held that pending an action for a sale to pay debts, the administrator could collect and apply to the debts the rents accruing after the intestate's death. All of the estate, whether descended to the heirs or technically assets in the administrator's hands, could be so applied. This case seems to conflict with the rule laid down in Ball v. First Nat. Bank.

So, for all the rent that was due after the death of the decedent the right of action was exclusively in the heirs whether based upon actual lease or for mere use and occupation. O'Bannon v. Roberts, 2 Dana, 54.

Where an administrator collects accruing rents the sureties on his official bonds are not liable, but he is liable individually. Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215; Eastin v. Hatchitt, 15 Ky. L. v. Jewell, 6 Bush, 510; Oldham v. Collins, 4 J. J. Marsh. 49.

So, under Ky. Rev. Stat. chap. 37, art. 2, § 9, providing for a bond by the administrator to the effect that he will well and truly make a proper distribution of any surplus money, effects, and rents which shall come to his hands by color of his office, it was held that this referred to rent accruing in the lifetime of the decedent, collected by the personal representative, and his sureties would not be liable for rents collected by him on lands leased by him as administrator which descended to the heirs. It was said that where the intestate holds an obligation for rent, and dies before it falls due, that if it is collected by the administrator it would be regarded as assets for which the surety would be liable. Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215.

In Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215, it was held that Ky. Rev. Stat. § 26, p. 507, providing that an estate held by a deceased person for the life of another shall be assets in the hands of the personal representative of the deceased, and § 30, providing that when a person who has a freehold or other uncertain estate in lands shall rent out the lands and die before the rent shall become due the rent of the land shall be apportioned unless a will should otherwise direct, changed the common-law rule as to what constituted assets in the hands of an administrator, but did not make the surety of the administrator liable for the rents that did not belong to the intestate.

In Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215, it was said that the statutory stipulation in the bond to account for rents was made because under Ky. Rev. Stat. § 30, p. 507, the personal representative was entitled to all the rent where his intestate held an estate for the life of another, and to an apportionment of the rent between him and the heir or those entitled, where the owner of a fee or freehold had rented out the land and died before the rent became due.

Rents accruing after the landlord's death belong to the heir, and not to the personal representative, and if collected by the personal representative his sureties were not liable therefor. Eastin v. Hatchitt, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 789.

In Harmon v. Ross, Mass. Ky. 1899 (see Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215), it was said that an administrator and his sureties would be liable on his bond for rents which came to his hands by color of his office. In Wilson v. Unsell, 12 Bush, 215, the court criticized this dictum, and said that "the attention of the court was evidently called more particularly in that case to the state of the pleadings than the liability of the sureties on the administrator's bond. Neither the sureties nor heirs were before the court. . . . The words inserted in the bond . . . 'to make proper distribution of . . . rents which may come to his hands . . . by color of his office,' cannot be held to embrace an estate that has passed to the heirs."

So, the succeeding administrator could not collect from the sureties of his predecessor rents collected by him, as the administrator had no right to receive the rents of land which descended to the heirs of the decedent. Slaughter v. Froman, 2 T. B. Mon. 95.

(The decision in 2 T. B. Mon. has not been recognized in later Kentucky cases as authority.)

And an heir could not maintain an action against the justices of the county court for failure to properly certify an administrator's bond, and hold them responsible as security for rents, as rents were not assets which an administrator had a right to receive. It was said that an administrator might be made personally liable for the same as trustee. Smith v. Bland, 7 B. Mon. 21.

In Heeter v. Jewell, 6 Bush, 510, it was said that before the passage of the Revised Statutes, rents accruing after the death of an intestate and collected by his administrator were not legal assets, and hence this court decided, in the case of Smith v. Bland, 7 B. Mon. 21, that though the administrator might be made personally liable for the same as trustee his sureties could not. (The court in Heeter v. Jewell evidently referred to the statutory provision in regard to the administrator's bond.)

Where an administrator in South Carolina had collected rents since the death of the intestate, the heirs could maintain a suit in chancery in Kentucky against such administrator if found in that state, and he would be held to be a trustee and amenable to the heirs in a court of equity. Atchison v. Lindsey, 6 B. Mon. 86, 43 Am. Dec. 103.

So, an administrator has no right to rent real estate, but when he does so he is individually liable. Thomasson v. Lucas, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 889.

Where the deceased held a leasehold estate on which were furnaces for making salt that were leased after his death by the administrator for rent payable in salt, and the administrator charged himself with the highest cash rent of the furnaces and received the salt and therewith paid the debts, and charged the estate with the salt at $2 a bushel, thereby making the salt exceed the rent with which he was charged, it was held to be a speculation, and the estate could claim the profits. Keellar v. Beelor, 5 T. B. Mon. 573.

In Oldham v. Collins, 4 J. J. Marsh. 49, it was said that if the administrator received rents for which he never accounted he was individually liable for the amount so received.

In Ball v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Ky. 501, it was said: "Before and since the Revised Statutes, which are the same as the General Statutes on the subject, the common-law rule that rents accruing after the death of the owner, in fee of real estate, are not assets which vest in the personal representative, has been in force in this state, those statutes regulating the apportionment of rent between the personal representative and heir or devisee being regarded as merely declaratory of the common law; hence the judgment giving to the heirs and devisees the rents accruing after the testator's death and before suit was undoubtedly correct."

Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 39, § 30, provides that "when a person who has a freehold, or an uncertain interest in land, shall rent out the land and die before the rent shall become due, the rent of the land shall be apportioned between the personal representatives of the deceased and the person who shall succeed to the land as heir, personal representative, devisee, or person in reversion or remainder, unless in the case of a devisee the will shall otherwise direct." The annotator of the Kentucky Statutes says that in Ball v. First Nat. Bank "the court seems to have overlooked the fact that, in the General Statutes the word 'an' is substituted for the word 'other.' As, according to the common law, a 'freehold' may be either an estate in fee simple or an estate for life, as an estate for life is an uncertain interest, it was, perhaps reasonably, held that a provision concerning 'a freehold or other uncertain interest in on account of occupancy of real estate, and if a suit is to be brought upon this contract of suretyship after the death of plaintiff's intestate, it can be brought by no one but the administratrix.

land,' was not intended to apply to estates in fee simple. But it . . . [may be reasonably supposed] that the framers of the General Statutes changed the provision so as to make it read, 'a freehold or an uncertain interest in land,' for the express purpose of making it apply to certain as well as uncertain interests; to estates in fee as well as estates for life."

Under Ky. Gen. Stat. art. 2, chap. 39, § 30, where wheat was furnished by the life tenant for sowing, and he died before the crop was matured, the value of the wheat furnished by him was deducted and the balance was apportioned between the remainderman and the representatives of the life tenant. Redmon v. Bedford, 80 Ky. 13.

Under the common law rents of land accruing after the death of the decedent were not assets in the hands of the administrator, and this was not changed by Ky. Rev. Stat. art. 2, chap. 37, § 30, 1 Stanton, 508, providing that when a person who has a freehold or uncertain interest in land shall rent out the land or die before the rent shall become due the rent of the land shall be apportioned between the personal representatives of the deceased and the person who shall succeed to the land as heir, the personal representative, devisee, or person in reversion or remainder, unless the will shall otherwise direct, which was nothing more than a re-enactment of 2 Stat. Laws, 688, act 1797, § 48. Rank v. Hill, 8 Bush, 67.

In White v. Clarke, 7 T. B. Mon. 641, the widow was chargeable with rent of land which was not a part of the mansion house and plantation, allowing a suitable deduction for clearing the land and keeping the same in repair.

Louisiana.

In this state it seems that an administrator is authorized to rent out the plantation of the deceased, and is liable for failure to exercise due diligence in securing a tenant.

Where an administrator made no effort to rent the plantation under his administration, he was liable for the rental value of the same during the time he cultivated them for his own account under the law. Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696.

In Sparrow's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 696, it was said that the case of Myrick's Succession, 38 La. Ann. 611, involved the right of the heirs to claim of the administrator the value of the animals that he should have sold and not allowed to die on the plantation, and to enforce the liability of the administrator for five years' rent, and the court exonerated the administrator on the ground that he could not have sold the animals separate from the plantation, and that he tried without success to lease the plantation, and therefore the administrator was legally justified to cultivate it so as to save it from waste; and the administrator in that case did not seek to bind the succession for debts incurred in his planting operations.

An administrator was not liable for rents where he had made proper efforts but had been unable to lease the plantation, and was compelled to work the place on account of the succession, although loss resulted. Myrick's Succession, 38 La. Ann. 611.

And where the property could not be rented the administrator could allow some one to use the same under an obligation to keep it in repair. Triche's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 289.

An administrator was liable for the value of 40 L. R. A.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a covenant appended to a lease, brought by the administratrices of Walsh, the lessor and covenantee. The only objection urged to the plaintiff's recovery is that, if the obligation of the covenant did not rents, and it was held that there was no law requiring an administrator of a succession to lease its property at auction. Richmond's Succession, 35 La. Ann. 858.

Maine.

The heirs, and not the administrator, are entitled to the accruing rents. The administrator is made liable by statute for rents collected by him.

An administrator could maintain an action for rent of land where the rents accrued previous to the intestate's death. Plummer v. Bowie, 76 Me. 496.

Where an owner of land executed a lease for a series of years, and died, the rent accruing after his death descended to his heirs, and not to his administrator. Stinson v. Stinson, 38 Me. 593.

And in Fuller v. Young, 10 Me. 365, it was said that it was a familiar and established principle of law that when a man dies seised of real property of an intestate it descends to his heirs, subject to the payment of his debts, if there be a deficiency of personal estate. His administrator has no right to enter into the lands or take the profits.

Under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 19, providing, as a condition of the administrator's bond, treble damages for waste or trespass, and § 54, providing that the administrator shall be chargeable with all interests, profits, and income that come to his hands from any estate of the deceased, and chap. 66, § 20, providing that an administrator may recover damages even against an heir or devisee for waste or trespass, an administrator was liable to the heirs for rents collected by him, as the administrator has no right of possession under these statutes. Kimball v. Sumner, 62 Me. 305.

So, under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 54, rents and profits did not go to the administrator, but as an account of the heirs to whom they belonged. It was said that, by consent of the heirs, they might be used as assets, in which case the administrator should account for them. Section 55 provides that if the administrator himself occupies he shall account for the rents to the heirs. It was said that there would not be any different liability where he collects the rents of another. Kimball v. Sumner, 62 Me. 305.

In Dennett v. Hopkinson, 63 Me. 350, it was said that Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 64, § 33 provided that where from any cause there is a delay in granting letters testamentary or of administration, a special administrator may be appointed to collect the rents and profits of the real estate and preserve them for the executor or administrator, and § 55, provided that if any part of the real estate is used or occupied by the executor or administrator he shall account for the income thereof to the devisee or heirs.

And under Me. Stat. chap. 51, § 22, it was held that although an administrator has no legal right to enter into possession of the real estate of which his intestate died seised because it descended to his heirs at law, still when he does so enter and improve it he is accountable to those heirs for the rents and profits. Heald v. Heald, 5 Me. 387.

Maryland.

In Getzandaffer v. Caylor, 38 Md. 280, it was said that rents accruing after the death of an owner of land do not pass into the hands of an executor or administrator as a part of his personal property, but go to the heirs at law or devisee.

Massachusetts.

The heirs, and not the administrator, are entitled to accruing rents. The statute provides that if the administrator uses or occupies the same he must account for the rents.

The heirs are entitled to accruing rents. Brigham v. Hunt, 152 Mass. 257; Cummings v. Watson, 149 Mass. 262; Jaques v. Gould, 4 Cush. 384; Foster v. Gorton, 5 Pick. 185; Gibson v. Farley, 16 Mass. 280; Lobdell v. Hayes, 12 Gray, 238; Alden v. Stebbins, 99 Mass. 616.

So, where a demandant conveyed premises in 1887, and the tenant received the rents and profits, and the writ of entry was filed in June, 1888, and the demandant died in July, 1888, leaving heirs, the administrator could not prosecute an action for mesne profits from the time of the conveyance to the tenant to the death of his intestate, as heirs or devisees are the only persons who can maintain and prosecute a real action, under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 185, §§ 14, 15, chap. 173, § 12, and there was no statute authorizing an administrator who has not been licensed to sell the real estate of his intestate to appear and prosecute a real action. The court said in what way the rents and profits should be recovered in a case of this kind is a question not before us. It was further said there is strong ground for contending that if the heirs had seasonably come in and prosecuted this suit they might have recovered all the rents and profits to which their ancestors would have been entitled if they had not died. Brigham v. Hunt, 152 Mass. 257.

And where a tenancy at will had terminated by the death of the owner, and the tenant continued to occupy a part of the real estate and paid to the administratrix rents accruing before and after the intestate's death, but made no further contract, the administratrix could not maintain an action for subsequent use and occupation, as the occupants would be liable to pay rent to the heirs at law as owner, under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 121, § 3, Gen. Stat. chap. 90, § 25, providing that persons in possession of lands and tenements as tenants at sufferance shall be liable to pay rent therefor for such time as they may occupy or detain the same. Cummings v. Watson, 149 Mass. 262.

So, where rent by the terms of the lease was reserved generally, and was not made payable to any particular person, and it was expressly agreed to be paid quarter yearly during the whole term of three years, it was held that the lease did not terminate on the death of the lessor. It was further held that the agreement to deliver up the premises to the lessor or his attorney peaceably and quietly at the end of the term meant at the end of three years, and the heirs were entitled to the rent after the death of the intestate. Jaques v. Gould, 4 Cush. 384.

Until the executor or administrator sold the real estate according to license obtained from the court, the heirs rightfully in possession were entitled to rents and profits, and rents accruing after the decease could not be said to be the goods, chattels, rights, or credits of the deceased, as they were incident to the reversion. Gibson v. Farley, 16 Mass. 280.

Mass. Stat. 1789, chap. 11, § 2, providing that the judge of probate should appoint referees to ascertain what the executor or administrator ought to credit in his account for the use and occupation of the real estate did not give executors and administrators the right to have the rents of the real estate for the use of creditors, but was a provision for a case where they might happen themselves to be occupants, by providing a mode in which they ought to account for the use of those to whom the same might belong, and where the estate was insolvent 40 L. the heirs were entitled to rents until the estate was sold for the payment of debts or entered by the mortgagee. Gibson v. Farley, 16 Mass. 280.

In Drinkwater v. Drinkwater, 4 Mass. 353, it was said that "at law the lands descend to the heir subject to the payment of debts, if there be a deficiency of personal assets. The administrator frequently enters on the land, and accounts for the rents and profits in the probate court; and this practice may not be inconvenient to the heirs. For the profits become a part of the fund, if wanted, for the payment of the debts; and, if not wanted, they form a part of the distributive shares of the personal estate. But in law the administrator has no right to enter into the lands, or to take the profits. He has no interest in them, but a naked authority to sell them on license to pay the debts, when the personal estate is insufficient."

In Lobdell v. Hayes, 12 Gray, 236, it was said that "upon the decease of the owner of real estate, it descends to and vests in his heirs at law, unless otherwise disposed of by his will. It vests in his heirs, however, subject to the payment of his debts. But until a sale is lawfully made for that purpose the heirs may enter upon the estate and receive the rents and profits."

Where the widow of an intestate before the appointment of an administrator leased land and animals belonging to the intestate's estate, it was held that the widow had no right to lease the estate of the intestate and the lease was void and the tenants acquired no rights under it, and the administrator could recover the increase of chattels, and the heirs could recover the share of the products in trover as against the attaching creditors of the tenant. Foster v. Gorton, 5 Pick. 185.

In Cummings v. Watson, 149 Mass. 262, it was said that whether the administrator could sue as such if, while in possession of the realty, she had let the premises to the defendant and they had promised to pay rent to her, need not be decided.

An administrator who collects accruing rents is liable to the heirs for the same. Lobdell v. Hayes, 12 Gray, 238.

And the same was said to be the rule in Drinkwater v. Drinkwater, 4 Mass. 353.

An administrator is liable to account in the probate court for accruing rents collected by him. Brooks v. Jackson, 125 Mass. 307; Stearns v. Stearns, 1 Pick. 157.

And the same was said to be the rule in Palmer v. Palmer, 13 Gray, 326.

Upon the decease of the owner of real estate until a sale was lawfully made to pay his debts, the heirs could enter upon the estate and receive the rents and profits, and their interest was determined only by the sale. In this case as shown by the agreed statement of facts the administrator collected the rents and managed the estate as agent for the parties in interest. Lobdell v. Hayes, 12 Gray, 236.

In Brooks v. Jackson, 125 Mass. 307, it was said that, under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 98, § 8, Rev. Stat. chap. 87, § 6, Stat. 1789, chap. 11, § 2, providing that if the executor or administrator uses or occupies any part of the real estate he shall account for the income thereof as ordered by the probate court, with his assent and the assent of such other parties interested as are present at the rendering of the account: "This provision has always been construed as applying as well to rents received by the executor or administrator as to the use of real estate occupied by him in person; and we can have no doubt that it extends to his occupation or receipt of rents from the time of the death to which his appointment relates. It requires him to account for rents and profits received or enjoyed by him to none but those to whom they belong; and if he is himself the heir or devisee he is not obliged to account for them at all. When he is not himself heir or devisee, he is required by the statute to account for them in the probate court, but to the heirs or devisees only, unless they, either expressly, or by implication from assenting to his accounts in which he charged himself with rents as part of the general assets, have agreed that they shall be applied to the payment of debts, legacies, and expenses of administration, in which case he is chargeable accordingly."

Where an administrator gave bond, made an inventory and included real estate in his inventory, filed an account showing personal assets and real estate, and sold the real estate and received $50 for rents before the time of sale, and a creditor brought suit, it was held that the $50 received for rent after two years had expired from giving his bond did not appear to be assets, but belonged to the heir. Alden v. Stebbins, 99 Mass. 418.

In Palmer v. Palmer, 13 Gray, 326, it was said that strictly an administrator has nothing to do with the real estate of his intestate except to execute the power to sell it for the payment of debts when necessary and he has obtained the authority, but sometimes by an arrangement with heirs he takes the profits of the whole for the benefit of the estate, and if so he must account for what he may receive as assets. But it was held that if one of the heirs has been in possession the fact that he is also one of the administrators will not impose upon him the obligation to account for profits which any of the heirs may rightfully take and retain so long as their title is not divested by the sale.

(Mass. Stat. 1836, chap. 67, § 6, provides that if any part of the real estate shall be used or occupied by the executor or administrator he shall account for the income thereof.)

And an administrator could occupy the real estate of his intestate with the consent of the heirs, accounting for the rents as might be agreed on by the parties or as should be determined by commissioners, under Mass. Stat. 1789, chap. 11, authorizing the appointment of three disinterested persons as commissioners to inquire and determine what was the annual value of the estate, and the sum justly chargeable in that behalf to the administrators, and where administrators had voluntarily credited rents in their first account, and the administrators continued to occupy the lands without notice to the heirs of any change, the latter had the right to consider that they were still holding on the same terms, and would be chargeable in the same manner as before. Stearns v. Stearns, 1 Pick. 157.

But an action could not be maintained on an administrator's bond against his sureties for rents of the real estate received by the administrator, under Mass. Pub. Stat. chap. 144, § 5, providing that "If the real estate has been used or occupied by an executor or administrator, he shall account for the income thereof as ordered by the probate court with the assent of the executor or administrator and of such other parties interested as are present at the rendering of the account." It was held that the administrator was to account for the rents to the heirs only, unless they, either expressly, or by implication from assenting to his accounts in which he has charged himself with rents as assets, have agreed that they shall be applied to the payment of legacies and expenses of administration, in which case he is to be charged accordingly; and that as the administrator might have received these rents with the consent of the heirs, a decree was necessary to determine whether he was to account for them to the heirs only, as well as to determine their rights, and until this was done the suit would not lie on the bond. Choate v. Jacobs, 136 Mass. 297.

And where an administrator before the death of his intestate purchased property by title bond, and took possession and occupied the same, and accounted in his inventory for the agreed price and interest, no action could be maintained against him by the heirs at law for any portion of the rents and profits. Chenery v. Davis, 16 Gray, 89.

Under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 98, § 8, providing that if the real estate has been used or occupied by the executor or administrator he shall account for the income thereof as ordered by the probate court with the assent of the executor or administrator and of such other parties interested as are present at the rendering of the account, where a widow who was also one of the administrators occupied the homestead since the death of her husband jointly with two minor heirs of whom she was the guardian, and one adult heir, and a part of the time with two others of seven heirs, the administrators were not required to account for use and occupation. Almy v. Crapo, 100 Mass. 218.

Where a decedent owned a lease for 99 years, it was held to be a chattel which an administrator could dispose of in the same manner as the personal property of the intestate. Gay's Petition, 5 Mass. 419.

Michigan.

Under a statute the administrator was entitled to the accruing rents, if he asserted his right against the heirs. This statute was repealed in 1871 but was substantially re-enacted in 1881.

So, under Mich. Comp. Laws, § 2904, providing that the executor or administrator shall have a right to the possession of all the real estate, and may receive the rent until the estate shall have been settled or delivered over by order of the probate court to the heirs or devisees, the administrator had no power to sell the land, but he was authorized to receive the rents, issues, and profits for which he was required to account, and he may let the real estate, or, if it was let by the decedent, he may receive the rents, but he could make no disposition of it by letting or otherwise to interfere with the settlement of the estate or the sale for that purpose. Kline v. Moulton, 11 Mich. 370.

Michigan Comp. Laws, § 2904, merely permitted the representatives to claim possession if they saw fit to demand it, and did not deprive the heirs of the right. It was said that previous to the Revision of 1846, the personal representative had nothing to do with the real estate except to sell it under an order of the probate court, and that the real estate descended to the heir, who alone was entitled to subsequent rents and profits. Streeter v. Paton, 7 Mich. 341.

In Baxter v. Robinson, 11 Mich. 520, it was said that in Streeter v. Paton, 7 Mich. 341, it was said by Manning, J., that the heir was entitled to the possession unless possession was taken or claimed by the administrator under a statute giving him the right of possession and of the rents and profits until the estate was settled.

Mich. Comp. Laws 1867, § 2904, did not deprive the heirs of their right to the possession of real estate, and to the rents and profits. They were entitled to the same until the executor or administrator took possession or claimed the right thereto under the statute, and until such action would not implication the undertaking of a surety or guarantor than they are to enlarge that of the principal party. But perhaps the word "surety," although seemingly inartificially used, coupled with the nature and object of the contract, makes the collateral undertaking as large as the principal one. We will assume that it is to be read in the broader sense. We be accountable to any person for the rents and profits. Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795.

In Campau v. Campau, 19 Mich. 116, it was said that an administrator was only given the right to receive the rents and profits while the estate was in process of settlement, under Mich. Comp. Laws, § 2904, Rev. 1846, chap. 71, § 7.

Under Mich. Comp. Laws 1857, § 2904, the administrator had the right to the possession of the real estate and rents and profits until the estate should be settled or delivered over by order of the probate court to the heirs or devisees, but this was repealed by act of March 29, 1871, Sess. Laws 1871, p. 80. It was held that the legislature could take away from the administrator the power of taking and holding the possession of rents and profits, and that this could be done as well after as before they had taken possession. Campau v. Campau, 25 Mich. 127.

Mich. Sess. Laws 1871, p. 278, authorizing executors or administrators to take possession of the realty of deceased persons, to lease from year to year and cancel or modify any leases given by the decedent during his lifetime, and to keep property in repair, and to receive rents and proceeds until the estate is settled, changed the rule, as before this statute the personal representative had no control over the realty except as power may be granted in certain cases, and the rents belonged absolutely and completely to the heirs or devisees, and this statute did not take away vested rights that accrued before its passage. Van Fleet v. Van Fleet, 49 Mich. 610.

So, where an heir was in possession under a lease made by his father, which was to terminate at his father's death, and the administrator allowed the heir to remain in possession pending probate proceedings of a will, upon his executing an agreement authorizing the administrator to withhold from his share the rent, on the failure of the heir to pay the rent the administrator was entitled to summary proceedings to recover possession, if the share of the assets in case the will was probated would be insufficient, as it was the duty of the administrator to exercise the right which the statute gave him to obtain possession and to collect rents and profits for the executor or for the distribution of the estate in case there was no executor. Wilmarth v. Reed, 83 Mich. 44.

Where the widow remained in possession of the real estate of her deceased husband it was held that on a bill of foreclosure, she could not be required to account for the rents and profits. Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 87.

Minnesota.

Under the statutes of this state the administrator is entitled to the accruing rents, as against the heirs, during administration.

In Miller v. Hoberg, 22 Minn. 249, it was said that under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 52, § 6, giving the administrator the right to the possession, and to the rents, issues, and profits, the heirs have the right to the possession as against everyone but the administrator or his tenants, and the administrator has the right to the possession as against the heirs or any other person until the estate is settled or until delivered over by order of the probate court.

And in State, Beals, v. Ramsey County Probate Court, 25 Minn. 22, it was said that under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 52, § 6, an executor or administrator was entitled to the possession of rents, issues, and profits of real estate until the estate was settled or delivered over by order of the probate court to the heir, and under § 7 he was accountable for the income of the real estate while it remained in his possession,

In Smith v. Park, 31 Minn. 70, it was said that under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 52, § 6, authorizing an administrator to lease land during the period of administration, this right conferred by the statute for the purpose of administration was limited to that period.

Mississippi.

The accruing rents belong to the heirs. But under a statute the administrator by order of the probate court could lease the plantation for three years. The administrator may become liable to heirs for rent collected by him as trustee, or at their election they may charge him for net profits if he works the plantation. An apportionment of rent is provided for by statute if a tenant for life dies before rent matures.

So, where a creditor obtained a judgment against an administrator the latter could not by a bill in equity set off the judgment by an account of rents due from the judgment creditor, as the heirs were entitled to the rents, and the administrator was liable for the debt, and there was no privity. Bullock v. Sneed, 13 Smedes & M. 298.

And under Miss. Rev. Code 1871, § 1636, giving a remedy to the executors or administrators of any person unto whom any rent is or shall be due and not paid at the time of his death, by an action of debt, covenant, or assumpsit for all such arrearages of rent, and also the remedy of distress, it was held that this section recognized the right of the personal representative to pursue any of the remedies named to recover rent due and not paid to the lessor at the time of his death, but it had no application to rent which accrued after, and the rule was the same as at common law, that rent due at the time of the death of the lessor goes to his personal representative, but rent which accrues afterwards belongs to the heirs. Bloodworth v. Stevens, 51 Miss. 475.

An administrator was probably chargeable with rents where he had voluntarily returned the rents as charges in his annual account, and the commissioners following the interlocutory decree merely transferred to the account stated by them the items in the administrator's own accounts, and he made no objection to the charge. The court said that after receiving rents for over ten years, and professing to account for them in his trustee capacity, it would be monstrous now, after the claim against him in every capacity is barred by limitation, to permit him to raise the objection now insisted on. The court further said that the rents belonged to the distributees, and they had the right to advance them or any other money belonging to them for the payment of debts, so as to protect the specific property. Crowder v. Shackelford, 35 Miss. 321.

And where an administrator carried on the plantation without authority for the heirs, he was liable for the net profits or for the reasonable hire and rent at the election of the heirs, and when the heirs made an election it was irrevocable. French v. Davis, 38 Miss. 167.

In Trotter v. Trotter, 40 Miss. 704, it was said that if an administrator worked a plantation with the assent of the heirs they could not charge him as for the wrongful act with rent, in a petition in the probate court on the ground that he had obtained no order, and if the administrator carried on the business without their consent and without an order of court, he was not amenable to the probate court, but was liable, if at all, to the heir to whom the land descended immediately on the death of the ancestor.

An administrator was not authorized to lease or cultivate wild land, but was entitled to lease and have no doubt that it continues to run after the death of the original covenantor. But, supposing heirs, executors, and assigns to have been mentioned, it seems to be settled in this commonwealth that the instrument would not work like a letter of credit offering a new contract to the successors of Walsh (Saunders v. Saunders, 154 Mass. 387, 338; Abbott v. Hills, hire the plantation or farm for three years, under Miss. act Nov. 22, 1865, Pamph. Laws 1865, 140, 141, authorizing the personal representative to lease and hire for a term not exceeding three years the plantation. Murphy v. Thomas, 41 Miss. 429.

In Bloodworth v. Stevens, 51 Miss. 475, it was said that Miss. Rev. Code 1871, § 1639, providing that if the tenant for life die before the day when any rent is to become due, the executor or administrator may recover the proportion of rent which accrued before the time of his death, was an exception to the common-law rule in behalf of a life tenant who had made a demise and died and gave to his personal representatives the rent up to the time of his death proportionately.

Missouri.

The heirs are entitled to accruing rents except in certain cases provided for by statute. And the heirs allowing the administrator to collect rents may be bound by estoppel. A statute authorizes the administrator in certain cases to lease the land for short terms, and an administrator collecting rents is liable therefor. A foreign administrator has no authority to collect accruing rents. An appointment will be made of accruing and accrued rents.

Unaccrued rent on land after the death of the owner belonged to the heirs and not to the administrator, except in certain cases provided for by the Missouri statute, subjecting real estate to liabilities for debts and the like. Shouse v. Krusor, 24 Mo. App. 279.

In Eoff v. Tompkins, 2 Mo. App. 464, it was said, under Wagner's (Mo.) Stat. 89, § 48, directing that executors and administrators under the direction of the court shall lease the real estate for any term not more than two years, and shall receive and recover rents, the rents so collected are necessarily assets in the hands of the executor or administrator.

And under Mo. act January 12, 1822, authorizing the administrator to lease out the real estate of an intestate who shall have died without leaving any heirs or legal representatives, an administrator could recover in assumpsit for the use and occupation of the house of the intestate after his death. Rector v. Ranken, 1 Mo. 371.

And in Lass v. Elsleben, 50 Mo. 122, it was said that an administrator under the direction of the probate court or courts having probate jurisdiction could make short leases of the real estate belonging to the decedent.

Where distributees neglected to take possession of land, and allowed the administrator to collect their rents and disburse them as administrator, they could not afterwards prevent the payment by the administrator of a claim against the estate by asserting that the rents belonged to them. The court said, having allowed their rents to remain in the hands of the administrator, and having allowed him to collect the rents and treat them as moneys belonging to the estate, and disburse them as such, they cannot be allowed now to recoup themselves by laying their hands upon this judgment in preference to a creditor of the estate. Tyler v. Priest, 31 Mo. App. 272.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 70, 129, 130, 146, making it the duty of an administrator to inventory real estate, and providing that he may lease it for short terms under the direction of the probate court, and that whenever the court shall be satisfied that any real estate need not be sold or leased for the payment of debts, the executor or administrator shall be ordered to deliver possession of the same to those entitled to it, rents collected by an administrator which he was not bound to collect were assets when collected, and if the administrator leased the realty without authority, and received rents, these rents would be assets, and he should account for them. Lewis v. Carson, 16 Mo. App. 342.

In Lewis v. Carson, 93 Mo. 587, it was said that under Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 70, 129, 130, 143, an administrator under the order of the probate court may lease the real estate and collect the rents. It was held that "although the executor or administrator takes possession of real estate and collects the rents arising therefrom without an order of the probate court, he and his sureties on his bond must account therefor. This is no longer a debatable question in this state." Gamble v. Gibson, 59 Mo. 592; Dix v. Morris, 66 Mo. 514."

In Hartnett v. Fegan, 3 Mo. App. 1, it is said that an administrator as such had no interest in the real estate of his intestate beyond a naked power to sell or lease under the direction of the probate court for the payment of debts, and that if he leased the land without authority from the court the rents received would be assets in his hands, and he should account in a settlement for rents received, whether with or without the direction of the probate court.

In McPike v. McPike, 111 Mo. 216, it was said that under Mo. Rev. Stat. chap. 1, art. 4, § 69; art. 5, §§ 93, 94; art. 7, §§ 129, 130; art. 8, § 145, requiring an administrator to inventory the real estate, and authorizing him under an order of the probate court to lease the real estate and collect the rents, the receiving of rents and sale of realty were clearly within the scope of the lawful exercise of his authority as administrator under certain circumstances, and if without an order of court he assumed to take the rents by color of his office, he was estopped from pleading his own failure to perform the conditions precedent, and the collection of rents and the proceeds of sale were within the scope of his duties, and his sureties were bound.

In this case it was said that "at common law the administrator had nothing whatever to do with the real estate of his intestate. It descended to the heirs. Accordingly at the common law, and in those states generally where the common law has been adopted, and only modified to the extent of permitting a sale of the lands to pay debts, it has generally been held that where an administrator came into the possession of rents from the realty or the proceeds of sale, he was chargeable therefor individually as a trustee or trespasser, but not in his character as administrator."

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 129, providing for lease of lands by an administrator in this state, such lands could not be leased by a foreign administrator. Crockett v. Althouse, 35 Mo. App. 404.

And in the absence of proof as to what was the law in Illinois the common law was held to control, and under Missouri Revised Statutes, authorizing an administrator under an order of the probate court to lease the real estate and collect the rents, he was not liable as such administrator for rents collected in Illinois, where such rents were received as the attorney in fact or guardian ad litem for the heirs, and not as administrator. McPike v. McPike, 111 Mo. 216.

Rents accruing prior to the testator's death belonged to the administrator, and those accruing after such death passed to the heirs, unless the probate court directed the administrator to take possession, but such an order of the probate court would not ratify the collection wrongfully made by the administrator previous to such order. Sealey v. Blake, 70 Mo. App. 229.

And Mo. Rev. Stat. § 129, providing that no ad-

158 Mass. 896), if that would make any difference when there has been no purchase on the faith of it; and therefore, apart from other reasons, the only ground on which the heirs can be preferred to the administratrices as the proper plaintiffs is that the covenant runs with the land, or, more accurately, runs with the estate of the covenantee, and that the heirs are ministrator or executor except an executor acting under a will shall rent or control the real estate of the deceased, unless the probate court shall be satisfied that it is necessary to rent said estate for the payment of debts, and make an order of record requiring such administrator or executor to take possession of and rent the same for a period not exceeding two years, did not have a retrospective effect, and was only intended to affect future rents. Bealey v. Blake, 70 Mo. App. 229.

Where a deed reserved to the grantor the use of the land or the rents and profits arising from it during his life and the life of his wife, the personal representative of the grantor was entitled to money for the use and occupation after the death of the grantor and before the death of his wife. It was said that the deed did not create the relation of landlord and tenant, as a rent strictly speaking must be certain, and here there was no reservation of anything certain. The entry of the defendant under the deed impliedly raised a promise to pay for the use and occupation, and that promise to the grantor was transmissible to his personal representative. Logan v. Caldwell, 23 Mo. 373.

New Hampshire.

Where the estate is solvent the heirs are entitled to the rents, and also in cases of insolvent estates, unless proper proceedings are taken by the administrator under the statute.

So, where an estate was solvent the administrator was accountable to the heirs, and not to the judge of probate, for the rents and profits. Lucy v. Lucy, 55 N. H. 9.

And where an intestate was solvent and his real estate vested in heirs at law, the administratrix improperly charged herself with the income arising after the intestate's death. Perkins v. Perkins, 58 N. H. 406.

In Lucy v. Lucy, 55 N. H. 9, it was said: "It is well settled that in this state real estate of the intestate, immediately upon his death, vests in the heirs, subject to be divested by proper proceedings for the payment of the intestate's debts. If the estate is insolvent and settled in the insolvent course it is the duty of the administrator to take possession of it, take care of it, and take the rents and profits. But the mere fact that the estate is settled in the insolvent course does not authorize the administrator to have possession of the real estate."

In Gregg v. Currier, 36 N. H. 200, it was said that under N. H. Rev. Stat. chap. 159, § 10, authorizing and requiring executors and administrators to receive the rents and profits of the real estate in case the estate is insolvent, and to account for the net proceeds thereof in his administration account, generally the land in other cases descends to the devisees or heirs with no right or duty on the part of the executor or administrator as such in any way to intermeddle therewith.

In Plumer v. Plumer, 80 N. H. 558, it was said that under N. H. Rev. Stat. chap. 159, § 10, Comp. Stat. 168, § 10, if the estate was actually insolvent no possession of the real estate could have been taken by the heirs, and the rents and profits would go to the administratrix.

In Bergin v. McFarland, 26 N. H. 533, it was said that by Stat. 5 Geo. II., Prov. Stat. of N. H. 1771, p. 233, lands in the colonies were subjected equally with the personal estate of the debtor to the payment of debts, and by statutes of Massachusetts and by these provinces (N. H. Prov. Stat. 1771, p. 90, 4 Geo. I.; Mass. Prov. Stat. 1742, p. 75, 8 Wm. III.) power was conferred upon executors and administrators to sell the real estate to pay debts if deemed necessary by the proper court, but until the estate was thus taken from them the heirs were entitled to enter upon the property and to take the profits to their own use, but that a change was made by N. H. Rev. Stat. 1829, chap. 159, § 10, providing that the administrator shall receive the rents and profits of the real estate in case the estate is insolvent, and shall account for the net proceeds in his administration account.

In Lane v. Thompson, 43 N. H. 320, it was said that "until the decree of insolvency, the heirs are to be considered as in the rightful possession of the premises. After the decree the administrator is entitled to the possession; his title commences at the date of the decree."

New Jersey.

Where the rent did not become due until three or four days after the intestate's death, it could not be recovered by the administrator, but belonged to the heir at law and could not be apportioned. Allen v. Van Houten, 19 N. J. L. 47.

Where a lease was made by J. B. and S., his wife, and the lessee covenanted to pay to J. B. and S., his wife, annual rent, and the said S. survived her husband and thereafter married J. Scott, who survived his wife, the rents which accrued under the lease after the decease of J. Scott did not belong to his representatives. Condit v. Neighbor, 13 N. J. L. 83.

In Search v. Search, 27 N. J. Eq. 137, it was said that it will be presumed until otherwise shown that rents taken possession of by the administrator were part of the assets and received rightfully in the due administration of the estate.

New Jersey Gen. Stat. 1895, § 20, p. 1208, provides that whereas by common law the executors or administrators of tenants in fee simple, tenants in fee tail, and tenants for term of life, of rent service, rent-charge, rent-sock and fee farms, have no remedy to recover such arrearages of the said rents or fee farms as were due unto their testators or intestates in their lives, nor may the heirs nor any person having the reversion distrain for such arrears, it is enacted that the executors or administrators of any such person unto whom rent is due and unpaid at the time of his death may have an action of debt for such arrearages, and may distrain for the same.

New York.

Under a statute accrued rent passes to the administrator. Rent payable in advance is held to be assets. Accruing rent belongs to the heirs. Apportionment of rent is provided for by statute.

Rents which accrued subsequent to the intestate's death by right went to the heirs, and the administrator would have nothing to do with them. Kohler v. Knapp, 1 Bradf. 241.

So rent belonged to the heirs where a testator died intestate as to realty and rents, and an administrator cum testamento annexo should not account in the surrogate's court for rents. It was further held that 3 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 5th ed. § 78 (71), p. 182, empowering the surrogate to distribute what shall remain of an estate in the hands of an administrator to and among creditors, legatees, widow, and next of kin, did not give him authority to add to the classes of persons whose interest he was to supervise on a final accounting, and to distribute to heirs. Levy's Estate, Tucker (N. Y.) 148.

Where the intestate made a contract with another to work his farm and to sell the milk at a cheese factory and divide the profits, it was said that if it was a lease and the relation of landlord and tenant was created, and the money which the intestate was to receive, rent, then the administrator was not entitled to the money, under N. Y.

successors to that estate. The covenant is collateral to the lease (Virden v. Ellsworth, 15 Ind. 144), and is not affected by Stat. 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 84; Harbeck v. Sylvester, 13 Wend.

608. See Jones v. Parker, 163 Mass. 564, 568.

In Allen v. Culver, 3 Denio, 284, 301, a similar covenant was held by the supreme court of New York to pass to assigns, but the Rev. Stat. chap. 6, title 3, art. 1, §§ 6, 7, providing that rents reserved to the deceased which had accrued at the time of his death are assets, and if not accrued belong to the heirs. But it was held not to be a lease. Re Strickland, 10 Misc. 486.

In Griffith v. Beecher, 10 Barb. 432, where the decedent had a title bond to land on which there was some money due, and the administrator collected the rents for two years and sold the interest of the decedent in the contract, and used part of the money for paying the debts, it was held that the interest in the contract, which was about $1,400 over and above the money due upon it, was real estate and descended to the heirs. It was said: "Again, the statute (2 Rev. Stat. 82, § 6) points out explicitly what are assets, and land contracts are not enumerated; while § 8 declares that the right of the heir to any property not enumerated in the 6th section shall not be impaired by the general terms of the section."

An administrator had no authority to make an agreement as to rents with a party who married the widow, that in consideration of the administrator paying him $250 a year for boarding his wife's children he would release all claim to the rent of the real estate of the intestate which he had in right of his wife, so long as the agreement in respect to board should be executed. It was held that the administrator was deemed to have acted in his personal right, and that the children could not require the administrator to account for rents under that agreement. Hillman v. Stephens, 16 N. Y. 278.

Accrued rents should go to the administrator, and rents payable in advance, which were due or had accrued, under N. Y. Rev. Stat. (3 Banks, 7th ed. 2296), title 3, chap. 6, pt. 2, § 6, providing that there shall be included among the property of a decedent's estate which shall be assets and pass as such to his executors and administrators as part of the personality, rents reserved to the deceased which had accrued at the time of his death. Miller v. Crawford, 26 Abb. N. C. 376.

In Miller v. Crawford, 26 Abb. N. C. 376, it was said it would seem that the common-law rule still prevailed as to rents which were not payable in advance, and which did not become due until after the intestate's death, but which were partly earned before his death, if N. Y. Acts, chap. 542, § 1, providing that all rents reserved on any lease granted after the passing of this act shall be apportioned so that on the death of any person interested in such rents or in the estate or fund from which the same shall issue or be derived, or on the determination by any other means whatever of the interest of any such person, he or she and his executors, administrators, or assigns shall be entitled to a proportion of such rents, according to the time which shall have elapsed from the commencement or last period of payment thereof respectively (as the case may be), including the day of the death of such person, did not apply.

On the death of the landlord and severance of the reversion by act of law, by descent to his sister and nieces, it became necessary to apportion the rent, and the heirs could separately bring an action for their several proportions. Cole v. Patterson, 25 Wend. 456.

New York Code Civ. Proc. § 2712, amended 1893, provides that the following shall be deemed assets and go to executors or administrators to be applied and distributed as part of the personal property of the testator or intestate and be included in the inventory: Leases for years; rents reserved to the deceased which had accrued at the time of his death. The right of an heir to any property not enumerated in this section which by the common law would descend to him is not impaired by the general terms of this section.

New York Code Civ. Proc. § 2720, amended in 1893, provides that all rents reserved on any lease made after June 7, 1875, shall be apportioned so that on the death of any person interested in such rents or in the estate in respect to which the same issues, or on the determination of the interest of any such person, he or his executors, administrators or assigns shall be entitled to a proportion of such rents according to the time which shall have elapsed from the commencement or last period of payment thereof as the case may be, including the day of the death of such person or of the determination of his interest.

North Carolina.

The heirs, and not the administrator, are entitled to accruing rents. But the creditors are entitled to the rents as against the heirs. The administrator is entitled to accrued rents.

The administrator could not enter upon and make leases of land which have descended, under N. C. Code, § 1413, directing the personal representative to make his rentings of real property by auction, as this referred only to leasehold estates in land which an intestate might own. Reeves v. McMillan, 101 N. C. 479.

And a collector appointed to take charge of an estate had no power to enter upon and make leases of land which descended to the heirs-at-law, under N. C. Battle's Rev. chap. 45, § 11, providing for the appointment of a collector, and § 13, giving the collector power to take possession and receive rents and profits of real property, and § 37, providing that renting of real property by public auction shall be secured by bond, and § 38, providing for the time when sales or rentings shall be made. It was said that this statute was intended to apply where the lessee for years died intestate leaving the term unexpired, or if a collector was appointed pending a contest as to who should be administrator cum testamento annexo or executor under a will which directed renting, but that the statute did not confer upon a collector a greater power than that possessed by an administrator. Lee v. Lee, 74 N. C. 70.

Where an administrator took possession of the land and collected the rent for eleven years, he was liable for the same in an action by the heirs, and he was held to be an agent of the heirs to collect their rent in order that he might apply them to the payment of debts of his intestate in exoneration of their land, and that having failed to apply this fund he should pay it to whom it belonged. It was further held that the statute of limitation did not bar this action because the statute did not run until demand and refusal, and the action was brought within three years after he gave up possession. Shuffler v. Turner, 111 N. C. 297.

So, where the purchaser under a title bond died, and the heirs afterwards recovered the property, the administrator was entitled to the rents which accrued in the lifetime of the purchaser, and the heirs were entitled to the rent for the term between their father's death and the surrendering of the premises to them. Fleming v. Chunn, 57 N. C. (4 Jones, Eq.) 422.

The creditors of the ancestor were entitled to all the rents and profits received by the heir since the descent cast. It was said that if the heir be an infant and the guardian in ignorance of the insolvency of an estate has expended the rents and profits or a part of them in his maintenance, only the point was decided without discussion on the supposed analogy of Pakenham's Case (a covenant on the part of a convent that the convent should sing every week in a chapel in the plaintiff's manor), Y. B. 42 Edw. III. p. 8, pl. 14. The reference to this case showed that the court did not have in mind the distinction pointed out by Lord Coke [Chudleigh's Case] part remaining unexpended would be liable to the creditors. Moore v. Shields, 68 N. C. 327.

So, in Hinton v. Whitehurst, 71 N. C. 66, it was said that a creditor was entitled to rents and profits actually received by the heirs from the lands descended.

And on a creditor's bill in equity it was held that rents and profits derived from lands by heirs could be applied to the payment of the decedent's debts. Washington v. Sasser, 41 N. C. (6 Ired. Eq.) 336.

In Moore v. Shields, 68 N. C. 327, it was said that previous to the decision in Washington v. Sasser, 41 N. C. (6 Ired. Eq.) 336, it was the general opinion of the profession, founded on Harrison v. Wood, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 437, that the heir might hold against the creditors of his ancestors all the profits of the land which accrued from the time of the decedent up to a sale under process at law or to a decree in equity. The reverse of this is established now by Washington v. Sasser.

In Harrison v. Wood, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 437, it was said that "a creditor cannot enter upon the lands of a deceased debtor, and keep out the heir upon any principle recognized by this court, more than he can by any rule of law. The heir is, at law, entitled to the issue and profits and also to the lands until a judgment against him, and a sale under it; and likewise in equity, until his liability has been ascertained by a decree." The late cases deny this doctrine and give the creditors the rents.

The rents of land during the years in which the administrator of a guardian had it in charge were assets for which he was accountable. It was said that when rents were collected by the guardian of an infant heir or devisee and spent in his maintenance they were not recoverable by the representative, but when he possessed himself of them they constituted a part of the estate and were liable to the claims of creditors of the deceased. Jennings v. Copeland, 90 N. C. 572.

Ohio.

The heirs, and not the administrator, are entitled to accruing rents, and the creditors have no claim on the rents until after a sale. It seems that where the administrator collects rents that he may be required to account for the same. He will be allowed for necessary disbursements.

The heir is entitled, as against the administrator, to the rents and profits of the land during the continuance of the possession by the heir until the actual sale of the land by the administrator for the payment of the debts of his intestate, and the filing of the petition by the administrator to sell land before the rents commenced accruing, or the order of sale after they began to accrue, or the declaring of the estate probably insolvent by the proper court, had the effect of enlarging the rights of the administrator in reference to the accruing rents. Overturf v. Dugan, 29 Ohio St. 230. In this case the court said: "The heirs were still legally in possession as owners of the land, and entitled to the rents; and, as has been said, the lien in favor of the creditors was upon the land itself, and not upon the rents accruing during the time intervening between the death of the intestate and the sale by the administrator. Rents thus accruing are not, and cannot be said to be, assets belonging to the administrator of the intestate's estate, for they were not in existence at his death, and the creditors of the intestate cannot claim them for the payment of his debts, for they never belonged to him."

An administrator was not authorized to go into a court of equity to compel the heirs to give up rents that they had collected that belonged to them, under Swan & C. (Ohio) Stats. 567, 572, §§ 3, 29, providing that an administrator may be ordered by the court to include in the inventory and appraisal the real estate, and Swan & C. Stats. 576, 587, §§ 57, 113, requiring the administrator to account for after-acquired assets. Overturf v. Dugan, 29 Ohio St. 230.

In Conger v. Atwood, 28 Ohio St. 134, 22 Am. Rep. 462, it was said that an administrator who without authority collected rents of his intestate's estate and used them as assets in paying the debts was liable therefor to the party entitled to the rents, and an action for their recovery could be maintained against him in his representative capacity.

And rents collected by the administrator and used to pay debts, the heirs not excepting to the items, may be treated by the court as assets, and a correct accounting of them compelled. Campbell v. McCormick, 1 Ohio C. C. 504.

And if administrators were permitted to collect rents they were entitled to a credit for paying taxes, repairs, a necessary survey, and gathering crops, as these are debts of the estate. Turpin's Estate, Goebbl, 124.

And where an administrator, through a family arrangement and by advice of friends of an infant heir, received the rents and applied them to the payment of debts instead of selling the infant's land, and the arrangement would have been beneficial to the heir if he had lived, his administrator could not recover such rents from the administrator of his ancestor, although by this arrangement it worked a loss to the infant's mother and a gain to his uncles, where the mother did not object. White v. Turpin, 16 Ohio St. 270.

An administrator's action for rent on a parol lease made by him was not demurrable. The court said that as there were several cases in which the administrator is entitled to the possession of land the action is possible, and he need not set up the exceptional matter. Bowler v. Erhard, 1 Clev. 173. Pennsylvania.

The heirs, and not the administrator, are entitled to accruing rents, and if the rent matures after the decedent's death it will go to the heirs. The administrator is entitled to accrued rents. If the administrator collects accruing rent he is liable as trustee to the heirs.

So, where a party in possession took a lease from the administrator after the death of the landlord, the lease was void and the payment of the rent was no defense to an action by the guardian of the heirs for the recovery of rent. Haslage v. Krugh, 25 Pa. 97.

So, an administrator had no right to demand and recover from the heirs of the intestate the rents, issues, and profits of the real estate descending to them from their ancestors, which accrued and was received by them since his death for the purpose of paying the debts of the deceased or reimbursing himself moneys which he paid out of his own funds in discharge of the same. Adams v. Adams, 4 Watts, 160.

And the heir was entitled to the lands of the estate and the administrator could not by virtue of his office occupy or lease them, and the rents and profits maturing from them after the death of the owner belonged to the heir, and the administrator was not authorized to receive them. The court said that the powers and duties of an administrator with reference to the rent were limited to an application for an order of sale and the proper execution of that order when it was obtained. Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584.

In Young's Estate, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 44, it was said:

(1 Coke, 120a, 122b), and discussed in Norcross v. James, 140 Mass. 188, between those covenants which create, or follow the analogy of, easements, and go with the land even to disseisors, and those pure contracts, like covenants for title, upon which no one can sue except parties and privies. Pakenham's Case was of the former class. The argument for the plain-

"Nor has an administrator any such authority. It is no part of their duty to intermeddle with the real estate until necessary for the payment of debts or legacies under an order of the court or authority contained in the will, and for the reason that the lands are vested in the devisees or heirs, and they being the owners, are entitled to the rents, and the same cannot be applied to the payment of debts without their consent. An executor or administrator who assumes charge and control of the real estate is liable to account to the devisees or heirs as a trustee or agent, not in the orphans' court, but in another forum. Landis v. Scott, 32 Pa. 486; Myers's Estate, 9 Phila. 310; Haslage v. Krugh, 26 Pa. 97; Fross's Appeal, 105 Pa. 258; Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584.

In Urban's Estate, 17 Phila. 429, it was said that an heir of the decedent who was in possession of the land sold was not liable for rent or for use and occupation, but was bound to pay taxes accruing during his ownership and interest on fixed encumbrances.

In Bank of Pennsylvania v. Wise, 3 Watts, 399, it was said that if the person entitled to receive rent outlived the day on which it became due, and then died, it belonged to his executor or administrator as a part of his personal estate, but if he died on the day preceding the day of payment, the rent belonged to the heir as incident to the reversion and as a part of the real estate.

And a mortgagee had no claim upon rents collected by an administrator as they were not assets in his hands to pay debts. It was said that an administrator who collected rents from the real estate of a decedent was only the trustee for the widow and heirs. Robb's Appeal, 41 Pa. 45.

An administratrix assuming the charge of real estate was answerable for the exercise of due diligence in collecting rent for the heirs, and where such was exercised she would not be chargeable with what she was unable to collect. Burns v. Cox, 10 Phila. 8.

Where an administrator collected rents and profits of property which had been leased by the intestate in his lifetime the money belonged to the heirs. M'Coy v. Scott, 2 Rawle, 222, 19 Am. Dec. 640.

But an administrator was not properly chargeable with the rents of real estate as they constituted no part of his account. It was further held that the administrator in taking charge of realty and in receiving the rents and income was merely the agent for the heirs, and it was of no importance that he assumed to transact the business in his capacity as an administrator, as he was in fact but an agent. Fross's Appeal, 105 Pa. 258.

And where an administrator mined ore on the estate, he could not be charged in his accounts with the same, as the ore was the product of lands, and rents and profits of real estate were not assets for the payment of debts, and the administrator could not be charged them. It was held that ore received under the terms of the lease was in the nature of rent, and belonged to the heirs, and for it the administrator would be accountable to them. Merkel's Estate, 131 Pa. 584.

And the sureties on an administrator's bond given for the sale of real estate could not be held liable on an account settled by the administrator in which he charged himself with the amount of the inventory, the proceeds of real estate, and the rents and profits, but did not show any specific appropriation of any part of the assets to any particular debts. The securities in this case were only bound to account for and pay over the proceeds of real estate. Com. v. Hilgert, 55 Pa. 236.

Rhode Island.

The heirs are entitled to the accruing rents and in case of a sale to pay debts are entitled to the rents until the estate is sold. If the administrator is allowed by the heirs to collect the rents, he is not amenable to the probate court.

The heirs were entitled to take the rents until the estate was sold to pay debts, under R. I. Gen. Stat. chap. 176, § 10, providing that no person shall have a right to demand his share of the deceased's personal estate within three years unless he give bond, to refund his proportion of the share of said estate if debts appear, providing that the heirs at law or devisees may during said term take the rents and profits of said real estate as heretofore. Draper v. Barnes, 12 R. I. 156.

But an administrator was not accountable to the probate court for rents received, where an administrator with the will annexed did not have power over the realty given to an executor by the will, but exercised those powers with the assent of the cestui que trust. Belcher v. Branch, 11 R. I. 226.

South Carolina.

The heirs are entitled to accruing rent. The administrator is liable as trustee for accruing rent collected by him, but the sureties on his bond are not liable. An administrator was allowed to recover rent in a suit to set aside a deed obtained by fraud from the intestate. The administrator is entitled to accrued rents, but cannot distrain.

The rents and profits which accrued after the lifetime of the intestate accompanied the inheritance. Kirkpatrick v. Atkinson, 11 Rich. Eq. 27.

And where an intestate had contracted for a tract of land with an unexpired ferry charter annexed, and after his death the ferry was rechartered in the name of his wife who was his administratrix, she was held accountable by Harper, Ch., for the rents and profits. Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1.

So, where an administrator collected rents from lands of his intestate he was held liable for the rents although it was held that the sureties might not be. It was said that "the statute of 12 Geo. II., chap. 5 [5 Geo. II., chap. 7 (7)] 2 S. C. Stat. 570, making real estate equally liable with personality, for debts, has produced a very common interference of administrators with the renting of land; and it would be mischievous to hold that where they do interfere, they can take the rents to themselves, without responsibility." Jewell v. Jewell, 11 Rich. Eq. 296.

But the sureties of an administrator were not liable to the heirs for rent of land belonging to an estate of which their principal was the administrator, as the duties of an administrator related only to the personal estate. It was said that sometimes in this state the administrator hires out the negroes and rents the land, and then the land rent is received by him in money, but how far his securities would be responsible for the money thus received would not be decided, as it was not involved in this case. It appears that the rent in this case was received by the party who was guardian as well as administrator. Allen v. Bruton, 1 McMull. L. 249.

As to whether an administrator was to be charged for rent of land and hire of slaves instead of keeping the slaves upon the land and accounting for crops, it was said by Harper, Ch.: "It has often been decided that an executor may keep slaves employed upon the land, and I know of no decision or suggestion to the contrary. In some cases when the executor has failed to return an account of crops he has been charged as for rent and hire, but never when he has accounted, and I think executors or administrators are to be encouraged by this tiff in that case of most weight in the mind of the court was that the plaintiff was tenant of the land, and that the service claimed was a thing annexed to the land, being of a kind that could be created by prescription, or, as it was stated by Fitzherbert, everyone who has the land shall have the covenant. Fitzherbert, Abr. Covenant, pl. 17. Those who are course, and very indulgently considered when they adopt it." Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1.

In an avowry by an administratrix for rent in arrears which set forth the demise under which the tenant held, made in her own name as administratrix after the intestate's death, it was held that no further title need be shown. It was said that stat. 11 Geo. II., chap. 19, § 22 (2 S. C. Stat. 579), providing that an avowant in replevin is not bound to state anything more in his avowry than the lease or demise under which the tenant held, has not been expressly made of force in this state, but its provisions have been so uniformly observed that it might be said to be a part of the law of the land. Moorhead v. Barrett, Cheves, L. 99.

Where an administrator obtained a decree setting aside for fraud deeds made by his intestate of real estate and slaves, in which the grantor reserved to himself the use for life, the grantee was required to account with the administrator for the rent of the land and the hire of the slaves from the date of the deeds, where the grantee had obtained control over the property during the grantor's life. Kirkpatrick v. Atkinson, 4 S. C. N. S. 126.

The rents and profits which accrued during the lifetime of the intestate belonged to his personal representative, and not to his heirs. Kirkpatrick v. Atkinson, 11 Rich. Eq. 27.

An administrator could not distrain for rent due at the death of the intestate. It was said that at common law neither the heirs, executors, nor administrators of a man entitled to rents had any remedy for arrearages incurred in the lifetime of the owner of such rent, and Stat. 32 Hen. VIII., chap. 37, providing that the executors and administrators might distrain for rents due their testator or intestate, at the time of the death upon the land charged with rent, and a latter Statute of Wm. IV., extending this right of the representatives of a deceased landlord, were not in force in this state. Bagwell v. Jamison, Cheves, L. 249.

Tennessee.

The heir is entitled to the accruing rent, and the creditors have no lien on the rents. Where rent is partly accrued there should be an apportionment between the heir and personal representative.

After the death of the ancestor the estate descended to the heir, and the accruing rents belong to the heir discharged of any liability for the debts of the ancestor. Boyd v. Martin, 9 Helak. 382.

And the creditor had no right against the heir to the rents and profits of the estate, as the creditor had no lien on the rents, under Tenn. act 1874, chap. 11, providing that execution shall issue against the real estate of the deceased debtor in the hands of the heir against whom judgment shall have been given. Combs v. Young, 4 Yerg. 218, 26 Am. Dec. 225.

And a creditor has no lien on rents. Smith v. Thomas, 14 Lea, 324.

In Smith v. Thomas, 14 Lea, 324, it was said that under T. & S. Code, 2256, §§ 1764, 1765, making real estate (unless specially exempt) an asset for the payment of debts of a decedent, the title subject to this liability goes directly to the heir or to the devisee where there is a will. The court said that "it has always been held in this state that while the heir or devisee is owner, and is entitled to the rents and profits, he is so far owner that if he bona fide alien the land, the bona fide purchaser gets a good title, and the creditor's remedy is against the heir or devisee, who is answerable for the ancestor's debts to the value of the land aliened."

The heir was entitled to accruing rents where a sole heir sued in trespass for the eviction of her mother who had died, and for rents. It was held that as to the portions of the rent which were due and payable before the death of her mother the plaintiff could not sue; but a suit for such portion of the rent should have been in the name of the personal representative, and not of the heir. Rowan v. Riley, 6 Baxt. 67.

Texas.

In Texas by statute the administrator is authorized to rent out the property, but he is personally responsible for the reasonable value of the hire or the rent of such property unless he obtains an order of court.

In an action by an administrator de bonis non against his predecessor on his bond for a devastavit, it was held that where the administrator rented the property without the authority of the probate court he became responsible to the estate for the reasonable value of the rent, under Tex. Rev. Stat. art. 2063, providing that when an executor or administrator hires or rents property belonging to an estate without an order of the court authorizing him to do so, he shall be held responsible for the reasonable value of the hire or rent of such property. Oglesby v. Forman, 77 Tex. 647.

In Reinstein v. Smith, 65 Tex. 247, it was said that Tex. Rev. Stat. § 1931, providing that if the real estate be not required to be at once sold for the payment of debts, it shall be the duty of the executor or administrator to carry on the plantation, manufactory, or business, or cause the same to be done, or to rent the same, as shall appear to him to be most for the interest of the estate, and providing that he shall not extend the time of renting any of the property beyond what may consist with the speedy settlement of the estate; and § 1932, providing that any person interested upon complaint in writing and notice upon good cause being shown, may obtain an order of the court controlling the action of such executor or administrator, — confer upon executors and administrators extreme power, and make it the duty of such persons to carry on the plantation, unless in the exercise of a sound discretion they deem it improper to do so.

Virginia.

It seems that by a statute the heir is entitled to accruing rents, and the administrator is entitled to rents that were due at the time of the death of the landlord. A creditor has no lien as against the heirs for rent.

Va. Code 1887, § 2788 (Code 1849, chap. 138), provides that "he to whom rent or compensation is due, whether he have the reversion or not, his personal representative or assignee may recover it as provided in the preceding section [remedy by distress or action], and when the owner of real estate in fee, or holder of a term, yielding him rent, dies, the rent thereafter due shall be recoverable by such owner's heir or devisee, or such term holder's personal representative."

Upon a bill against an heir at law to subject real estate to a debt of the ancestor, the heir at law was not accountable for rents and profits of the real estate that accrued before the decree. Blow v. Maynard, 2 Leigh, 20.

Where an administrator failed to render any account of rents and profits, made by him in the occupation of an estate, evidence of the net annual income was competent to ascertain the amount for which he was chargeable. Wills v. Dunn, 5 Gratt. 264.

Wisconsin.

Under a statute of this state the administrator is entitled to the possession of the real estate, pro-curious to verify the fact assumed in Pakenham's Case, that such services from a stationary ecclesiastical corporation might be due by prescription, may consult Y. B. 22 Hen. VI. p. 46, vided he asserts his rights and the same are needed to pay debts.

The administrator was entitled to the rents of the real estate until the estate was settled or turned over to the heirs by order of the county court, under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 100, § 7, providing that the executor or administrator shall have a right to the possession of all the real estate of the deceased, and may receive the rents, issues, and profits of the same until the estate shall have been settled or delivered by the order of the county court to the heirs or devisees. Edwards v. Evans, 16 Wis. 182.

And under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 2823 (3823), same as Rev. Stat. chap. 100, § 7, the administrator was entitled to the possession of rents as against a mortgagee, where the mortgagee had not begun any proper proceeding for foreclosure, and to have the rents applied upon his mortgage. Crow v. Day, 69 Wis. 637.

But under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 100, § 7, authorizing the administrator to take possession of the real estate and rents and profits, the heir was entitled to the possession of real estate unless the administrator asserted his rights. Jones v. Billstein, 28 Wis. 221.

And under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 100, § 7, the administrator had no right to the possession of real estate and rents where there were no debts due from the estate, and no claims against the estate, and no personal property belonging to it, and nothing to administer. Flood v. Pilgrim, 32 Wis. 376.

An administrator was not entitled to recover from the widow for the use and occupation of the land, where the administrator had not taken possession and it was not shown that the rent was needed in the settlement of the estate, or that the occupant was the tenant of the plaintiff, under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 102, § 7, providing that the administrator shall be accountable for the income of the real estate while it shall remain in his possession, and if he shall use or occupy any part of it he shall account for it as may be agreed upon or adjudged by the county court. Filbey v. Carrier, 45 Wis. 460.

II. English cases.

a. Form of lease.

It appears that where rent is reserved generally it will go to the heir, where the lessor was possessed of a freehold interest. So, where the rent is reserved during the term it will go to the heir; but if the lessor had a chattel interest only it will go to his personal representative, and the reservation to the lessor or to the lessor and assigns will cease at the death of the lessor.

If rent is reserved generally during the term without saying to whom, it will belong to the owner of the reversion after the lessor's death, to his heirs if he be seised in fee, and to his executor or administrator if he have a chattel interest only. Kingsmill, J., 21 Hen. 25, pl. 2.

So, in 1 Dyer, 45d, it was agreed by Shelley & Coningsby that if a man make a lease for years rendering certain rent without saying to the lessor or to his heirs, yet the lessor and his heirs shall have this rent because it is reserved as long as the estate shall continue.

"If a man make a lease reserving rent to the lessor, if he say no more, the rent shall go but to the lessor; but if it be reserved generally, and do not say to whom, it shall go as well to the heir of the lessor, as to the lessor himself." Per Gawdy, Gouldesborough, 148.

pl. 36; Id. 21 Hen. VII. p. 5, pl. 2; William's Case, 5 Coke, 72b, 73a; Slipper v. Mason, Nelson's Lutwyche Rep. 43, 45 [47]; Rastell, Entries of Declarations, pl. 2b. See further Middlefield

In Whitlock's Case, 8 Coke, 70b, it was said that the most clear and sure way was to reserve rent yearly "during the term," and leave the law to make the distribution without any express reservation to any person.

So, where J. S. leased lands to the defendant for twenty-five years rendering and paying for each year during said term to J. S. and his assigns so much rent, and J. S. transferred the lands by fine to the plaintiff who brought suit for rent in arrear, and the declaration did not allege that the lessor was alive, and it was objected that by the lessor's death the rent was gone, the plaintiff recovered. Whitlock, J., said: "In this case the reservation is rendering rent annually during the term; it is plain that the contract is that the rent shall continue during the term; and the intention was not that it should continue only for life. But if the reservation had been to the lessor only, it would be otherwise. Here it is reserved to the lessor and his assigns. 14 Hen. VI. 26, is an express authority that the heir shall have the rent." And Jones, J., said: "A number of various discordant adjudications, on this point, are to be found in the books; and the line betwixt express and implied reservations is not yet precisely drawn. The first case is 11 Edw. III. Ass. 6, 10 Edw. IV. 18, per Littleton. If I lease land for years, rendering rent to me, without mentioning my heirs, still they shall have it; for it is annexed to the reversion. Mayle denies this, 27 Hen. VIII. 19, per Audley. If rent be reserved on a lease for years to the lessor, without saying during the term, or to the heirs; they shall not have it; for the reservation is the source of the rent; and it may be reserved determinable for life. 1 Dyer, 45, is like this. But there is a very narrow distinction, viz., where rent is reserved generally, it shall go to the heir; but when it is to the lessor, the heir shall not have it. Yet this is only when the words 'during the term' are omitted." Sury v. Brown, Latch, 99.

And where the rent was reserved to the lessor, his heirs and assigns, the heir, and not the executor, was entitled to the rents after the death of lessor and such rents were not assets. 3 Dyer, 362, pl. 15.

And where a tenant in special tail leased for years reserving the rent to himself, his heirs and assigns, and the lessor died, and the estate descended to a person who was not an heir at law to the lessor, it was held that the rent should go with the reversion to the special heir in tail though it was reserved to the heirs generally, for the word "heir" should be taken in that sense which would best answer the nature of the contract, which was that those who would have succeeded to the estate if the lease had not been made should enjoy the rent. Cother v. Merrick, Hardres, 89.

Where Cleaved premises to the defendant reserving rent to herself, her executors, administrators and assigns, and C afterwards by lease and release conveyed the reversion to D and another, in trust for the wife of the defendant, the deed containing a power to the trustees to receive and retain their trust expenses and the defendant underlet the premises, and the trustees assented to his receiving rent in behalf of his wife, and D, the surviving trustee, died, his widow and administratrix was entitled to recover the arrears of rent accruing in the lifetime of the trustee. Dollen v. Batt, 4 C. B. N. S. 760.

Where a tenant for three lives to him and his heirs assigns over his whole estate in the premises by lease and release to J. S. and his heirs, reserving a rent to the assignor, his executors, administrators and assigns, with proviso that upon nonpay-

v. Church Mills Knitting Co. 160 Mass. 267.

The case at bar, on the other hand, is more analogous to the covenants for title; for, although rent savors of the realty, any warranty of insurance of rent is a purely personal contract, of which another than the original contractee can avail himself only on principles ment the assignor and his heirs may re-enter, and the assignee covenants to pay the rent to A, the assignor, his executors and administrators, and the assignor died, his executors, and not his heir, are entitled to the rent. Jenlson v. Lord Lexington, 1 P. Wms. 555.

But where a termor S possessed of a lease for a hundred years, by indenture between him and his wife of the one part not signed by the wife, and T on the other part, assigned all their estate in the lease to T reddendo et solvendo, to him and his wife duranté termino prædicto to them and the survivor of them if they shall live so long, with a proviso on nonpayment of the rent to him or his wife, or the survivor, that S and his wife and the survivor and their assigns, and the assigns of the survivor, may re-enter, and the husband died and the wife demanded the rent, and the administrator of the husband also demanded the rent, it was held that the reservation of rent was void as to the wife because she omitted to execute the deed, and that the rent will continue no longer than the life of the husband. Richardson, Jones, and Croke said "that although the reddendo et solvendo durante termino, if there had been no more said, had been a reservation during the term, yet when he doth not rest upon the exposition of the law, but it is 'rendering to him and his wife, and the survivor of them, if they live so long,' that is an express reservation that it shall not be during all the term, but to him and his wife and the survivor of them; and the reservation to his wife is void, because she is no party in interest or to the deed," and the rent endures no longer than during the life of the husband. Bland v. Inman, Cro. Car. 288.

In Sacheverel v. Frogate, Vent. 161, 2 Wms. Saund. 367, Ray. 213, 2 Lev. 13, it was said by Hale, Ch. J., that "if tenant in fee makes a lease, and reserves the rent to him and his executors, the rent cannot go to them, for there is no testamentary estate. On the other side, if lessee for a hundred years should make a lease for forty years, reserving rent to him and his heirs, that would be void to the heir."

In this case, Hale, Chief Justice, said: "'Tis true, if the lessor reserves the rent to himself 'tis held, it will neither go to the heir or executor. But in 27 Hen. VIII. 19, where the reservation is to him and his assigns, it is said that it will go to the heir."

In Sacheverel v. Frogate, Vent. 161, 2 Wms. Saund. 367, Ray. 213, 2 Lev. 13, it was said: "In Wotton & Edwin's Case, 5 Jac. the words of reservation were yielding and paying to the lessor and his assigns. And resolved, that the rent determined upon his death. In that case there wanted the effectual and operative clause 'during the term.'"

In Sacheverel v. Frogate, Vent. 161, 2 Wms. Saund. 367, Ray. 213, 2 Lev. 13, it was said that in 12 Edw. III. Fitz. Assize, 86, the case was a man seised of 2 acres let one reserving rent to him, and let the other reserving rent to him and his heirs, and resolved that the first reservation should determine with his life, for the antithesis in the reservation makes a strong implication that he intended so.

b. Apportionment.

It seems that the heirs, and not the personal representative, are entitled to the rent where the landlord holding the fee dies before midnight on the day rent is due. So, if the tenant in tail dies before midnight on the day that rent is due the heirs shall have the rent. In such a case if a tenant for life make a lease under a power, the personal representative will not be entitled to the rent. But if the tenant for life with power to lease makes a lease not in accordance with the power, the personal representative is entitled to an apportionment, and the rent shall cease at the death of the tenant for life.

The English statutes now provide for an apportionment.

By Stat. 33 & 34 Vict. chap. 35 (enumerating the evils arising under 11 Geo. II. chap. 19, 4 & 5 Wm. IV. chap. 22, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. chap. 71, 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 23, 23 & 24 Vict. chap. 154), provides, § 2, that all rents shall be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly; section 3, the apportioned part of any such rent shall be recoverable in the case of a continuing rent, where the entire portion of which such apportioned part shall form part shall become due and payable and not before, and in the case of rent determined by re-entry, death, or otherwise, when the next entire portion of the same would have been payable if the same had not so determined and not before; section 4, all persons and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and also the executors, administrators, and assigns of all persons whose interests determine with their own death, shall have the same remedy for recovering such apportioned part as they would have had for recovering such entire portions if entitled thereto, provided that persons liable to pay rent shall not be resorted to for any such apportioned part forming part of an entire or continuing rent; but the entire rent including such apportioned part shall be recovered by the heir or other person, who if the rent had not been apportioned would have been entitled to such entire rent and such apportioned part shall be recovered from such heir or other person by the executors or other parties entitled under this act to the same.

11 Geo. II. chap. 19, provided that after the 24th of June, 1738, where any tenant for life shall happen to die before or on the day on which any rent was reserved upon any demise or lease of any land which determined on the death of such tenant for life, that the personal representative of such tenant for life may in an action on the case recover from the under tenant on the day on which the same was made payable, the whole, or if before such day then a proportion of such rent according to the time such tenant for life lived of the last year or a quarter of a year, or other time in which the said rent was growing due as aforesaid, making a just allowance or a proportionable part thereof respectively.

Where a tenant for life made a lease for fifty years if she live so long rendering annually during the term £200 quarterly, at Michaelmas, Christmas, Annunciation, and Midsummer by equal portions, or within thirteen weeks after every of said feasts, and died after Michaelmas and within the thirteen weeks, and for the rent due at Michaelmas before her death the action was brought, it was held by Fleming and Williams, that this rent was not due. "Nothing is due until the end of the thirteen weeks, but there is only an election given to the lessee to pay it at the feasts, if he will, but until the end of the thirteen weeks he cannot demand it by distress or action of debt, and therefore is not any duty, and if the ancestor make such a lease, and die after Michaelmas, before the end of the thirteen weeks, this rent shall go to the heir, and not to the executor." Croke J., to the contrary holding that the rent was due to the executor, and not to the heir. Clun v. Fisher, 9 Jac. 1, Cro. Jac. 300.

In Duppa v. Mayo, 1 Wms. Saund. 232, Hale said of contract. The true question is whether such a guaranty is wholly analogous to covenants for title. In the case of some of these, at least, assigns of the covenantee are treated as privy to the contract and can sue in their own names; and, when this is so heirs also can sue in their own names for breaches happening while they hold the estate of the covenan-

if a man seised in fee makes a lease for years rendering rent at the Feast of St. John the Baptist, upon condition of re-entry for nonpayment, now the lessor, if he will take advantage of the condition, must demand it at sunset; yet if he dies after sunset and before midnight his heir shall have this rent, and not his executors, which proves that the rent is not due until the last minute of the natural day.

In Rockingham v. Penrice, 1 P. Wms. 177, 2 Saik. 578, the tenant for life died before sunset on Michaelmas day, and it was held that the person in remainder was entitled to the rents that became due that day. One tenant had paid his rent to the tenant for life in the morning, and it was held that though this was a good payment to discharge the tenant, the executor should account for it to the party in remainder.

Where the tenant for life in accordance with a power granted several leases to different persons of different parts of the estate dated on Christmas, with rents reserved quarterly upon Lady day, Midsummer day, Michaelmas day, and Christmas day in every year, and at the time of his decease on the 29th of September at 9 o'clock at night there were two quarter's rent due from the several tenants, it was held "the last quarter rent from Michaelmas day to Christmas day goes without doubt to the defendant, W." (W. was the remainderman.) Norris v. Harrison, 2 Madd. 268.

Where a tenant for life made a lease for years reserving the rent at Lady day and Michaelmas by half-yearly payments, and died on Michaelmas day about 12 o'clock at noon, the rent belonged to the executor, and not to the remainderman. But it was held that as to rents made under a power of leasing they still existed and continued after the death of the lessor in the same manner as they had during his life, and the tenants had until the last instant of those days to pay the rents, and then when the lessor dies before, the rent goes along with the reversion to those who are entitled to it. Earl Strafford v. Lady Wentworth, Prec. in Ch. 556.

In Earl Strafford v. Lady Wentworth, Prec. in Ch. 556, it was said that in the case of Lady Cole, in King William's reign it was held that where the lessor or tenant for life died about 6 o'clock in the evening that the rent was become completely due and belonged to his executor, else he himself could not give a proper discharge for it until the last instant, which most certainly he may do at any time of the day whereon it is payable, and it was said that this did not contradict Baskerville v. Mayo, 1 Wms. Saund. 282. (Duppa v. Mayo.)

In Glover v. Archer, 4 Leon. 247, it was said that "the case was, tenant for life made a lease for twenty-one years, rendering rent at Michaelmas and the Annunciation, or within thirteen weeks of any of the said feasts; after Michaelmas and before the thirteen weeks past, the lessor died; and the plaintiff, his executor, brought debt for the rent; it was adjudged by Cooke and the other justices, that the action did not lie for the rent." The court said: "For the rent being to be paid at Michaelmas or within thirteen weeks after, the lessee hath election to pay it at any of the days, and before the last day it is not due, and when the lessor dieth before that day, his executors have not any right to the rent, but after the death of the lessor, having but an estate for life, the rent is gone. But if the lessor had a fee simple in the land, and had died before the last day, the heir should have had the rent, as incident to the reversion; but if the lessor had survived both days, the rent had been a thing vested in him, and his executors should have had it; but if the rent had been reserved at Michaelmas, and if it be behind by thirteen weeks, that then it should be lawful for the lessor to enter; if the lessor survive Michaelmas his executors shall have debt for the rent, for then the rent is due, and the thirteen weeks are but a dispensation of the entry of the lessor until that time, and in this case as well as where the rent is reserved at two days in the disjunctive it is sufficient that the rent be demanded at the latter day without demanding of it at the first day."

In Clun's Case, 10 Coke, 127a, where rent was upon lease for fifty years if the lessor should so long live, reserved payable at the four usual feasts or within thirteen weeks after, and after Lady day but within thirteen weeks the lessor died, the executor could not recover against the lessee for the rent due at Lady day.

In Barwick v. Foster, Cro. Jac. 227, Fleming, J., said: "If a lessee for life make a lease for years, rendering rent at Michaelmas and the Annunciation, or within ten days after every of the said feasts; if he die after Michaelmas before the ten days be expired, it was resolved that the rent was lost: for it was not due until the tenth day, and before that time he died. Also if a man reserve rent in such manner, and die after Michaelmas, and before the tenth day, this rent shall go to the heir, and not to the executor."

Where by a deed and fine a term of 500 years was created to the lessors of the plaintiff for securing an annuity of £500 a year and all arrears thereof payable to C. during his life, and after his death £200 per annum and all arrears payable to Lady C. for her life, and after the death of C. the arrears of rent due in his lifetime were paid and Lady C. survived him, and afterwards Lady C. died on Michaelmas day at 9 o'clock at night, being the first day of payment after C.'s death, and the plaintiff was her administrator, it was held that the money was due when by law it ought to have been paid, and since Lady C. lived beyond sunset, which was the time when the money was demandable, the money was due to her and her administrator was entitled to the same. Southern v. Bellasis, 1 P. Wms. 170, note.

Where a tenant for life with a power to lease made a parol demise from year to year payable half yearly, and died between the times of payment, it was held that the rent could be apportioned between her administrator and the reversioner. The court said before the statute 11 Geo. II. chap. 19, if the tenant for life died while the half year was incomplete the rent was lost, his representatives not being entitled to recover a part. Ex parte Smyth, 1 Swanst. 338.

Where H. V. was seised as tenant in tail male and died on the 17th of March an infant and intestate, and J. V. became tenant in tail, and one of the guardians of H. V. had let some leases of the estate of which he was tenant in tail, but other tenants who had no leases continued as tenants from year to year, and their rents were payable half yearly at Lady day and Michaelmas, and the demises expired on the day of the death of H. V., these rents having been paid into the hands of receivers, and the question was whether the administratrix of H. V. the deceased tenant in tail was entitled to the proportions of rents from Michaelmas to the 17th day of March the day of his death, or J. V., remainderman in tail, was entitled to the whole of the rents, it was held that they should be apportioned between the representative and the remainderman. Vernon v. Vernon, 2 Bro. Ch. 659.

But this right thus given to assigns only shortened up the old process by which, within certain limits, each purchaser looked in turn to his vendor to make good the warranty imported by a sale. It is a doctrine of tradition and history (Norcross v. James, 140 Mass. 189), cited the case of Whitfield v. Pindar, C. P. Hil. 1781, where the tenant in tail remainder to others in tail made a lease and died three days after the rent day, and it was ruled that there should be an apportionment, though the lease was void as to the remainderman. 4 Evans, Eng. stat. 177, n, says this is a decision of law upon the express effect of 11 Geo. II., chap. 19, and stands upon much better ground than the attempt in the cases before alluded to, to apply the principles of the statutes to cases assumed not to be within the operation of it.

Where A was seised of 1 acre in fee and possessed of another for twenty years, makes a lease of both for ten years reserving rent, and dies, the rent shall be apportioned with the reversion, and the heir and executor shall have each his portion. Dubitatur Pasc. 14 Jac. In Doe, Vaughan, v. Meyler, 2 Maule & S. 276, where a "lease of lands of which lessor was seised in fee, and other lands of which he was seised for life with a power of leasing, at one entire rent, and the lease not well executed according to the power,—held, that the lease was good after the death of lessor for the lands in fee, though not for the other lands, for the rent may be apportioned."

In Paget v. Gee, 1 Amb. 198, where a tenant in tail leased, but not according to the statute, and died without issue between the days of payment, and the remainderman received the whole rent, on a bill by executors of tenant in tail for an apportionment, it was held that under 11 Geo. II., chap. 19, § 15, on the death of the tenant in tail the land should be apportioned. Lord Hardwicke said before the statute the rent to the death of the tenant for life was lost, and the law would not suffer his representative to bring an action for use and occupation, much less could he if there was a lease, and the remainderman could not because the rent was not due in his time, so the rent was lost and real injustice arose; and the court held that a tenant in tail après possibility of issue extinct ought to be so construed as tenant for life within this statute.

But where a father was tenant for life remainder in tail to the son the plaintiff, and the father was indebted by several judgments, and his land extended by a judgment creditor who leased the same to the defendant rendering £100 per annum payable quarterly, and the father the tenant for life died in the middle of the half year, the rent could not be apportioned in equity, and as to the profits from the end of the last quarter to the death of the tenant for life, the tenant should pay nothing, but for the profits from the death of the tenant for life the tenant, the underlessee, was to account to the plaintiff. Jenner v. Morgan, 1 P. Wms. 392.

Where an administrator made an under lease of the intestate's term rendering rent to himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and died, his executor, and not the administrator de bonis non, was entitled to the rent. The court said that in this case where the executor of an administrator recovers the rent he shall be chargeable with it as assets in the nature of an executor de son tort, for the administrator having power to dispose of the term which he had in right of the intestate, this rent which is reserved to him and his executor is a continuing interest in them in the same right. Drue v. Baylie, Freeman. C. L. 402.

Where A was indebted to B for rent, and the landlord died, and the tenant A gave a note to C, the administrator of the landlord for the rent in arrears, and C died intestate, it was held that this note 40 L. R. A.

was an alteration of property, and the rent belonged to the administrator of C, and not to the administrator de bonis non of B. Barker v. Talbot, 1 Vern. 473.

In Doyle v. Maguire, Ir. L. R. 14 C. L. 24, it was held that an administrator de bonis non was entitled to the arrears of rent where his predecessor made a lease of premises forming a part of the intestate's estates for a term of twenty-one years, and the lease did not purport to be made in her representative capacity, and the lessee took possession but never paid rent.

Where a widow, an administratrix, had made an agreement with the children to divide the farm and other personal property, a lease made by her of land held by the intestate under a lease for a term of years then unexpired was set aside, where the lessee had notice of the contract with the family. Drohan v. Drohan, 1 Ball & B. 185.

This note is not intended to include cases of wills, although a few cases in a contest by an heir and an executor are included to show the law in such a case; and it is not intended to include the right of doweress to mesne profits or damages for detention of dower, which cases affect rents in certain cases, as this matter is covered by a note of Roan v. Holmes (Fla.) 21 L. R. A. 180.

the land. Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 145c. Lord St. Leonards says that "there appears to be no direct authority that a stranger to the land can enter into covenants respecting it, which will

b. Rights of administrator.

1. By statute.

In some cases the administrator is entitled to accruing rents by statute.

If he asserts his right. Howard v. Patrick, 38 Mich. 795.

In the following cases it was said that under a statute the administrator was entitled to the accruing rent: Sheppard v. Tyler, 92 Cal. 552; Jones v. Billstein, 28 Wis. 229; Smith v. Park, 31 Minn. 70; Lass v. Elaleben, 50 Mo. 122.

But during the time the statute was repealed he was not entitled to accruing rents. Campau v. Campau, 19 Mich. 116.

By statute he could collect accruing rents for one year. Autrey v. Autrey, 94 Ga. 579.

And in Eoff v. Tompkins, 2 Mo. App. 484, it was said that by statute he could collect accruing rent for two years.

An administrator was entitled to rents of plantation for three years under a statute, but not to rents of wild lands. Murphy v. Thomas, 41 Miss. 429.

In some cases an administrator is authorized by statute to collect accruing rents, under an order of probate court. Oglesby v. Forman, 77 Tex. 647.

In Hill v. Mitchell, 5 Ark. 608, it was said that an administrator was entitled to accruing rents on order of court.

And the administrator has no right to the same under the statute if not needed. Flood v. Pilgrim, 32 Wis. 878; Filbey v. Carrier, 45 Wis. 469.

Under a statute an administrator was entitled to rents if no heir was present. Toerring v. Lamp, 77 Iowa, 488.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Kinsell v. Billings, 35 Iowa, 154; Shawhan v. Long, 26 Iowa, 488, 96 Am. Dec. 164.

And in the following cases it was said that an administrator of an insolvent estate by statute may collect accruing rents. Gregg v. Currier, 36 N. H. 200; Plumer v. Plumer, 30 N. H. 558.

And the same was said to be the rule after a decree of insolvency was made. Lane v. Thompson, 43 N. H. 320; Lucy v. Lucy, 55 N. H. 9.

Some statutes provide that the administrator should lease by auction. Martin v. Williams, 18 Ala. 190; Long v. McDougald, 23 Ala. 413; Harkins v. Pope, 10 Ala. 493; Boytoun v. McEwen, 36 Ala. 348.

run with the land in the hands of assignees." Vol. 2, Vend. & P. 14th ed. 587. And, although he seems to have missed the distinction between the two classes of covenants to which we have adverted, this statement we believe to be correct with regard to covenants for title and many others, if others there be, which are governed by the same rules. King v. Wright, 155 Mass. 444, 447.

We do not argue from the rule that new and unusual incidents are not to be annexed to land, because that rule seems to belong rather to the law of easements and the like than to the class under discussion. See Norcross v. James, 140 Mass. 188, 192.

It is true, no doubt, that the heirs are the only persons interested in the rent, and therefore are the only persons who suffer substantial damages by a failure to pay it. We assume that, if the administratrices recover substantial damages, they will receive them as trustees for the heirs. We agree, as suggested by Lord Ellenborough in a different case, that a recovery by them would bar the heirs from recovery

c. Liability of administrator.

1. Generally.

ering at all. But we do not agree to his further suggestion that they could recover, at most, but nominal damages. Kingdon v. Nottle, 1 Maule & S. 355, 362. At the present day a trustee may recover damages to the extent of the interest of his cestuis que trust. Drummond v. Crane, 159 Mass. 577, 580, 28 L. R. A. 707; Lloyd's v. Harper, L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 290. Executors or administrators represent the person of the deceased "more actually" than do the heirs. Co. Litt. 209a; Bullard v. Moor, 158 Mass. 418, 425. Unless we are prepared to hold that assigns could sue in their own names upon this contract, we ought to adhere to the general rule, and to allow the administratrices to maintain the action. For the reasons which we have given, we are of opinion that the plaintiffs can maintain this suit. In Harbeck v. Sylvester, 18 Wend. 608, 609, not noticed in Allen v. Culver, authorized to collect by statute. State, Beals, v. Ramsey County Probate Court, 25 Minn. 22; Hartnett v. Fegan, 3 Mo. App. 1.

d. Rights of creditors.

Creditors were entitled to rents where the heirs allowed the administrator to collect and disburse rents. Tyler v. Priest, 31 Mo. App. 272.

And an administrator was held liable to creditors under a statute. Davis v. Rawlins, 3 Harr. (Del.) 346.

In some states a creditor may subject accruing rents. Moore v. Shields, 68 N. C. 327; Washington v. Sasser, 41 N. C. (6 Ired. Eq.) 336; Jennings v. Copeland, 90 N. C. 572.

And the same was said to be the rule in Hinton v. Whitehurst, 71 N. C. 96.

In Harrison v. Wood, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 437, the contrary was held, but this was overruled by the subsequent cases.

But other cases hold that a creditor has no lien on the accruing rents. Robb's Appeal, 41 Pa. 45; Boyd v. Martin, 9 Helak. 382; Combs v. Young, 4 Yerg. 218, 26 Am. Dec. 225; Smith v. Thomas, 14 Lea, 324; Crow v. Day, 69 Wis. 637; Ball v. First Nat. Bank, 80 Ky. 501.

Where they were applied for their benefit. Reynolds v. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. 30 Ark. 520.

e. Apportionment.

It was held that accruing rents go to the reversioner on the death of the life-estate holder. Watson v. Penn, 108 Ind. 21.

Where a guardian leased his ward's land by parol for one year, on the death of the ward during the year the heir could not recover accrued rents as the lease was determined. Welles v. Cowles, 4 Conn. 189, 10 Am. Dec. 115.

Where the tenant for life died the rent was apportioned by statute. Bloodworth v. Stevens, 51 Miss. 475.

LOWELL, LAWRENCE, & HAVERHILL STREET RAILROAD COMPANY.

1. That an independent contractor is in charge of an entertainment at grounds provided by a street-car company for free entertainment of patrons will not entirely relieve the company from liability for injuries to patrons if the entertainment is of such a character that it will probably cause injury to spectators unless due precautions are taken to guard against them.
2. A street-car patron attending a free entertainment given by the company to its patrons may hold the company liable for an accident which happens from a cause which might have been prevented and ought to have been foreseen and guarded against, if due care was not taken by the company with reference to possible accidents of the kind.
3. The arrangement of the stage and target at which an exhibition of marksmanship is given by an independent contractor to street-car patrons upon grounds of the street-car company is not, as matter of law, so much a matter of detail that the company will not be liable in case it is so negligently arranged that a patron is injured by a shattered bullet.
4. The risk of injury from careless handling of the implements used by the performers is not, as matter of law, assumed by a street-car patron who attends a free exhibition given by the company upon its grounds.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Essex County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. P. Sweeney, for defendant:

The defendant was engaged in a lawful business, and as the existence of negligence is an affirmative fact to be established by him who alleges it as a foundation of his right to NOTE.—For negligence in respect to safety of persons at a public entertainment or exhibition, see Hart v. Washington Park Club (Ill.) 29 L. R. A. 492; Lane v. Minnesota State Agri. Soc. (Minn.) 29 L. R. A. 708; and Richmond & M. R. Co. v. Moore (Va.) 37 L. R. A. 258.

For exceptions to the rule as to independent contractors, see note to Hawver v. Whalen (Ohio) 14 L. R. A. 828; Negus v. Becker (N. Y.) 25 L. R. A. 667; Colgrove v. Smith (Cal.) 27 L. R. recover, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to point out, by evidence, the defendant's fault.

Cosulich v. Standard Oil Co. 122 N. Y. 118; Loose v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623; Kendall v. Boston, 118 Mass. 284, 19 Am. Rep. 446.

The exhibition of marksmanship was being performed under a contract between the defendant and one Gorman; the person who did the shooting was not an agent or servant of the defendant; all the instruments and appliances were furnished either by Gorman or by some servant or subcontractor under Gorman, and the defendant neither had the right nor attempted to exercise any control or supervision over the performance. These facts bring the case within the rule of law that where lawful work is being done by an independent contractor, who has general control of the work, the contractee is not liable for an injury resulting from the negligence of such contractor or his servant in the doing of the work.

Hillard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 748; Forsyth v. Hooper, 11 Allen, 419; Connors v. Hennessey, 112 Mass. 96.

The obligation imposed upon the defendant was to exercise ordinary care, and there is no evidence which would justify a jury in finding that it failed to discharge that obligation.

In this case there was nothing concealed from the plaintiff. He was invited to witness an exhibition of marksmanship, the nature of which he knew before he came upon the defendant's premises and the method of which he saw before the accident, and he must be held to have assumed the risk of any misadventure that could not have been reasonably foreseen or contemplated by the defendant.

Pollock, Torts, Am. ed. p. 190.

Messrs. Charles A. De Courcy and Walter Coulson, for plaintiff:

There was clearly evidence of due care on the part of the plaintiff, for the consideration of the jury.

Fox v. Dougherty, 2 W. N. C. 417; Colvin v. Peabody, 155 Mass. 104; Whitten v. Martin, 163 Mass. 39.

The defendant advertised and supplied the entertainment. The plaintiff and the public generally knew no one else in the affair. As between this defendant and plaintiff, it was the defendant's entertainment; and the marksman, those who constructed, arranged and inspected the paraphernalia, and those who took part in the performance, were for the time being the servants or agents of the defendant. And these servants and agents did only what they were expressly authorized to do by the defendant.

The defendant cannot relieve itself from responsibility by delegating its duty.

A person who, for reward, invites large numbers of the public to commit their lives and the safety of their persons to his custody owes them a higher duty than that implied by the term "ordinary care."

1 Thomp. Neg. p. 311; Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 184.

When the owner of premises which are under his control employs an independent contractor to do work upon them which from its nature is likely to render the premises dangerous to persons who may come upon them by the invitation of the owner, the owner is not relieved by reason of the contract from the obligation of seeing that due care is used to protect such persons. The owner cannot continue to hold out the invitation without being bound to exercise due care in keeping the premises reasonably safe for use according to the invitation.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Statute 1895, chap. 316, authorizes street-railway companies to acquire, hold, equip, and maintain real estate to be used for purposes of recreation and for pleasure resorts, the admission being free. By virtue of this statute the defendant maintained such a place on the line of its railway which contained a large platform or stage for exhibitions. The defendant entered into a written contract with a manager under which the latter furnished and managed various entertainments there, and, among them, an exhibition of marksmanship by a man born without hands. The defendant paid for advertising these exhibitions, and carried posters on its cars. The plaintiff, having seen an advertisement, was a spectator at an exhibition of marksmanship, having come on one of the defendant's cars. A butt was provided to receive the bullets. All the appliances were furnished by the manager or the performer, and nobody in the defendant's employment exercised any supervision or control over the performance. Immediately after a shot had been fired, something struck the plaintiff in the eye. It is not made plain just how the accident occurred, but on the evidence the jury might find that the plaintiff was struck in the eye by a small fragment of a bullet or other metallic substance which flew from the impact when the bullet hit the butt. There was no suggestion that he was not himself in the exercise of due care, or that he was not in the place provided for spectators. The defendant asked for an instruction to the jury that it "was not responsible unless the exhibition was in its nature such that it would necessarily bring wrongful consequences to pass, unless guarded against, and the defendant failed to exercise due care to prevent harm." The judge, instead thereof, instructed the jury that the "defendant was not responsible unless the exhibition was in its nature such that it would necessarily or probably cause injury to some person present under defendant's invitation, unless guarded against, and the defendant failed to exercise due care to prevent harm." The fact that the exhibition was provided and conducted by an independent contractor would not wholly relieve the defendant from responsibility, provided it was of such a kind that it would probably cause injury to a spectator, unless due precautions were taken to guard against harm. Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123; Richmond & M. R. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 483, 37 L. R. A. 258; Southern Ohio R. Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207, 7 L. R. A. 701; Hawyer v. Whalen, 49 Ohio St. 69, 14 L. R. A. 828; Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 321. The instruction as given was right. But, even under this rule, the defendant contends that there was no evidence upon which the jury was justified in finding that the plaintiff was injured by any negligent act or omission on its part; or, in other words, that there was no evidence of any failure on its part to perform its duty in the premises. The question is suggested how far the defendant was bound to go in supervising the instruments and appliances used, and the other details of the exhibition. Should it be held to inspect the rifle and the cartridges, to see if they were safe? Without undertaking to go into unnecessary detail, it is apparent that there was evidence tending to show that the accident happened from a cause which might have been prevented and that it ought to have been foreseen and guarded against by somebody, either by the defendant or by the manager; and the jury might come to the conclusion that in the general arrangements for an exhibition of this nature the butt should be so placed that fragments which might fly from the impact of the bullets could not reach the spectators, and that due care was not taken in the arrangement of the stage, with reference to possible accidents of this kind, and that the defendant itself failed in its duty in this respect. We cannot say that this was so much a matter of transitory detail that the manager alone was responsible for an omission to pay proper attention to securing the safety of spectators from such a risk. The case, therefore, was rightly submitted to the jury. Nor can it be held that the plaintiff assumed the risk. He might well rely on those who provided the exhibition, and invited him to attend, to take due care to make it safe from such an injury as he received.

the street line, in a space paved like the sidewalk in front of a house which stands 3 or 4 feet from the street, while a coal wagon was standing by the curb, and coal extended therefrom nearly to the house, and two employees of a coal dealer were preparing to put in the coal, will not render the occupant of the house liable to the injured person, although she was a foreign woman, ignorant of the custom of delivering coal through such holes, and did not see the coal hole but stepped upon the coal from the steps of the next house, which came out to the street line.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nason & Proctor for defendant.

Messrs. Richard H. Dana and Hollis R. Bailey, for plaintiff:

On the question of whether or not the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care, it was competent to show that she was a foreigner and had never seen coal put in through a hole in the sidewalk.

Bethman v. Old Colony R. Co. 155 Mass. 352.

On the question of invitation and of the right of the public to travel upon that part of the sidewalk near the building, it was competent to show fully the character and construction of the entire sidewalk from the curbstone to the building and also to show how long it had been open to public travel.

Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. 193 Mass. 125; Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 578; Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426; Hanton v. Thompson, 167 Mass. 190.

These cases hold that an invitation to walk outside the line of the street may be implied from various circumstances, and that of these circumstances a very important one is the construction upon land adjacent to the street of a sidewalk of such a character as to give the appearance of a widening of the sidewalk proper.

Valentine v. Boston, 22 Pick. 75, 33 Am. Dec. 711, holds that a user by the public for twenty years of private land for purposes of travel raises a presumption of dedication to public use.

See also Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 8 Am. Rep. 485.

On the question of Mrs. Wirth's occupation of the premises in question the written lease under which she was in possession was clearly competent to show that she, and not her landlord, had the whole control of the premises and the entire responsibility for their safe condition.

Stewart v. Putnam, 127 Mass. 403; Boston v. Gray, 144 Mass. 53.

The fact that Mrs. Wirth employed the coal company to deliver the coal does not free her from liability.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff in consequence of her stepping into an open coal hole. The coal hole was situated about 18 inches in front of a house held by the defendant under a lease, and upon land embraced in the lease. The house was set back from the street, and the coal hole was 2 feet or more outside the street line. But the paving over the space between the street line and the house was continuous with that of the street, and there was nothing in the usual conditions to give notice that it was not part of the street, except the way in which it generally was used by tenants for the deposit of barrels, etc., and the fact that the steps of the house next to it on the side from which the plaintiff was coming came out to the line of the street.

At the time of the accident a coal wagon was backed up to the side wall in front of the premises, and coal which had been ordered by the defendant was being delivered from it by the servants of a coal dealer. One of these had uncovered the coal hole, and was shoveling the last of the coal out of the wagon upon the sidewalk. The other stood by the hole, doing such work as was necessary to help the coal pour down the hole. The coal covered the whole sidewalk from the wagon to near the house. The plaintiff, a Spanish woman, who, according to her own testimony, never had seen coal put through a coal hole before, stepped upon the steps of the next building above mentioned, thence stepped upon the coal, and then with her other leg went into the coal hole, which was 30 inches from the corner of the steps. The judge was asked to direct a verdict for the defendant, which he refused to do, and the defendant excepted.

The question in its common form is whether these facts show any evidence of negligence proper to be left to the jury. But it will be seen that it is not a question of evidence, in the ordinary sense. It is not whether there is anything tending to prove a disputed fact. The acts and omissions of the defendant as to the plaintiff are fully known and undisputed. The question is whether those acts and omissions made the defendant liable for the plaintiff's hurt,—in the common language of the law, whether they constituted a breach of duty to the plaintiff. It will be observed, further, that the facts on which the question arises are quite simple and are likely to be repeated with slight variations, as long as coal holes exist; that they are all matters of eyesight, capable of being photographed; and that theory must recognize that at some point the visible situation would be such as to warrant the defendant in assuming that the public were sufficiently warned, or, in other words, that the defendant would have done her whole duty. Chenery v. Fitchburg R. Co. 160 Mass. 211, 214, 22 L. R. A. 575. It is true that blind men, and foreigners unused to our ways, have a right to walk in the streets, and this fact must be taken into consideration in drawing the line of the defendant's duty; but the line, when drawn, is a physical line, so to speak,—it is a visible situation, in which all the arrangements or precautions which the law requires of a defendant are there, upon the ground.

In simple cases of this sort, courts have felt able to determine what, in every case, however complex, defendants are bound at their peril to know, and are presumed to know, namely, whether the given situation is on one or the other side of the line. The examples are numerous, and we take the first that come to our hand. Barron v. Eldredge, 100 Mass. 455, 460, 461, 1 Am. Rep. 126; Pinney v. Hall, 156 Mass. 225; Crafter v. Metropolitan R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 300. We think that the case at bar is not beyond our competence to decide. The greatest danger in attempting to do so is that of being misled by ready-made generalizations, and of thinking only in phrases to which, as lawyers, the judges have become accustomed, instead of looking straight at things, and regarding the facts in all their concreteness, as a jury would do. Too broadly generalized conceptions are a constant source of fallacy. Thus it is easy to say that the continuity of the sidewalk was an invitation, and then to discuss in universals the duty of one who invites the public upon his land. But, invitation or no, the invitation is not the same, and the responsibility is not the same, when the place is seemingly in the middle of a clear highway, and looks safe and ready for travel to one who is walking straight along the open road, that it is where the place is in a snug corner, and is capable of being reached only by going over steps which manifestly are not a part of the highway, and then by stepping into a pile of coal which surrounds the spot in question. Without considering whether under such circumstances, the defendant would be freed from all duty in respect of the temporary dangers created by the coal dealer while he was doing his work (Clapp v. Kemp, 122 Mass. 481), it is the opinion of a majority of the court that she was not called on to stand guard, and to tell the public that they must not understand the continuity of the pavement under the coal, if they happen to know of it, as a present assurance that they might step blindly into the coal, and as a warranty that there was no coal hole in the place where the coal was pouring down. A heap of coal on a sidewalk in Boston is an indication, according to common experience, that there very possibly may be a coal hole to receive it. But, without saying that it always is a sufficient warning to look out for one, we are of opinion that as against a person coming from where the plaintiff came from, with a coal hole situated as this was, the coal in the condition shown, and the business of delivery then going on, in the absence of men with baskets, or other indication of a different means of making the delivery, the defendant cannot be said to have been wanting in due care.

Exceptions sustained.

Knowlton, J., dissenting:

I am unable to agree to the opinion of the majority in this case. The building occupied by the defendant, and the adjoining buildings for a considerable distance towards the west, stood back from the line of the street about 3 feet and 8 inches. The buildings in the other direction, with their projections, came out to the line of the street. The space in front of the defendant's building, and of the adjoining buildings towards the west, was paved with the same kind of material, and on the same level, all the way from the buildings to the curbstone and was used as a sidewalk. The walk was not very wide, and there was nothing to mark the line of the street. In Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 580, is this language: "The jury might have inferred from the facts stated that the defendant laid out and paved the sidewalk on her own land in order that it should be used by the public as the sidewalk of the street, and allowed it to remain apparently the part of the street that was intended to be used by foot passengers. This would amount to an invitation to the public to enter upon, and use as a public sidewalk, the land so prepared, and the plaintiff, so using it, would have gone upon the defendant's land by her implied invitation, and she would owe him the duty not to expose him to a dangerous condition of the walk which reasonable care on her part would have prevented." In Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426-430, the court says, referring to cases of this kind: They "stand on a ground peculiar to themselves. They are where the defendant by his conduct has induced the public to use a way in the belief that it is a street or public way which all have a right to use, and where they suppose they will be safe. The inducement or implied invitation in these cases is not to come to a place of business fitted up by the defendant for traffic, to which those only are invited who will come to do business with the occupant; nor is it to come by permission or favor or license; but it is to come as one of the public and enjoy a public right, in the enjoyment of which one may expect to be protected. The liability in such a case should be co-extensive with the inducement or implied invitation." I think that the jury might have found the circumstances under which the plaintiff was walking upon the sidewalk at the time of the accident to be such as entitled her to protection or warning against openings in it. At the time of the accident the coal hole was being used for the defendant's benefit, by her authority. If this use would ordinarily be attended with danger to the public, the defendant was bound to see that proper precautions were taken for their safety, even if the work was being done by an independent contractor. Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123; Woodman v. Metropolitan R. Co. 149 Mass. 335, 4 L. R. A. 213; Pye v. Frazon, 156 Mass. 471-474; Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470. The opinion in Clapp v. Kemp, 122 Mass. 481, does not purport to state the rule of law applicable to such cases, but only decides that the instruction given was sufficiently favorable to the defendant. Although the men who delivered the coal, and their employer, might be liable over to the defendant if she should be held liable on account of their negligence, the defendant is herself liable as if they had been her own servants, if, while using the coal hole under her authority, they exposed the plaintiff to danger by negligently leaving an unguarded opening in the sidewalk. Curtis v. Kiley, 153 Mass. 123. There was testimony from several witnesses that the coal covered the sidewalk from the curbstone to the coal hole, and two others testified that it extended from the curbstone to the line of the defendant's house. The accident occurred at a little before 6 o'clock on the evening of November 15, and there was testimony that it was dark, and that there was no daylight. There was evidence from the plaintiff, and from another witness who was present, that they saw nobody about the coal hole before the accident. One of the two men who were delivering the coal was in the wagon from which he had just shoveled the last of the coal, and was busy with his team, and he did not see the plaintiff until she was being lifted out of the hole. The other testified that he was about 3 feet from the coal hole; that he could not say what he was doing; that he thought his head was turned around, looking up Eliot street towards Tremont street, which was in the direction opposite to that from which the plaintiff was coming. He also said in his testimony: "I was not shoveling coal at that time. I was trying to keep myself on my feet. There was a throng of people going up there, each way." Apparently, the plaintiff was going as others were, except that they did not happen to step into the hole. According to her testimony, she had just come from Spain, and had never seen coal put into a cellar through a coal hole. Eliot street is traveled by many persons. Besides the plaintiff, others might have been expected there who had never seen coal put in through holes in sidewalks. The wagon was backed up to the curbstone, and there were electric cars and teams passing through the street. I think that the jury well might have found that a coal hole on a public sidewalk where a throng of persons was passing in each direction was left open on a dark evening, with coal scattered about it from the curbstone to the side of the defendant's building, with a large two-horse wagon backed up against the curbstone, with nothing to indicate to pedestrians that there was an opening there and with nobody to guard the hole or to warn them of danger. It seems to me that there was evidence of negligence on the part of those who left the hole open and unguarded. What kind of conduct is required under complex conditions to reach the usual standard of due care, namely the ordinary care of persons of common prudence, is a question of fact, to be determined according to the observation and experience of common men. Even when there is no conflict of testimony, if there are acts and omissions, of which some tend to show negligence, and others do not, the question whether there was negligence or not is, in my judgment, a question for a jury. This proposition I deem to be established by such unanimity of decision as to need no citation of authorities in support of it. I think the case was rightly submitted to the jury.

6. Loss of freight by freezing caused by its being sent by direction of the carrier over a route which subjected it to such peril is not within a clause in the shipping contract exempting the carrier from liability for loss from any "cause arising out of responsibility as master over its agents or servants incident to said shipment."
 7. Absence of an invoice will not prevent the operation of a stipulation in a carriage contract that the carrier's liability for loss shall be limited to the invoice price at the point of shipment, but the value of the property at that point will be the measure of damage.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the County of San Bernardino in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the destruction of orange trees by frost while in defendant's possession for transportation.

Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. B. Hotchkiss, for appellant:

The statute of limitations attaches and begins to run from the time when the injury (i. e., the cause of loss) was first inflicted, and not

Defendant was the agent of the Florida Midland Railway Company, the first carrier receiving the property, and which alone executed the contracts and bills of lading declared upon, and which, upon the uncontradicted testimony, undertook to carry the trees through to Riverside from the place of shipment, and guaranteed the payment of through freight.

The proximate cause of the loss was by the "act of God," to wit, by the freezing of the trees; the sole injury complained of in the complaint against this defendant in shipping the cars on "other lines northward" was not the proximate cause of the detriment.

tatur applies to such cases as to other contracts and transactions. Ordinary diligence is all that is required of the carrier to avoid or remedy the effects of the overpowering cause. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Reeves, 10 Wall. 176, 19 L. ed. 909.

Messrs. John S. Chapman and Curtis, Oster, & Curtis, for respondent:

Independently of a contract to carry via the Southern Pacific, an intermediate carrier in this country is responsible for the loss occurring through his negligence, and in such case no privity of contract would be absolutely essential to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. § 150.

Whether the action is in tort or assumpsit, the contract, if it be express, should be proved.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 762.

It would have made no difference if, after deviating from the course and taking these goods via Ogden, the carload of trees had been destroyed by lightning, for in that case the loss did not accrue by the act of God alone, but the negligence of the defendant in exposing the property to that force.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 190.

The washout of which the defendant speaks did not require the goods to be sent to Ogden, and, more than that, it was not the custom of the company to deviate from the route without instructions.

If the defendant ever had any right to claim the benefit of the clause in the bills of lading, as to the invoice cost at point of shipping, that right ceased to exist when it deviated from the route over which it agreed to carry the trees.

A stipulation in a bill of lading that is intended to protect a common carrier from the violation of his contract, and in disregard of the settled rules of public policy, will not be sustained, and it is contrary to public policy to allow a common carrier to stipulate for immunity for the consequences of his own negligence and fraud, or that of its own employees.

Searls, C., filed the following opinion:

Appeal by defendant, the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $8,965, interest and costs, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. In February, 1891, the plaintiff, R. W. Pierce, shipped from Apopka, county of Orange, Florida, by the Florida Midland Railway, two carloads of orange trees, consigned to Gulick Bros., Riverside, California. The first carload of trees was shipped February 19, 1891, and was received at New Orleans by the Southern Pacific Company February 25, 1891. The other carload was shipped February 24, 1891, and was received by the Southern Pacific Company at New Orleans, March 1, 1891. Each carload was shipped under a bill of lading signed by plaintiff, R. W. Pierce, and by the agent of the Florida Midland Railway. A copy of the bills of lading was given to plaintiff. They were upon printed forms, with blanks, filled in with the names of the consignors, etc., in substance as follows: "Marked and consigned to Gulick Bros., Riverside, California, one carload of orange trees, via Southern Pacific, 20,000 weight, car initialed, N. & L. No. —," etc. In the printed form it was provided that "the articles and packages" (contents unknown) were in "their nature perishable, fragile, or otherwise susceptible to damage," were shipped at a rate "lower than the regular tariff charges of said railway company and connections," and it was agreed that the shippers should "insure said Florida Midland Railway Company and all lines over which said shipment may pass, between points of shipment and destination, against claims by loss or damage incurred by reason of delay in transportation, or any other cause arising out of responsibility as master over its agents or servants (gross negligence excepted), incident to the shipment, and that the actual invoice cost at point of shipment will be taken as measure of damages to govern settlement of any damages for which the carriers may be liable," and that "claims for loss, damage, or overcharge arising out of this shipment shall be presented to agents of delivery lines within one week after arrival of the property at its destination." The rate of freightage on the trees was $1.97½ per 100 pounds. The Southern Pacific had a direct through line of railroad, owned or operated by it, and by others in connection with it, from New Orleans, across Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, via El Paso and Yuma, to Colton, California. When the freight reached New Orleans this line was broken by severe storms and washouts in Arizona, and was not likely to be available for the transportation of freight for some time. Under these circumstances, by order of its general agent, the trees in question were sent north through Texas to Denver, Colorado, thence to Ogden, Utah, thence over its Central Pacific road, etc., to Colton, California, where the cars were delivered to the Southern California Railway, and by it hauled to Riverside, a distance of some 6 or 8 miles, arriving at the latter point March 12 and March 16, respectively, 1891. While in transit by the northern route, the trees were entirely destroyed by freezing.

Plaintiff avers in his complaint, among other things, in substance: (1) That there was no invoice of the cost of the trees; that they had been grown by him in Florida, and were shipped to California for sale. (2) That they were delivered to defendant at New Orleans, to be shipped to Riverside by its direct and usual route. (3) That the defendant violated the contract by shipping through a northern climate, where, at that season of the year, intensely cold weather was common, and hence that defendant was guilty of gross negligence, etc., whereby the trees were frozen and destroyed. These allegations are substantially denied by the answer. Defendant also set up the provisions of subdivision 1 of § 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure (two year) in bar of the action.

1. The contention of appellant is that the evidence showed without contradiction that more than two years elapsed between the negligence complained of and the bringing of the suit, and hence that the finding of the court against defendant's plea of the statute is contrary to the evidence. We think this contention cannot be maintained. Under our Code of Civil Procedure (§ 458) the statute of limitations is sufficiently pleaded by alleging the bar and referring to the section and subdivision thereof (if so divided) relied upon. But the section continues: "If such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish, on the trial, the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred." The allegations of the answer are to be deemed controverted. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. It therefore devolved upon the defendant to establish the facts necessary to support the plea. The complaint avers, and the answer admits that defendant "is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky, and engaged in the business of operating a railroad as a common carrier of freight and passengers in the state of California and elsewhere, and was so engaged in the said business during all the time hereinafter mentioned." A statute of this state approved April 1, 1872, entitled "An Act in Relation to Foreign Corporations" (Stat. 1871-72, p. 826), requires all corporations created by the laws of any other state to designate some person residing in the county in which its principal place of business in this state is, upon whom process issued by authority of or under any law of this state may be served, and must file such designation in the office of the secretary of state, and a copy of such designation, duly certified, shall be evidence of such appointment. The 2d section of the act provides that a failure to comply with such requirement shall preclude such corporation from "the benefit of the statutes of this state limiting the time for the commencement of civil actions." Section 3 of the act confers the right of corporations organized under the laws of other states which have complied with the foregoing requirement to avail themselves of the benefits of our statutes of limitation. It being admitted that defendant was a corporation organized under the laws of another state, compliance with the foregoing statute became a necessary fact to be proved as a predicate to its right to avail itself of the benefit of the statute of limitation. This it failed to do, and hence the court did not err in its finding against its defense of the statute of limitations. We may observe that the general rule is that foreign corporations, although having agents and transacting business in a state, come within the provisions of statutes limiting the time for the commencement of actions and making a saving as against absent debtors. It is only by comity that they are permitted to transact business in another state than that of their creation. They are citizens, so to speak, of the state of their creation, and are, in contemplation of law, absent from all other states than the one of their situs. Wood, Limitations of Actions, p. 599. The statute, then, is not a limitation upon the right of foreign corporations to avail themselves of our statutes of limitations, but it confers that right, subject only to the condition prescribed.

2. Appellant contends that its general demurrer to the complaint upon the ground "that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant" should have been sustained. The complaint, as we think, in giving, as it does, a history of the whole transaction, including the contract made with the Florida Midland Company to ship the orange trees to Riverside, California, via the Southern Pacific Company; the transportation of the trees to New Orleans, and delivery to defendant under the contract; its failure to forward them by its usual route, with a statement of the route by which defendant shipped the goods; the objections to such route, and the result of the deviation, etc., sets out a cause of action, either sufficient to hold defendant as for a breach of the contract, or, failing in that, under its common-law liability as a common carrier. It may well be that a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground of ambiguity or uncertainty would have been good; but no such objection was presented.

3. The contention of defendant that it cannot be held liable for the reasons (a) that the bill of lading described the packages as "contents unknown;" (b) that it was not furnished with the bill of lading, or with an opportunity to inspect the property, so as to inform itself of the character thereof, or its liability to injury,—cannot be maintained. It is true, the printed portion of the bills of lading uses the following expression: "The following articles and packages (contents unknown), marked and consigned as below, to wit [then follows the description in each bill of lading in writing, which is in part as follows]: 1 car orange trees." Again, the evidence shows without contradiction that the cars were marked on the outside with the names and residence of the consignees, and "orange trees," marked in big plain letters. In addition to this, the cars had open ventilators at each end, affording an opportunity to see and examine the contents,

Defendant must, therefore, be held to have known the contents of the car, or, at least, to have had the means of knowledge at hand. "It is the duty of the carrier to transport the goods by the usual direct route; and for any loss which a departure from such route may occasion to them, he is liable." Hutchinson, Carr. § 312. It is said, however, that where there are two or more customary routes, and the carrier is left free to choose between them, he may take his choice without incurring increased liability, if there are no special reasons which make the route chosen unsafe. United States Exp. Co. v. Kountze Bros. 8 Wall. 842, 19 L. ed. 457; Maghee v. Camden & A. R. Transp. Co. 45 N. Y. 514, 6 Am. Rep. 124. Judging from the testimony it can hardly be said that the route by which defendant shipped the goods in this case was one of its customary routes. With a through route of its own through Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, it sent the goods many hundred miles to the north, over roads operated by other companies, to meet its Central Pacific road at Ogden, in the state of Utah. Conceding, however, that the route was a usual one, there were special reasons for not sending goods which were liable to destruction by frost over this northern route in winter, where defendant might reasonably have expected the result which followed. When, therefore, defendant's through route via Ft. Yuma was obstructed by stress of weather, it became its duty to hold the goods until that or some other safe avenue was opened, or to notify the consignees or consignors, and take their directions in the premises. The evidence shows that they did this with another car of like orange trees at a date a little earlier, and by direction of the consignees shipped them safely through by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad. Where goods are marked in such a way as to indicate their character, or as to give notice to the carrier that their safety requires that they must be carried in a particular manner, such marks must not be disregarded. Hutchinson, Carr. § 310. In view of all the surrounding circumstances, we are of opinion that the defendant, by a failure to adopt one or the other of the foregoing courses, erred in judgment, and became liable to plaintiff for the results which followed. The evidence fails to establish a case of gross or wanton negligence; but still does, we think, show a want of that extraordinary care imposed upon common carriers of goods.

4. A carrier is not relieved from responsibility under a contract that he shall not be responsible if he has been guilty of negligence. Ogdensburg & L. C. R. Co. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 123, 23 L. ed. 827. It is contrary to public policy to permit the carrier to stipulate for exemption from the effects of the negligence of himself or his servants. Hutchinson, Carr. § 260, and cases there cited; New York O. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 367, 21 L. ed. 627; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788.

5. As to the measure of damages. The court below awarded damages up to the full value of the goods at the point of destination, although the uncontradicted evidence tended to show that the value at the shipping point was about one half of that given. It will be observed that the contract between the plaintiff and the Florida Midland Railway was for a through shipment of the goods to Riverside. We repeat that portion essential to the matter in hand: "Whereas, said railway company has agreed that the cost of transportation . . . shall not exceed . . . $1.97½ per 100 lbs., said rates being lower than the regular tariff charges of said railway company and connections. Now, therefore, said shippers, for themselves and consignees, do hereby insure said Florida Midland Railway Company and all lines over which said shipments may pass between points of shipment and destination. . . . It is further agreed that the actual invoice cost at point of shipment will be taken as measure of damages to govern settlement of any damages for which the carriers may be liable." There is a wide distinction between a contract for exemption from liability in case of negligence which is usually held in derogation of public policy because tending to encourage negligence, and a contract fairly made, whereby, in consideration of a lower freightage, the parties agree upon a fixed or determinate value to be placed upon the article to be shipped in case of its loss. Hutchinson, at § 250, after discussing the question of total exemption in case of negligence, adds: "To be distinguished from these cases, however,—though the distinction is not always observed,—are those cases, obviously different, in which, for the purpose of determining the shipper's liability for freight and the carrier's responsibility for damages, the value of the property is agreed upon. When such is the case, the Supreme Court of the United States and many of the state courts hold, to use the language of Mr. Justice Blatchford in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 23 L. ed. 717: 'That where a contract of the kind, signed by the shipper, is fairly made, agreeing on the valuation of the property carried, with the rate of freight based on the condition that the carrier assumes liability only to the extent of the agreed valuation, even in case of loss or damage by the negligence of the carrier, the contract will be upheld as a proper and lawful mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier may be responsible and the freight he receives, and of protecting himself against extravagant and fanciful valuation.'" In the same case the learned justice further said: "The limitation as to value has no tendency to exempt from liability for negligence. It does not induce want of care. It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on. The carrier is bound to respond in that value for negligence. The compensation for carriage is based on that value. The shipper is estopped from saying that the value is greater. The articles have no greater value, for the purposes of the contract of transportation, between the parties to that contract. . . . There is no violation of public policy. On the contrary, it would be unjust and unreasonable, and would be repugnant to the soundest principles of fair dealing and of the freedom of contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if a shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss." We understand full well that there are many cases holding a contrary doctrine to that enunciated in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, but we think that case, which is cited as a leading one, is founded upon reason and justice, and that the trend of judicial opinion is to the doctrine there enunciated. See cases cited in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. at page 342, 28 L. ed. 721. Respondent objects, and urges that, as the trees in question were cultivated by the plaintiff, there was not and could not be any "invoice price." The evident answer is that by the term "invoice price" was meant the cost or value of the property at the shipping point. That it had a fixed value at that point was attested by the evidence. One of the definitions of an invoice is: "A writing made on behalf of an importer, specifying the merchandise imported, and its cost or value." Black, Law Dict. Plaintiff sued upon his special contract, and averred that defendant received the goods thereunder. Defendant averred in its answer "that it duly performed its duty under the contract set out in the complaint." We think the demand for damages from defendant was in due time, and sufficiently specific, in the absence of any demand by defendant of an invoice, to comply with the contract. We think the court erred in overruling the objection of defendant to proof of the market value of the trees at Riverside, instead of confining the inquiry to the cost or value of the trees at the point of shipment in Florida, as per contract, which, with the freight paid, was the true measure of damages. For this error we recommend that the judgment and order appealed from be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Britt, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Petitions for rehearing in banc having been filed, the following response was handed down on February 23, 1898:

Per Curiam:

The facts of this case are fully stated in the opinion of department 1. When that opinion was filed, both parties petitioned for a rehearing in banc, the appellant insisting that it had proved a valid contract exempting it from all liability, and the respondent contending that the rulings of the lower court with reference to the measure of damages were correct. For the purpose of further considering these two questions a rehearing was granted. Sections 2174 and 2175 of the Civil Code read as follows: "The obligations of a common carrier cannot be limited by general notice on his part, but may be limited by special contract." Section 2174. "A common carrier cannot be exonerated, by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of himself or his servants." Section 2175. In the absence of proof, we presume that the law of Florida is the same. The contract in question here, which was executed in Florida, contains the following stipulation: "Now, therefore, said shippers, for themselves and consignees, do hereby insure said Florida Midland Railway Company, and all lines over which said shipments may pass between points of shipment and destination, against claims by loss or damage which may be incurred by reason of delay in transportation, or any other cause arising out of responsibility as master over its agents or servants (gross or wanton negligence excepted) incident to said shipments." The appellant contends that it was empowered by § 2175 of the Civil Code to contract for an exemption from all liability except for gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of itself or servants; that such contract, based upon a valid consideration, was entered into in its behalf with the respondent; and that it was clearly shown and conceded by the court that it was not guilty of gross negligence. When § 2175 of the Civil Code was enacted, § 17 of the same Code read as follows: "There are three degrees of negligence: (1) Slight, which consists in the want of great care and diligence; (2) ordinary, which consists in the want of ordinary care and diligence; (3) gross, which consists in the want of slight care and diligence." In 1874 this section was repealed outright, and the effect of this repeal upon the construction and operation of § 2175 is one of the questions which has been argued on the rehearing. It is not necessary, however, to decide this question; for, conceding that the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence still obtains, so far as stipulations for exemption in contracts of common carriers are concerned, we do not consider this a case for the application of the doctrine. The loss and damage for which plaintiff sues was not for delay in transportation, and the exemption from liability claimed by defendant must be based upon the general words "or any other cause arising out of responsibility as master over its agents or servants," etc. This language, which is of very doubtful and ambiguous meaning, must be construed most strongly against the defendant, and even under a less exacting rule could not be held to mean anything more than that the railroad company was not to be liable for the negligence or misconduct of its servants or agents. But in this case it is clearly shown that the loss and damage complained of was solely due to compliance by the agents and servants of the defendant with an order emanating from headquarters; that is to say, an order issued by the corporation itself through its proper organs. This order embraced all freight east of a certain point, including these cars loaded with orange trees, which, as a matter of common knowledge, are easily killed by that degree of cold which, as a matter equally of common knowledge, they would be likely to encounter at the end of February on the route over which they were transported. Our conclusion upon this point is that the stipulation in this contract, allowing it to be valid, does not extend to or embrace the act of the corporation in ordering these trees shipped through Utah and Nevada.

As to the point made by respondent in his petition for a rehearing, we are satisfied that the conclusion reached by the department was correct. The ordinary measure of damages for breach of a carrier's obligation to deliver freight is the value of the goods at the time and place of delivery (Civil Code, § 8816); but this liability may be limited by special contract (Id. § 3174); and here there was a special contract signed by the plaintiff making the invoice price at the point of shipment the measure of damages. It is true, there was no invoice price actually made out and agreed upon at the time the trees were shipped; but this clause cannot for that reason be treated as meaningless and inoperative. It should receive a reasonable construction, and the most reasonable construction of which it is susceptible is that by invoice price was meant the actual value of the trees at the point of shipment when loaded and ready for transportation. To this, of course, is to be added, in fixing the damages, the freight actually paid, and interest on the whole amount.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

1. The offer of a reward for the arrest of a murderer by Penal Code, § 1547, does not extend to an arrest by an officer whose duty it is to make it.
2. It is against sound public policy to allow an officer to receive a reward for the performance of his duty.
3. The arrest by a police officer of San Francisco, without a warrant, of a murderer for a crime committed in another county of the state, is made in the exercise of his duty so as to preclude his recovery of a reward for making it.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco directing the issuance of a writ of mandamus requiring him to draw his warrant for the payment to petitioner of a reward for the arrest and conviction of an alleged murderer. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. F. Fitzgerald, Attorney General, for appellant.

Mr. Davis Louderback for respondent.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the superior court directing the issuance of a writ of mandate to the state controller, requiring him to draw his warrant upon the state treasury in favor of petitioner for the sum of $1,000. The application is based upon the following facts: Petitioner was a captain of police of the city and county of San Francisco. The governor of the state offered a reward of $1,000 for the arrest and conviction of the person or persons who murdered one Webber in the city of Sacramento. Petitioner arrested the murderer of Webber in the city and county of San Francisco, and furnished witnesses and evidence upon which a conviction was subsequently had. By right of these facts he now claims the reward of $1,000. There are other matters set forth in the petition for the writ, but we do not deem them material to the issue before us.

The governor of the state offered this reward by virtue of the authority found in § 1547 of the Penal Code, and that section declares: "The governor may offer a reward, not exceeding $1,000, payable out of the general fund, for the apprehension: (1) . . . (2) Of any person who has committed, or is charged with the commission of an offense punishable with death." It will be observed that the power of the governor is limited to offering rewards for the apprehension of certain criminals. For that reason we attach no importance to the allegations of the petition wherein it is declared that petitioner furnished the evidence upon which the murderer was convicted. It follows from what has already been said that the only question here presented is: May a police officer of the city and county of San Francisco who arrests a murderer for a crime committed in another county of the state, and without a warrant, recover a reward offered by the state for the arrest of such murderer? The answer to this question is largely dependent upon the conclusion to be reached from two other propositions of law, namely: Was it the official duty of this captain of police to make the arrest of the criminal? And, if so, is it against sound public policy to allow such an officer to receive a reward for the performance of his duty?

The last legal proposition stated must be declared in the affirmative. The courts, both in this country and England, are practically unanimous in declaring that a public officer working for a fixed compensation, or whose fees are prescribed by law, cannot demand or contract for a reward for services rendered in the line or scope of his official duty. In the well-considered case Re Russell, 51 Conn. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 55, it is said: "And no case can be found—at least, I have not been able to find any—in which the claim of a public officer to recover a reward for services rendered in the performance of his official duties has received the sanction of a court of last resort in this country or in England." A deputy sheriff making an arrest in the line of his duty is not entitled to a reward offered for such arrest. Stamper v. Temple, 6 Humph. 113, 44 Am. Dec. 296. In Morrell v. Quarles it was held that a police officer making an arrest in the line of his duty was not entitled to a reward. 35 Ala. 548. In Ex parte Gore, 57 Miss. 251, it is declared that a constable is not entitled to a reward for making an arrest in the line of duty, and in that case it was further decided: "The reward offered by § 2786 of the Code was designed to induce the arrest of fleeing homicides by persons not under an official obligation to do it." A police officer in the performance of his duty is not entitled to a reward for the apprehension of a criminal. Day v. Putnam Ins. Co. 16 Minn. 408 (Gil. 365). A police officer cannot take a reward for services rendered within the duties of his office, or for which he receives a fixed salary. Kick v. Merry, 23 Mo. 72, 66 Am. Dec. 658. The same principle is again declared in Thornton v. Missouri P. R. Co. 42 Mo. App. 58. See also Smith v. Whildin, 10 Pa. 39, 49 Am. Dec. 572; Warner v. Grace, 14 Minn. 487 (Gil. 364). Counsel for petitioner to some extent concedes the soundness of the doctrine laid down in the foregoing cases as to rewards offered by private parties, but claims the doctrine is not to be applied to governmental or state rewards. We fail to see any substantial difference in principle as to rewards offered by private parties and rewards offered by the state. They stand upon common ground. The basis of the sound public policy supporting the text of the many cases cited is thus declared in Kick v. Merry, 23 Mo. 72, 66 Am. Dec. 658: "The services rendered were within the duties of his office. All his energies had been devoted to the service of the city. Under such circumstances, to permit an officer to stipulate for extra compensation for services to which the public was entitled would lead to great corruption and oppression in office. It would follow that whenever a crime was committed, instead of speedy efforts for the arrest of the offender, there would be a holding back, in the hope that there would be a reward given for his apprehension. If once a habit of taking a reward is introduced, nothing will be done unless the service is previously purchased by extra pay." This reasoning undoubtedly applies to rewards offered by the state as fully as to rewards offered by private parties. No case has been cited, and we know of none, where an appellate court has declared the existence in principle of any well-defined distinction as to public officers, in cases where rewards have been offered by the state or municipality, and where rewards have been offered by private parties. No case has been cited where a reward offered by the state or municipality has been recovered by a public officer who simply did some act or acts in the performance of his official duty as the basis of his claim. To the contrary, we cite Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219; Ex parte Gore, 57 Miss. 251; Pile v. New Orleans, 19 La. Ann. 274; Harris v. Beaven, 11 Bush, 254; Williams v. Thuesatt, 12 Rich. L. 478.

It is insisted that when the state, by its legislature, authorized the governor to offer a reward for the apprehension of certain criminals, such reward is offered to all persons, and necessarily includes sheriffs, police officers, etc.; and that, therefore, the state, by such action, has declared its own public policy as to rewards for the apprehension of criminals. The state has a right to declare what is sound public policy upon this question, however variant its views may be with elementary principles declared by the decisions of courts of other states and countries. And, if this state had authorized the governor in terms to offer this reward to sheriffs and other peace officers, the courts would have been bound to sustain such a law, as far as any question of public policy was concerned. But the statute here goes to no such lengths. If the state, through its governor, possessed the inherent power to offer this reward, we would hold, in line with the many decisions cited, that peace officers could not recover. Yet it would seem that the legislature, by this statute, only attempted to place in the hands of the governor a power which probably did not inherently rest in him, namely, the power of offering rewards, payable out of the state treasury, for the apprehension of criminals. The grant of a mere power to the governor to offer a reward does not necessarily carry with it any implied power to offer the reward to any and all persons. To hold that the legislature intended these rewards to be recovered by peace officers is to hold that such body intended to declare a certain course of action sound public policy in this state which has been declared unsound and vicious public policy in every other jurisdiction. While the state legislature had the power to take this radical and unusual position, we will not hold that it has taken such a step unless such an intent is plainly manifest from the act itself. Here the purpose of the act was directed to placing the power in the hands of the governor to offer rewards for the apprehension of criminals. The particular persons to whom the rewards might or should be paid was a matter not in the legislative mind. In Ex parte Gore, 57 Miss. 251, under a very similar statute, the court said: "The reward offered by § 2786 of the Code was designed to induce the arrest of fleeing homicides by persons not under an official obligation to do it." In Harris v. Beaven, 11 Bush, 254, the construction of a statute similar in principle to the one at bar was under consideration. The court there declared: "Having thus provided what was deemed suitable compensation, did the legislature intend by enacting § 8, chapter 42, supra, to enable commonwealth's attorneys, by entering their own names on indictments as prosecutors, to secure to themselves, in addition to the compensation otherwise provided, the compensation given by that section to prosecutors? We think not. The object had in view, no doubt, was to bring private individuals to aid the prosecution by offering as an inducement a part of the fine. It was the duty of the commonwealth's attorney to do all that he could reasonably and fairly to secure the conviction of Harris, for the salary and perquisites given him as such; and, when he became prosecutor, he came under no new obligation to the state in the prosecution of the case, and could not lawfully render any service therein which he was not bound to render before assuming the relation of prosecutor." It may well be said in the case at bar that this plaintiff, in arresting the murderer, did not render any service to the state which he was not bound to render regardless of the existence of any reward.

Was it the official duty of the petitioner to arrest the murderer? There can be but one answer to this question. Section 817 of the Penal Code of this state declares a police officer of a city to be a peace officer. The arrest in this case was made without a warrant, but such fact in no degree changes the legal complexion of the merits of the litigation. Section 886 of the Penal Code declares that a peace officer may make an arrest in obedience to a warrant delivered to him, or may without a warrant arrest a person (1) for a public offense committed or attempted in his presence; (2) when a person arrested has committed a felony, although not in his presence; (3) when a felony has in fact been committed, and he has reasonable cause for believing the person arrested to have committed it. In other words, it is the duty of the peace officer to make arrests under any of the foregoing conditions. It certainly would be his duty to make an arrest where a public offense was committed in his presence. It likewise would surely be his duty to make an arrest where he held a valid warrant ordering the arrest. Yet, under the statute quoted, it is no more his duty to make arrests under such circumstances than it is when a felony has been committed, and he has reasonable cause for believing a certain person to have committed it. Here, of necessity, it must be assumed that petitioner had reasonable cause for making the arrest. It will not be assumed that he made it without good cause, and, if he had good cause for the arrest, it was his duty to make it. It cannot be contended for a moment but that a police officer would be grossly neglectful of his duty if the opportunity presented itself, and he failed to arrest a person, having reasonable cause to believe such person to be a murderer. Again, the consolidation act of the city and county of San Francisco (§ 26) declares: "Police officers in subjection to the orders of the respective captains, and all under the general direction of the chief of police, shall be prompt and vigilant in the detection of crime, the arrest of public offenders, the suppression of all riots, affrays, duels, and disturbance of the peace," etc. Stat. 1856, p. 153. Under this broad declaration of the duties of police officers, it clearly devolved upon petitioner to make this arrest. Here was a public offender; a man who had committed a horrible crime. The petitioner was a police officer, and knew the fact. Under such circumstances, it was, beyond doubt, his duty to be prompt and vigilant in taking such an offender into custody. The aforesaid section of the consolidation act further provides: "Neither the chief of police, captains, or any other officer of police shall . . . receive any present or reward for official services rendered or to be rendered, unless with the knowledge and approbation of a majority of the police commissioners." Whether or not this provision of the act has been repealed by subsequent legislation is not a matter of concern; for, conceding its present existence, it has no bearing upon this case. Whatever rewards police officers may accept from private parties with the consent of the police commission is another and entirely different matter. Here there is no question of agreement or consent upon the part of all parties interested. The state is here standing upon its strict legal right, and, through one of its duly authorized officers, objecting to the payment of this money.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: Temple, J.; Van Fleet, J.; Harrison, J.; Henshaw, J.

McFarland, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The authorities are not all to the point that an offer of reward, even by a private person to an officer, is void because against public policy. There are authorities the other way, some of which are recited in respondent's brief. Giving full force to the reasons upon which the cases are cited in the prevailing opinion were decided, I am still inclined to think that the better doctrine is stated in City Bank v. Bangs, 2 Edw. Ch. 97, where, speaking of an offer of reward, it is said: "The object is to awaken public attention to the subject, excite vigilance, and call forth extraordinary individual efforts for the accomplishment of the end proposed to be gained. All who choose to engage in it are at liberty to do so, and he who succeeds becomes entitled to the reward, upon the ground of his superior vigilance or sagacity, or of his having used greater exertions or encountered dangers which others were disinclined or not in a situation to hazard. When, therefore, we view the object of rewards offered thus publicly, in their true light, a participation in their benefits or in the receipt of them cannot be considered wholly incompatible with the duties of public officers or against the policy of the law." When a policeman or sheriff is informed that a horrible murder had been committed in a remote county, and that the perpetrator is at large, it may be said that the officer is under some general official obligation to see if the offender is lurking in his city or county; but I cannot see how public policy is outraged by an offer which will spur such officers to extraordinary vigilance and exertion in the interest of public justice. However, when the legislature, by statutory law, expressly authorizes a thing to be done, there is no room for judicial inquiry as to the policy of the thing authorized. In such cases the legislature declares the policy, as it has the right to do, and the statute can be attacked only on the ground of its unconstitutionality; and there is no such attack here. The only question left, therefore, is as to the construction of the section of the Code involved; but, in my opinion, there is here no field for the exercise of any principle of construction, because the language of the section is perfectly plain and clear. It makes no exception of any person or persons. It does not provide, as it might have done, that the governor may offer a reward to any person "not being a sheriff, marshal, constable, or policeman;" and I do not think that there is good reason for judicially inserting an exception which the legislature did not make. In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

Nina DUMAS, Appt.,
v.
NORTHWESTERN NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

(.....D. C.....)

1. Insurance companies have the same rights as individuals to limit their liability and to impose whatever conditions they please upon their obligations, not inconsistent with public policy or statutory provisions.
2. The purchaser of property on the installment plan, of which the title is reserved in the seller, has not a sole and unconditional ownership of it, within the meaning of an insurance policy.
3. A condition that an insurance policy shall not be valid if the property is mortgaged does not contravene any public policy.
4. An express condition that a policy shall be void if the insured is not the sole and unconditional owner of the property, or if it is mortgaged, will render it void if the conditions are broken, even if the insured made no representations as to the property or any fraudulent concealment of the facts.
5. Failure to read an affidavit which is short, plain, and simple will not relieve the affiant from the effect of false swearing as to the title and lack of encumbrances on the property to avoid insurance thereon, although the affidavit was prepared by the insurance agent.
6. The indivisibility of an insurance policy upon a certain amount of furniture as a whole renders it entirely void, when it is avoided as to part by breach of conditions as to title and encumbrances on the property and false swearing respecting them, under a provision that "this entire policy shall be void" in various contingencies, including those of encumbrances on the property or lack of sole ownership or false swearing by the insured.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court for the District of Columbia in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James H. Hayden and Robert C. Hayden, for appellant:

There was no breach on the part of the appellant of the contract of insurance.

The agent of the insurance company put no question whatsoever to the appellant with regard to her ownership of or interest in the property to be insured, and, in consequence of this fact and in ignorance of the conditions contained in the policy about to be issued to her, she made no statement as to the manner in which she held the property.

Such being the fact, she certainly had the right to suppose that the appellee's agent had made inquiry as to all matters which the defendant deemed material; and to avoid the policy it must be proved that she concealed some material matter wilfully and fraudulently.

1 Wood, Ins. p. 517; Lancaster Ins. Co. v. Monroe, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 204; 2 Duer, Ins. § 81, p. 689.

Unless an encumbrance is intentionally and fraudulently concealed, and where no inquiries are made as to the matter, the policy is valid even though it provides that if the insured be not the sole, absolute, and unconditional owner the policy shall be void.

Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Meschendorf, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 757.

The affidavit was prepared and presented to plaintiff by the adjuster of the insurance company, and he requested her to sign and verify it, and she did not read it before she did sign and verify it.

Appellant did not, simply by this act, forego her right to recovery.

Knop v. National F. Ins. Co. 101 Mich. 359; Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 421, 3 Am. Rep. 149; Clay F. & M. Stock Ins. Co. v. Beck, 43 Md. 358; Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Weaver, 70 Md. 536, 5 L. R. A. 478; Dupreau v. Libernia Ins. Co. 76 Mich. 615, 5 L. R. A. 671; Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fogelman, 85 Mich. 481; Johannes v. Standard Fire Office, 70 Wis. 196.

If there had been a breach, on the part of the appellant, of the contract of insurance, it would not have wholly avoided the policy, and she would be entitled in any event to recover pro rata on such of property as was hers absolutely.

Hobbs v. Memphis Ins. Co. 1 Sneed, 444; Quarrier v. Peabody Ins. Co. 10 W. Va. 507, 27 Am. Rep. 582.

The evidence was not such as to admit of but one reasonable view of the rights of the parties, and that view one utterly opposed to the plaintiff's right to recover. Under such circumstances a trial court should not direct a verdict for the defendant.

Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Carrington, 3 App. D. C. 101; Olmstead v. Webb, 5 App. D. C. 38; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Galway, 6 App. D. C. 143.

Messrs. A. S. Worthington and Charles L. Frailey, for appellee:

The evidence showed that a large part of the property insured at and prior to the taking out of the policy was encumbered by a chattel mortgage or deed of trust to secure the payment of a sum of money to Craig & Harding. This was a direct violation of the condition in the policy.

Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coös County, 151 U. S. 462, 38 L. ed. 235.

The condition in the policy is a substantial, material, and important one, and its violation avoided the policy.

It is not necessary for the insurer to inquire as to the title of the applicant.

Geiss v. Franklin Ins. Co. 123 Ind. 172; Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Weaver, 70 Md. 586, 5 L. R. A. 478.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit upon a policy of insurance against fire. At the trial in the court below, upon the conclusion of the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff, the court, upon the motion of the defendant, peremptorily instructed the jury to render a verdict for the defendant, which was done. From the judgment thereupon entered the plaintiff has appealed.

In this condition of the record there is no controversy as to the facts. The statement of the case is to be adduced from the testimony of the plaintiff and her witnesses; and this testimony shows the following condition of things.

On February 21, 1896, the plaintiff, Nina Dumas, was the occupant of a dwelling house, No. 1430 C. street, in the city of Washington, and had in it furniture stated to be of the value of about $4,000. Of this furniture she was the absolute owner of about one half, which she stated she had purchased in New York. A part of the residue, amounting in value to about $950, which had been purchased from a firm of Craig & Harding, in Washington, was encumbered by a deed of trust or chattel mortgage given to secure that firm in the sum of $671, which was part of the purchase money. Another part of this residue, amounting to about $800 in value, she had purchased from a firm, a company designated as the Julius Lansburgh Furniture & Carpet Company, upon what is known as the instalment plan, whereby the vendor company remained the owner of the property until full payment was made for it. And still a third part, consisting of a piano of the value of $275, had merely been rented by the plaintiff and was not owned by her.

Being thus in possession of this furniture, on the day specified she sought the agent of the defendant company at his office for the purpose of effecting an insurance against fire upon it in the sum of $3,000. She did not find the agent at the time, but subsequently on the same day the agent came to her house, and agreed, in consideration of a premium of $8, to let her have a policy of insurance for $2,500. He declined to examine the furniture, but accepted the plaintiff's estimate as to its value. No questions were asked and no representations were made in regard to the ownership of the furniture. Later in the day an employee of the company called at her house, received from her the premium of $8, and thereupon delivered to her the policy of insurance.

This policy contained the following conditions, which are material to the issues in the present case:

"This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof; or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated therein; or in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss.

"This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if . . . the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership; . . . or if the subject of insurance be personal property and be or become encumbered by a chattel mortgage; or if, with the knowledge of the insured, foreclosure proceedings be commenced, or notice given of sale of any property covered by the policy by virtue of any mortgage or deed of trust. . . ."

On February 27, 1896, six days after the issue of the policy, the plaintiff went to New York, leaving her house in charge of a servant, who, after closing it at night, left it and went to her own home. On the night of March 1, or the morning of March 2, 1896, during the absence of the plaintiff in New York, fire broke out in the house under some circumstances of suspicion, and the insured furniture was destroyed or greatly injured. The plaintiff thereupon returned to Washington, and employed one David J. Tavenner, who was or had been the salesman of Craig & Harding in making the sale to her of so much of the furniture as she had purchased from them, to appraise the amount of her loss. He did so; and she verified the appraisalment. To the appraisalment was annexed an affidavit executed by her, but prepared by the adjuster of the defendant company, in which she swore that she was the sole and absolute owner of all the articles enumerated in the schedule of the appraisalment, and that they were not encumbered in any way. This affidavit she states that she executed without reading it.

On March 5, 1896, she signed and verified another paper entitled "proof of loss," presented to her by the adjuster of the company for execution. In this paper she stated that the property described therein, which was the property claimed to have been destroyed, belonged to her, and that no other person had any interest therein.

On the evening of March 6, 1896, after some negotiations with the agents of the defendant company, the plaintiff, together with Tavenner, already mentioned, who seems to have been with her as her friend, was placed under arrest by private detectives, at whose suggestion does not appear, and taken to the station house. There she was kept until the evening of the next day, and was visited in the meantime by the agents of the company, who offered to procure her release, and to give her $50 if she would surrender her policy, execute a release to the company of all claims against it, and leave the city. To this she agreed. She executed the desired release, and received from the agents of the company the sum of $44.50 and a ticket to New York, with an intimation that, if she returned to Washington, she would be "pinched," whatever that expression means. She was put on a train to New York, but she did not go there. She returned to Washington, and on July 6, 1896, instituted the present suit.

Her declaration contains a special count and the common counts. In the former the policy of insurance is set forth and a breach of it by the defendant alleged. The defendant pleaded the general issue, the release above mentioned, and other pleas specifically to the effect that the plaintiff was not the absolute and unconditional owner of the property insured, that to portions of it she had no title, and that other portions were covered by chattel mortgage, all in violation of the conditions of the policy of insurance.

At the trial the facts hereinbefore mentioned, with other facts and details not deemed necessary here to be stated, were adduced by the plaintiff and her witnesses, and, as already stated, at the conclusion of the testimony on her behalf, the court directed a verdict for the defendant. The grounds of that direction, as set forth in the motion made for the purpose on behalf of the defendant, were four, namely:

1. Because the plaintiff had avoided her policy of insurance by declaring in her affidavit of March 5, 1896, that she was the absolute owner of all articles enumerated therein, and that the same were not encumbered in any way.

2. Because part of the furniture was encumbered by a chattel mortgage.

3. Because she had no title to any of the goods claimed to have been purchased from the Julius Lansburgh Company.

4. Because the piano did not belong to her.

It will be noticed that among the reasons assigned, the enforced release executed by the plaintiff is not mentioned. And certainly it was very proper to omit this proceeding from the further consideration of the court. We do not need to give it any consideration here; although it is insisted on in the brief of counsel for the appellee. If the case turned upon that release, our conclusion might be very different from that which we have reached.

There are six assignments of error by the appellant. Four of these raise the same substantial question, that there was no breach of the conditions of the policy of insurance by the plaintiff, either in executing the affidavit before mentioned, or in the fact that part of the property was covered by a chattel mortgage, or that the title to part of the property was not in her. The fifth has reference to the release executed by the plaintiff, while under duress, as is claimed. And the sixth is based upon the theory that the plaintiff had made a case wherein she was entitled in any event to go to the jury.

In view of what we have said, the fifth assignment need not be further considered here; and the sixth will be disposed of by what we have to say of the others. In connection with this last assignment, however, the point is made, that in any event the plaintiff should have been allowed to recover pro tanto for the property actually owned by her, even if as to the remainder of the property insured the objections of the defendant should be regarded as well taken. Of this in its order.

1. The burden of the argument on behalf of the appellant is that there was no fraudulent concealment of anything by her; and that if there was any omission of proper information it was the duty of the defendant company and its agents to inform themselves of the true condition of things by proper inquiry before the policy of insurance was issued. And the claim is that, in the absence of fraudulent concealment by the plaintiff, and in the absence of proper inquiry by the agents of the defendant company, the plaintiff is not chargeable with any breach of the conditions of the policy of insurance.

That there was apparent breach of the conditions of the policy is beyond all question. One of those conditions was that the policy should be void if the interest of the insured in the property should be other than that of unconditional and sole ownership. To one fifth of the property, or thereabouts—the piano valued at $275, and the property purchased from the Lansburgh Company, about $600—she had no title whatever. Even if it be conceded that she had an insurable interest, both in the piano, which she had only rented, and in the other property, of which the title had been expressly retained by the vendor, it is very clear that the interest was not that of unconditional and sole ownership.

Another of the conditions was that the policy should be void in the event that the property insured should be covered by a chattel mortgage. Nearly one quarter of the property—that purchased from Craig & Harding, and valued at $950—was encumbered by a chattel mortgage to secure the greater part of the purchase money yet due upon the property to that firm.

Yet another condition was that the policy should be void in case of false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss. After the loss in the case, the plaintiff, in an affidavit presented to the company and constituting part of her proof of loss, swore that she was the sole and absolute owner of all the articles enumerated in her schedule of her loss, and which comprised both the piano and the furniture contracted for with the Lansburgh Company; and in view of what has already been said, that statement was undoubtedly untrue, and therefore necessarily a violation of the condition of the policy.

But it is argued that there was no fraud in all this on the part of the plaintiff, and that, therefore, she ought not to be precluded from recovering. And cases are cited in which it is claimed that recovery has been allowed under somewhat similar circumstances.

We do not so understand the law. It is unnecessary, and it would be a hopeless task to enter upon the dreary wilderness of judicial decision upon the subject of insurance, with the view of deducing a rule from it for our government in the present instance. Courts have sometimes been too astute in their search for reasons to maintain the liability of insurance companies in the face of conditions limiting such liability. And yet a contract of insurance in this regard is no different from other contracts; and the function of courts is to construe them, not to make them. In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, insurance companies have the same right as individuals to limit their liability, and to impose whatever conditions they please upon their obligations not inconsistent with public policy; and the courts have no right to add anything to their contracts, or to take anything from them. If those contracts contain harsh and onerous conditions, which perhaps a court of equity might not enforce; if called on so to do, yet there is no compulsion, either legal or moral, on parties to deal with them upon the basis of such conditions. And certainly it would be a novel contention for parties to seek to enforce liability under such contracts in a court of common law, and at the same time to repudiate the express conditions upon which such liability is made to depend.

We must take it for granted, therefore, that our duty in the premises is to construe the contract of insurance before us according to its true legal intent and meaning, and not in any manner to vary or modify the instrument itself by disregard of any of its provisions. It is true, however, that this construction must be with reference to the well-established rule that, if a policy of insurance is so drawn as to require interpretation and to be fairly susceptible of two different constructions, the one will be adopted that is most favorable to the insured. Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coös County, 151 U. S. 452, 38 L. ed. 231.

In the sense of absolute ownership, clear and unencumbered, as commonly understood, the plaintiff had title only to about one half of the property which she sought to insure. With reference, however, to the portion of the property purchased from Craig & Harding, 40 L. R. A.

and which was covered by a chattel mortgage, she may, in view of the authorities on the point, be also regarded as the sole and unconditional owner. Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 82 Md. 421, 3 Am. Rep. 149; Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 5 Wall. 509, 18 L. ed. 524. But it is not apparent how, in any sense of the words, she can be regarded as the sole and unconditional owner of the residue of the property. The ownership of that residue was purely and simply conditional; and it would be difficult to conceive an ownership more distinctly of the character against which the defendant company sought to guard its liability. If, therefore, we are to give any force whatever to the condition in the policy of insurance that the person insured must be the sole and unconditional owner, we cannot hold that the condition was observed in regard to a considerable part of the property sought to be protected by this instrument. It may well be that the plaintiff had an insurable interest in all of it, possibly even in the piano, which she had only rented, and that the defendant company might have insured that interest, if only that had been presented to them for insurance. But certainly it was not the interest that was actually presented for insurance; it was not sole and unconditional ownership. And it does not follow that, even if the defendant would have insured, it would have done so on the same terms and conditions. On the contrary, in such cases, the terms and conditions are usually different from the case of either absolute or unconditional ownership.

We must conclude that, at least as to part of the property, about one fifth of it in value, the policy of insurance wholly failed, for the reason that the condition of insurance, requiring unconditional ownership in the plaintiff, was never performed by her.

2. It may be that it was in consequence of such decisions of the courts as those to which we have referred, wherein it was held that there was sole and unconditional ownership, in the legal sense of the policy of insurance, notwithstanding the existence of an outstanding mortgage, that insurance companies sought further to limit their liability by imposing conditions against such mortgages. But whatever may have been the suggestion for these conditions, it is very certain that they add limitations to the policy beyond that of sole and unconditional ownership, which we cannot disregard. It was the right of the company in this case to refuse to insure mortgaged property, and to provide that its policy of insurance, however otherwise conditioned, should not cover personal property encumbered by a chattel mortgage. As nearly one quarter of the property in question here was covered by a chattel mortgage, we find it impossible to understand how the policy can reasonably be construed so as to protect it.

3. But it is said that all this is of no consequence, inasmuch as the defendant company made no inquiry as to the true condition of things, and there was no fraudulent concealment on the part of the plaintiff. And there is excellent authority for the doctrine, that "as to the ordinary risks connected with the property insured, if no representations whatever are asked or given, the insurer must . . . be supposed to assume them; and if he acts without inquiry anywhere concerning them seems quite as negligent as the insured, who is silent when not requested to speak." Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 8 How. 235, 12 L. ed. 1061. The agents of insurance companies are usually experienced men, well informed as to the information which they should have in anticipation of the risk which they assume; and the rule is not unreasonable which would require them to make all due inquiry for the procurement of such information. Nor is it unreasonable that the insured should be held harmless from the mere failure to give information, when he is not interrogated, and when perhaps he is not aware of the importance or materiality of the matter to which the information should extend.

But this is not a case of representation or misrepresentation, of failure to give information or failure to elicit it by proper inquiry. The parties have deliberately put it into their contract, and have made it an essential condition of that contract that the contract itself should not be binding, if there was any mortgage on the property or the title was not that of unconditional ownership. There was no inhibition by law against the insertion of such a condition in the contract; and it may well be that its insertion was a matter of precaution, to guard as well against the negligence or failure of agents to elicit proper information, as against the negligence or failure, not fraudulent, of persons seeking insurance to give such information. The condition is not illegal, and does not contravene any rule of public policy; and even if its practical effect should be held to be to throw upon the insured party the burden of giving voluntarily the information which otherwise the insurer would have been required to elicit by proper inquiry, we know of no rule of law that would preclude parties from contracting to that effect, if they so desire.

In the case of Clark v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 8 How. 235, 12 L. ed. 1061, to which we have referred for the rule imposing the burden of inquiry upon the insurer rather than that of voluntary information upon the insured, the matters there referred to as proper knowledge for the insurer were the circumstances of the use of the property, to which the minds of insurers would naturally be directed, and those of parties insured might not be so called. But it seems to us that a different condition of things arises, when a person solicits insurance on property not his own, and which he knows not to be his own; and when to the proposed insurer the very solicitation of insurance is the equivalent of a representation that the property, for which the policy is sought, is the unconditional and absolute property of the person seeking the insurance. Assuredly it would not be held that, if the person had no title at all of any kind, and the policy therefore was simply a wagering policy, yet he should still be entitled to recover, if the company or its agents had made no inquiry in regard to his ownership. Neither ownership nor the character of ownership is usually a subject of inquiry in such cases.

In support of the contention of the plaintiff, two cases from Kentucky are cited. Lancaster Ins. Co. v. Monroe, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 204, and Fire- man's Fund Ins. Co. v. Meschendorf, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 757. But the decisions in those cases are expressly based upon the provisions of the statute law of the state of Kentucky, which are to the effect that "no misrepresentation, unless material or fraudulent, shall prevent a recovery on a policy of insurance." Ky. Acts 1874. Were they the result of the application of general principles of law, it is not apparent how they could be supported in reason or with any regard to the inalienable rights of parties to contract with each other as they may deem proper, so long as their contracts are not prohibited by law. We cannot read the word "fraudulent" into the contract before us, when neither the letter nor the spirit requires it for the purpose of reasonable interpretation. The contract deals with facts and conditions, not with the intention of the parties with reference to those conditions.

4. What we have said in regard to the matter of the title to the property and the conditions of the policy in reference thereto, will serve in great measure to dispose of the matter of the affidavit made by the plaintiff for the purpose of procuring payment to her of the amount of the policy of insurance. That this affidavit had been prepared by the agent of the defendant company, and that the plaintiff did not read it before she executed it, are circumstances that cannot for a moment entitle themselves to consideration. The affidavit was short, plain, and simple. It was not difficult to be understood; and the failure of the plaintiff to read it before execution only aggravates the falsity of its statements. There is no pretense that she was in any manner prevented from reading it, or that there was any fraud on the part of the agents of the defendant in its procurement. It was precisely the thing against which the defendant company sought to guard itself when it provided that the policy of insurance should be void in case of any false swearing about the matter either before or after the loss. Unless, therefore, we are to hold that this condition in the contract in regard to false swearing was meaningless or void—and we are not aware of any rule of law upon which we can so hold—we cannot see how its effect in vitiating the policy of insurance can be avoided.

The case of Knop v. National F. Ins. Co. 101 Mich. 359, is cited, in which there was a suit like the present upon a policy of insurance. There, also, there was a provision in the policy that it should be void if the interest of the insured were other than unconditional and sole ownership. Whether there was any provision in regard to false swearing, as in the policy before us, does not appear from the report of the case, and we are not otherwise advised. But after the loss, the insured party made an affidavit to the effect that he was the sole and unconditional owner. The court in its opinion said: "It has been repeatedly held that such a condition will not invalidate the policy in such case. . . . Nor do we think that the statement in the affidavit, made after the loss, that he was the sole and unconditional owner, would prevent a recovery." The reason given for this latter conclusion is that the false affidavit could not have prejudiced the defendant company.

Plainly that case has no application to this now before us. In that case there was, as here, a chattel mortgage upon the insured property, which was not disclosed to the insurer at or before the issue of the policy. But the court held, in accordance with what seems to be the preponderance of authority on that point, that, notwithstanding such mortgage, the plaintiff was in law, and according to the true legal intent and meaning of the policy of insurance, the sole and unconditional owner; and therefore the condition of the policy had not been broken. But there was no condition there, as here, against the existence of mortgages upon the property; and there was no such absence of ownership as here with reference to part of the property.

When in that case the court held that the plaintiff was the sole and unconditional owner of the insured property, notwithstanding a mortgage existing against it, it would have been entirely logical, in reference to the affidavit, to hold that this paper was not false. For if the plaintiff was in truth the sole and unconditional owner of the property, it was no falsehood for him to say so, either in an affidavit or otherwise. In the opinion it would seem to be conceded that the affidavit was false; but the falsehood was sought to be excused on the ground that it did no injury to the defendant. This may also have been a correct statement of the law as applicable to that case. But it does not appear in that case, as it appears here, that false swearing on the part of the insured, whether prior to a loss or subsequent thereto, operated to avoid the contract, by being made an integral and essential condition of the contract. We cannot say that the insertion of such a condition in the contract was either illegal or improper. Harsh perhaps it may have been; but it was competent for the parties to make it, and they made it. We may conjecture even that it was inserted in the policy of insurance, in view of the decision in the case of Knop v. National F. Ins. Co. or of some similar decision elsewhere. Whatever may have been the motive, it is not illegal; it is part of the contract, and it cannot be disregarded by us. As part of the contract, it makes a very different case from that of a false affidavit made in the ordinary course of the proof of loss, and which has not entered into the contract itself as a condition of the validity of the policy.

5. From what we have said, it necessarily follows, in our opinion, that as to about one half of the property supposed to have been covered by the policy of insurance, that policy was or became void by its own express limitations, the condition of the plaintiff's interest in the property, and the affidavit executed by the plaintiff. But it is argued on behalf of the appellant that this should not preclude a recovery, pro tanto, in respect of so much of the property as actually belonged to the plaintiff and to which she had full right and title. Again, the answer to this is found in the contract itself. It is one single and entire contract; and the conditions which operate to invalidate it expressly provide that it shall be avoided in its entirety. Even in the absence of such express provisions this would be the result in the present case in any event by operation of law. The contract is plainly indivisible—certainly not divisible upon any such lines as those indicated in this contention. The defendant insured a certain amount of furniture as a whole upon certain terms and conditions. We cannot assume that it would have insured a part only on the same terms and conditions, inasmuch as the risk might be wholly different. So to assume would be to assume to make a contract for the parties; and such assumption we have repudiated as being beyond the province of the courts, and indeed beyond the province of any other authority than the parties themselves.

The patient ingenuity and evidently conscientious and laborious research of counsel for the appellant have failed to find more than two adjudicated cases in apparent support of their contention in this regard; and we are unable to see that those cases have that effect. In one of them from the supreme court of the state of Tennessee, the case of Hobbs v. Memphis Ins. Co. 1 Sneed, 444, action was brought on a policy of fire insurance, covering groceries owned by a partnership. One of the conditions of the policy was that it should be void if assigned in whole or in part. One of the partners, Hobbs, sold his interest in the property and assigned his interest in the policy to his copartner. The property was destroyed by fire, and the insurance company claimed a total forfeiture of the policy on the ground that it had been invalidated by the assignment. It was held by the court, however, that Henly, the copartner, was entitled to recover for his pro rata. But if there was error in this decision—and we are disposed to think there was, and that the decision cannot be sustained either on reason or on authority—it was that the remaining partner, Henly, was not allowed to recover for the whole property. For, in our opinion, the assignment by one partner to another was not such an assignment as was contemplated by the policy of insurance.

The other case cited is from West Virginia. It is the case of Quarrier v. Peabody Ins. Co. 10 W. Va. 507, 27 Am. Rep. 582, in which suit was brought upon a policy of insurance effected on four buildings and the fixtures therein. The policy provided that it should become void upon a sale or transfer of the property; and the contract of insurance was one entire contract. One of the buildings was sold; and subsequently all four of them were damaged by fire. A recovery was allowed for the three buildings retained by the person insured. But we fail to see wherein that is pertinent to the question before us. The claim of forfeiture in that case was wholly unwarranted. By the express terms of the policy itself, there could have been no forfeiture, except by the alienation of all the property. There was no provision in reference to a partial alienation. At the same time as the recovery by the insured could properly have been only in proportion to his loss and the total amount of the insurance, the decision was only just to permit such proportionate recovery. This was only the application of the principle which makes the amount of the policy the limit of recovery, and authorizes recovery only to the actual extent of the damage within that limit. In the case before us, if there were no question of the plaintiff's ownership of the property insured, and subsequently to the issue of the policy of insurance she had sold or disposed of some of the property, there might be room for the application of the doctrine of the case of Quarrier v. Peabody Ins. Co.; but as the case actually stands, it presents a very different aspect, and the rule of that case cannot apply.

The proposition that a policy of insurance, such as that shown in the present case, is an entire and indivisible contract, the consideration being entire, is amply supported by authority. Bowman v. Franklin F. Ins. Co. 40 Md. 620; Agricultural Ins. Co. v. Hamilton, 82 Md. 88, 30 L. R. A. 633; Gottelman v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 56 Pa. 210, 94 Am. Dec. 55;

Lee v. Howard F. Ins. Co. 3 Gray, 583; Geiss v. Franklin Ins. Co. 123 Ind. 172; Garver v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. 69 Iowa, 202; Stevens v. Queen Ins. Co. 81 Wis. 335; McGowan v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 54 Vt. 211, 41 Am. Rep. 848. The forfeiture necessarily operates to invalidate the whole policy.

From what we have said it follows that the plaintiff having shown by her own testimony that the policy of insurance upon which she sued had become void by its own express terms, had no case upon which to go to the jury; and the trial court was fully justified in peremptorily directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

The judgment appealed from must therefore be affirmed, with costs; and it is so ordered.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Dovey PARISH, Plff. in Err.,

v.

WESTERN & ATLANTIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

*1. Even if the evidence in the case was sufficient to find that the homicide of plaintiff's daughter was caused by being stricken by some part of a locomotive or car attached to a moving train, it also shows the further facts that the person injured was on the track, and in some other than an erect position, either sitting or lying thereon, and that such injury occurred at night, between 12 o'clock and daylight. These facts being true, it is a conclusion of law that the injured person could at least have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care, and there could be no recovery. The nonsuit was therefore right, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

+2. There was evidence from which the jury could have inferred that the person for whose homicide this action was brought was killed by the running of the train of the defendant company, and upon that evidence the presumption of negligence arose against the company. Consequently, the company might have been held liable, and, there being no evidence as to the circumstances attendant upon the commission of the homicide which either rebuts that presumption or shows that the person injured did not exercise ordinary care, the granting of a nonsuit was erroneous.

SIMMONS, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was no evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's daughter was killed by the railroad, except the fact that she was found lying dead near the track, her body bearing certain marks of violence, described below. Her body was found at a point not near a public crossing. There was a hole in the left side of her head, behind the ear, where her skull was crushed to such an extent that an egg would lie in the cavity. At about 8 o'clock in the morning on the 12th of December the railroad train passed the point where she, about daylight of the same morning, was found. Taking into consideration the time of the year, the finding of her body must, therefore, have taken place at about 6 o'clock of the morning. One witness said that when he first saw her blood was running from the wound. The physician who examined her after her death testified that blood would cease running ten or fifteen minutes after the death of a person who died from such a wound; that in his opinion a person who had received such a wound might live fifteen minutes or even a half an hour. There was no blood upon the track of the railroad, there was no indication that the deceased had been dragged by the engine or cars, and her clothing was not torn. She was lying at right angles to the track, her feet near the rail. On the left side of her head was the indentation referred to above, and on the right side were a few little gashes. Several witnesses testified as to how the accident might have happened, but it was seen by no one. One witness said that the deceased might have been struck by the steps of the locomotive; another that she might have been struck by the elliptic springs that project from the trucks. These, however, are mere conjectures. To me it seems unreasonable to suppose that if a woman had been struck by the train at 3 o'clock, and her head crushed as the physician testified it was, she could have lived for nearly three hours. She must have lived that length of time after the accident, if she was killed by the train; for one of the witnesses testified that when he found her, at daylight, blood was running from the wound in her head, and, according to the testimony of the doctor to the effect that in such cases blood ceases to flow in ten or fifteen minutes, she must have been alive less than fifteen minutes before the first witness saw her.

Whether this view of the case is correct or not, the majority of the court think immaterial since, in their opinion, the plaintiff will in neither event be entitled to recover. If the deceased was killed by the train, the testimony shows that she could not have been on the track in a standing or walking position; for she would then have been badly mutilated. So, if she had been directly on the track in any position. The nature of the wounds was such that they could have been inflicted by only certain parts of the engine or cars, and these portions were so located as not to strike her head, had she been standing or walking either on or near the track. She must, therefore, have been on the ends of the cross-ties or near the track,—so near that the steps or elliptic springs could have struck her head,—and she must have been sitting or lying down. The watchman testifies that at midnight he passed with a lantern the spot where she was subsequently found, and that at the time he passed she was not there. If she was struck at all by the train, she must have sat or lain near the track after the watchman passed, and was doubtless asleep when the train passed. Standing, she could not have received the wound in her head, and no other wound on any portion of her body, if the wounds were made by a train. If this theory be correct, she was guilty of the grossest negligence in sitting near the track of a railroad and going to sleep in the night-time. The evidence shows that the train which at 3 o'clock passed the place where she was found was moving at a speed of from 35 to 40 miles an hour. It would have been impossible for the engineer to have stopped the train in time to avoid striking her in the distance she could be seen by the headlight.

Section 2822 of the Civil Code declares: "No person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property where the same is done by his consent, or is caused by his own negligence." Section 3880 is: "If the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover." For a person to sit or lie down upon or near the track of a railroad at night, and to go to sleep there, is gross negligence. He knows that trains are constantly passing. The railroad track is itself a warning of danger to everyone who goes upon it; and whoever does so, especially in the night-time, takes his life in his own hands.

In the case of Sims v. Macon & W. R. Co. 28 Ga. 98, the report of the case shows that Sims' slave, in the daytime, was sitting on the end of a cross-tie, and was struck by the engine, and killed. He could have been seen by the engineer at a distance of several hundred yards. The whistle was not blown until the cars came within about twenty steps of him. He gave no heed to the notice (the presumption is he was asleep), and was struck and killed as above stated. He could have seen the train about 1,000 yards up the road. Sims sued the railroad company for the value of the slave, and on motion a nonsuit was granted. Benning, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Was the court below right in granting the nonsuit? We think so? The case, on the part of the suffering party, Sims, was a case of the grossest negligence. There is not a single thing to serve as an excuse for his negro's being on the railroad track of the company; and that track was a place of notorious danger. To go asleep in such a place could be nothing short of an act of the grossest negligence."

The case of Raden v. Georgia R. Co. 78 Ga. 47, was one where "two boys, seventeen years of age, started from the house of their employer at night to go to the homes of their mothers for the night. Fifteen or twenty minutes after they left, the service train on the railroad went by. They had had plenty of time to have crossed the railroad and reached home. They were struck by a train at a public road crossing; one of them was killed, and the other seriously injured. The witness by whom the plaintiffs sought to establish their right to recover, testified that the boy who died had told him that they had stopped at the crossing, and the witness was satisfied that they were asleep. . . . Held, that a nonsuit was properly granted. To go to sleep on a railroad crossing was such negligence and recklessness as would prevent a recovery, even though the railroad company might have been negligent." Blandford, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Even if the railroad company had been negligent, yet if the person injured could have avoided the consequences thereof to himself by ordinary care, he cannot recover [citing the Code section above]. So it appears to us that ordinary care would have induced anyone not to go to sleep on a crossing of a railroad, and the mere going to sleep on the railroad crossing was great negligence and recklessness on the part of these boys. The testimony submitted by the plaintiffs showed that these injuries were caused by their own negligence and the want of ordinary care to avoid the same." This was held, although the boys were, when struck, on a public crossing.

In the case of Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 78 Ga. 694, it appears that Smith, shortly before the day, while it was yet dark, got on the railroad track at a crossing, turned down the track, using it as a walk, and going only about 65 or 70 yards, when the train, running at high speed, struck him, threw him off the track, crushed his leg, and injured him seriously. Bleckley, Ch. J., in discussing Smith's right to recover, said: "It would be flagrantly unreasonable and improbable to presume that he or anyone else had the shadow of a right to use the track, especially at such an hour, on any other condition. The train was on its regular schedule time. He quietly walked along upon the track as if it belonged to him; the train struck him, knocked him down and broke his leg, those on the engine not seeing him or being aware of his presence. It was at least as much his business to look for the engine as it was the engineer's business to look for him. The engine was a much larger object than he was; it carried a headlight, and could have been seen as far as he could. It was not possible for the engineer to have discovered him on the track sooner than he could have seen the headlight. The presence of the engine was more to be expected by him than his presence was to be expected by the engineer. He had much less reason to be surprised than the engineer had. As a matter of fact, to walk along the middle of a railroad track, between crossings, when it is dark, and without knowing and remembering whether a train is due or not, and without looking out in both directions for trains that may be due, and without listening attentively and anxiously for the roar and rattle of machinery, as well as for the sound of bell or whistle, is gross negligence." In the further discussion of the case (p. 700, 78 Ga.) it is said: "A person, while grossly negligent himself, has no legal right to count on due diligence by others, but is bound to anticipate that others, like he has done, may fail in diligence, and must guard not only against negligence on their part, which he might discover in time to avoid the consequences, but also against the ordinary danger of there being negligence which he might not discover until too late. Smith shows by his own testimony, that he did not discover his danger. If he had been on the crossing, or at any place he was by right entitled to be, he would have been warranted in assuming that the whole world would be diligent in respect to him and his safety, but, as he was engaged in an act of gross negligence himself, he ought to have anticipated that somebody else might fail in diligence, and that the consequences might come down upon him before he discovered the negligence." The trial judge had refused a new trial, and this judgment was reversed, although the injury had occurred in an incorporated town. Subsequently, when the case was again tried in the superior court, and substantially the same evidence was introduced, the trial judge granted a nonsuit, which was affirmed by this court. Smith v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 82 Ga. 801.

In the case of Southwestern R. Co. v. Hankerson, 61 Ga. 114, it was held that, "if one voluntarily becomes drunk, and consequently falls down, or lies down, in a state of insensibility, on a railroad track, so that he is injured by a passing train, he cannot recover for injuries so received, even though there may have been contributory negligence on the part of the employees of the road."

In the case of Wilds v. Brunswick & W. R. Co. 82 Ga. 667, it was held that "one knowingly and needlessly walking at night upon a railroad track can, by the use of ordinary diligence, avoid being run over by a train, unless it appears that, owing to some special fact or circumstance, the use of such diligence would prove ineffectual." Bleckley, Ch. J., in discussing the case, said: "The homicide occurred at night, several hundred yards from any public crossing; and the only reason why there was any such unfortunate calamity was that the company and the deceased were both attempting to use the track at the same time. The company had a right to its use; the deceased had none. There is no explanation whatever as to why he did not avoid the consequences of the company's negligence. That he could have done so by exercising the care of a prudent person is manifest. . . . From the facts set out in the official report, it will be seen that this killing cannot be accounted for except upon the theory that the plaintiff's husband was grossly negligent. Had he been in the use of ordinary care, it seems impossible that he could have been in the way of the train at such an hour and in such a place."

We think that the principles announced in the above-cited cases by this court should control the disposition of this case. The facts here are as strong or stronger in favor of the nonsuit than the facts in the cases cited. Here was a young woman wandering about in the dead hours of the night. She seated herself on the ends of the cross-ties, or near the track of the defendant's road. There was no public crossing near where she stopped. Presumably she fell asleep. The defendant's train passed along on its schedule time, and it is claimed that the deceased was killed thereby. The only theories under which the homicide can be charged to the passing train make the deceased woman's conduct necessarily such as to constitute, under the decisions cited supra, negligence so gross that her mother cannot recover, even if the railroad was somewhat in fault. It is argued, however, that she may have been taken suddenly ill, and been compelled to stop where she did, and that therefore the railroad ought to be put upon its explanation. If such were the circumstances, how could the servants and agents of the railroad company have known anything about her sudden illness? It was in the night, and they had no reason to believe or suspect that she would be upon the track at that place. Had it been at a public crossing, then the law requires them to look specially to see if any person or thing is on the crossing. Besides, in the case of Wilds v. Brunswick & W. R. Co. 82 Ga. 667, both in the syllabus and in the opinion, it is strongly intimated that this fact of sudden illness must be made to appear by the plaintiff, and not the defendant; and in such a case we think the burden would be upon the plaintiff to show the sudden attack of illness, in order to rebut the presumption of want of ordinary care raised by the circumstances attending the homicide.

It is also contended that the Cases of Hankerson and Wilds were so decided because it appeared that they were drunk at the time they were injured. Wilds' Case was not put upon that ground at all, nor do we see that it matters in principle whether gross negligence is committed by one who is sober or by one who is drunk. If there could be any extenuation at all, it would seem that it should be in favor of the drunken man. The sober man who is guilty of gross negligence in walking upon the track in the night-time, or in sitting upon the track, or lying upon it asleep, does so while in possession of all his faculties. With the drunken man it is different, and his negligence arises, not so much from what he does while intoxicated, as from his act in placing himself in that condition.

It is also contended that, under our Code, when it is shown that a person is killed or injured by a railroad train, the law presumes that the company was negligent. This is true, and ordinarily it is incumbent upon the railroad company to show that it exercised all reasonable care at the time of the accident; but where the plaintiff's own evidence shows that he was guilty of gross negligence, the presumption against the company is rebutted or overcome, and the plaintiff cannot recover, even though the company may have been at fault. We think, for these reasons, and under the principles of the cases above cited, that the court did not err in granting a nonsuit in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

Lumpkin, P. J., and Atkinson, J., dissenting:

Our objection to the disposition which the trial judge, with the approval of a majority of this court, has made of this case, is that we believe it amounts to a usurpation of a function which properly belongs to a jury. The evidence does not affirmatively show in what manner the death of the plaintiff's daughter was occasioned. It is a thing which has to be reasoned out from the established facts; and this, under our system, is peculiarly an appropriate task for a jury. The testimony would support a number of different theories. That adopted by the court and discussed in the foregoing opinion is certainly a plausible one; but we cannot undertake to say that, as matter of law, it is correct. The argument in support of it is strongly put by the Chief Justice. Such an argument, if addressed to a jury, ought to have great, if not convincing, weight. At the same time, they would not be obliged to accept and follow it. A very strong argument could be made upon the evidence in this record in support of a contention that the deceased was not killed by a train of the defendant. It is not, however, insisted 40 L. R. A.

that a finding that she was so killed would have been unwarranted. The truth is, none of us know, or can ever know, exactly how she came to her death. We do not wish to be understood as entertaining the view that the plaintiff ought necessarily to have had a verdict. Our position simply is that whether she was entitled to recover was a question for a jury. Upon the assumption that the deceased was killed by a passing train of the defendant, the plaintiff had in her favor a legal presumption that the company was negligent and therefore liable. This presumption was not, in our opinion, rebutted; nor are we able to agree with our brethren in saying that the evidence conclusively shows the deceased to have been wanting in ordinary care. None of the cases cited are authoritative or controlling in the case at bar. Each depends upon its own peculiar facts, and no one of them is precisely like the case in hand. It is not our purpose to discuss the evidence. We simply desire to present in this brief form our reasons for being unable to concur in the judgment of this court affirming that of the trial court in granting a nonsuit.

SAVANNAH, FLORIDA, & WESTERN

1. When goods are shipped under a bill of lading stipulating for their delivery to the order of the consignor, an indorsement by him upon the bill of lading directing delivery to a third person, or to his order for collection, in effect makes such person the consignee; and, although such bill of lading may further stipulate that its surrender shall be required before the delivery of the goods at destination, delivery by the carrier without requiring such surrender, if made to such consignee, or upon his order or by his authority, involves no breach of duty to the consignor.

2. Where in such case the bill of lading was indorsed to a partnership, the carrier was authorized to deliver upon a written order signed by one of the partners, though he may have privately intended the signing of the order to be his individual act only; the carrier's agent having no information to this effect, and the circumstances being such as to warrant him in treating the giving of the order as the act of the partnership.

3. The evidence in the present case demanded a verdict for the defendant.

property which had been placed in defendant's possession, for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wooten & Wooten for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Erwin Du Bignon and Chisholm W. L. Clay for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the Chicago Packing & Provision Company against the Savannah, Florida, & Western Railway Company for damages alleged to have been occasioned to the plaintiff because of a wrongful delivery by the defendant of certain meat to N. L. Ragan. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff had shipped the meat in question to Albany, Georgia, consigned to its own order, under bills of lading each of which contained a direction to notify Ragan, and each stipulating that its surrender should be required by the carrier before delivery of the goods at destination. Upon each of these bills of lading was an entry in the following words, signed by the plaintiff: "Deliver to Hobbs & Tucker, or order, for collection." Clark, the agent of the railway company at Albany, without requiring a surrender of the bills of lading, delivered the meat to Ragan upon written orders which were as follows:

E. N. Clark, Agent:

Let N. L. Ragan have car meat on dry track, and I will be responsible for B/L.

May 18th, 1898. A. W. Tucker.

Ed. N. Clark, Agent:

Please let Nevil [meaning Ragan] have one car meat, and I will stand for B/L.

Yours, truly, A. W. Tucker.

Tucker testified, in substance, that in giving the above orders to Ragan, it was his private intention that so doing should be regarded as his individual acts; but he did not so inform Clarke, the agent. The circumstances, as disclosed by the evidence, were such as to warrant the latter in treating the giving of these orders as acts of Hobbs & Tucker; that firm being at the time in possession of the bills of lading. It further appeared that, at the time the meat was delivered to Ragan, he had not paid to Hobbs & Tucker drafts drawn on him by the plaintiff for the price of the meat, which drafts had been forwarded to Hobbs & Tucker along with the bills of lading. Upon substantially the same state of facts as above recited, this same plaintiff had previously brought an action of bail trover against Hobbs & Tucker, and obtained a judgment thereon, which was affirmed by this court. See 98 Ga. 576. The question now is, Was the railway company also liable to the plaintiff? If a natural person consigned goods to his own order under a bill of lading of the character above indicated, and called in person upon the carrier's agent at the point of destination, demanded a delivery of the goods, and thereupon received the same, it certainly could not be questioned that, as between the consignor and the carrier, such delivery would be good, and would free the carrier from further liability to the consignor, although the bill of lading may have not been produced and surrendered in accordance with the stipulation therein contained. While in such a case the carrier might not, as against one who had in good faith and in due course of business obtained the bill of lading properly indorsed, be protected by a delivery to the original consignor, surely the latter would have no cause of complaint against the carrier. If such consignor could thus obtain a delivery of the goods to himself in person, what difference in principle would it make if, instead of doing this, he by a written order directed delivery to another, who obtained the goods upon such order without producing and surrendering the bill of lading? In either case, looking at the transaction with reference only to the consignor and the carrier, the latter would have done all that the former had any right to require of it. In other words, the stipulation in such a bill of lading, requiring its surrender upon delivery of the goods, is for the benefit of the carrier, and not that of the consignor. The plaintiff in the present action was not a natural person, but it made Hobbs & Tucker its agents, and directed delivery to them, or to their order. Treating the papers signed by A. W. Tucker as orders of the firm, the carrier complied with its contract with the Chicago Packing & Provision Company when it delivered the meat upon these orders. The effect of the indorsement entered upon the bills of lading was, as between the consignor and the railway company, to make Hobbs & Tucker the real consignees. In the case of Boatmen's Sav. Bank v. Western & A. R. Co. 81 Ga. 231, this court held that where goods were shipped to the consignor's order, the bill of lading being indorsed in blank and negotiated for value as security for a draft drawn by the consignor on a third person, he being the party to be notified of the shipment, the carrier had no right, as against an innocent holder of the bill of lading, who had acquired the same in due course of trade, to make delivery to such third person without his producing the bill of lading, "or authority from the holder thereof." Here was a clear recognition of the protection which the law gives to the innocent holder of a bill of lading thus acquired, and also a strong intimation that authority for a delivery from a legal holder or owner of the bill of lading would be sufficient to authorize delivery without a production of the bill of lading itself. It was, however, insisted here that, even assuming the above reasoning to be perfectly sound and correct, it was not strictly applicable to the present case, because the indorsement directing delivery to Hobbs & Tucker, or order, was not general in its terms, but qualified by the use of the words "for collection." In this connection, the position was taken that the order for delivery to Hobbs & Tucker was not absolute, but to a certain extent conditional, and therefore the railway company could not safely and lawfully make delivery upon the order of this firm, unaccompanied by the bills of lading, without first ascertaining that Hobbs & Tucker had actually collected from Ragan the price of the meat. The contention was that Hobbs & Tucker were special agents of the Chicago Company, and that in dealing with them as such the railway company was bound to inquire into the extent of their authority. We do not think this is a case where the rule thus sought to be invoked is applicable. Hobbs & Tucker, under the facts recited, were the agents of the plaintiff through whom it sought and obtained delivery to itself under the terms of its contract with the carrier. The railway company did exactly what it agreed to do when it delivered the goods to the order of Hobbs & Tucker, and it had no concern with the plaintiff's reasons for giving this order or its purpose in so doing. The important right reserved by the plaintiff in its contract with the carrier was to name the person to whom delivery should be made in its behalf at the point of destination; and accordingly the plaintiff had no right to impose any obligation upon the carrier with reference to delivery upon its order, further than that which the law imposed upon the carrier, of exercising due diligence in ascertaining the identity of the person to whom delivery was directed to be made. Nor would it seem that the plaintiff ever contemplated that the defendant should do more than it was, under its contract, bound to do. The words "for collection" were vital as between Hobbs & Tucker and the plaintiff, as restrictive of the firm's authority to dispose of the goods after receiving them from the carrier, but were not even intended as qualifying the right of the firm to demand of the carrier a full and complete possession of the goods. In other words, the collection which Hobbs & Tucker were to make from Ragan was a matter to be attended to by them, as the agents of the plaintiff, after they had obtained possession of the meat. It was their duty to get the meat and hold it till Ragan paid for it, but this was a matter of no concern to the railway company. It certainly was not the consignor's resident collecting agent at the point of destination. The drafts were not sent to it, the bills of lading were not intrusted to it, and its relation to the transaction was that of carrier only. In a word, the company was not the plaintiff's agent for any purpose whatsoever, and it never in any manner undertook to vouch for the fidelity of Hobbs & Tucker, who were the trusted agents of the plaintiff, and to whom alone it looked for the collection of its money before its meat went into the possession of Ragan. In any view of the matter, the familiar rule that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer loss, it should fall upon the party who put it in the power of the wrongdoer to occasion the loss, is applicable here. The loss in the present case was not occasioned by the failure of the railway company to require the production and surrender of the bills of lading, but by the faithlessness of Hobbs & Tucker to their principal. Indeed, after the orders for the meat were given to Ragan, Hobbs & Tucker really held the bills of lading for the protection of the carrier, and the only risk it took was the possibility of that firm's indorsing the same to bona fide purchasers for value. In not insisting upon the surrender of the bills of lading as a prerequisite to delivery, the carrier simply waived a right which, as against the original consignor, it has reserved to itself under the terms of the contract of shipment. We are aware that in some jurisdictions there are decisions at least intimating, if not directly holding, contrary to some of the views above expressed; but, notwithstanding this, we are confident that we have ascertained and announced the true law of the present case.

As to the fact that Tucker alone signed the orders upon which Clark, the agent of the railway company, delivered the meat to Ragan, it is only necessary to say that, upon the identical state of facts here presented with reference to this matter, this court, in the case first cited supra, held that the acts of Tucker in giving the orders in question were properly treated by the agent to whom they were addressed as the acts of the firm itself.

STATE of Georgia.

(.....Ga.....)

"The verdict of a coroner's jury, in this state, is advisory merely to the officers charged with the execution of the public law in cases of homicide, binds no one as a judgment, has no probative effect as evidence, can prejudice the right of no one, and is therefore not subject to be reviewed, set aside, or quashed in the superior court, either at the instance of the person accused by it or of any other person.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Chatham County to review a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a petition for a writ to review and quash the verdict of a coroner's jury. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. N. West, T. P. Ravenel, H. A. Alexander, and King & Spalding for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. W. Osborne, Solicitor General, for the State.

Simmons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On February 11, 1894, an inquisition was taken in Chatham county, Georgia, before the coroner of that county, upon view of the body of J. C. Neve. The coroner's jury returned a verdict that Neve "came to his death from a gunshot wound inflicted by a weapon in the hands of Abe. Smalls, and we consider it murder." On March 24, 1897, Smalls filed in the superior court a petition praying "that the said inquest and verdict may be quashed, and that an order of melius inquirendum shall be granted by this court to the coroner of the county of Chatham, and that the said inquiry shall be held by the coroner super visum corporis." The grounds of this petition were that the inquisition and verdict do not show the time of the injury that caused the death of Neve, nor the time or place of such death, nor that such death occurred within the limits of the county of Chatham. The solicitor general of the circuit was served with this petition, and demurred to the same. The judge upon the hearing, sustained the demurrer, and denied the petition, and to this judgment Smalls sued out a writ of error to this court. The judge, in his order sustaining the demurrer of the solicitor general, says: "The incidents and characteristics of a coroner's inquest, under the old practice at common law, in England, where the verdict could be used for prosecuting the offenders without and instead of an indictment by a grand jury (see Clark, Crim. Proc. pp. 73, 130), and where it also fixed the value of the property forfeited, have disappeared in this state, the inquest and its finding amounting only to the finding of a court of inquiry." This reason we consider sufficient to sustain the judgment of which complaint is here made. At common law the verdict of a coroner's jury was, when it contained the subject-matter of an accusation, equivalent to an indictment of the accused for the homicide of the deceased. The writ of melius inquirendum issued in certain cases, as where the misbehavior of the coroner rendered necessary another inquiry super visum corporis. Our laws relating to the subject differ fundamentally from the common law. In this state, under our present system, the verdict of a coroner's jury is merely advisory to the officers charged with the execution of the public law, and may also make it the duty of the coroner to issue a warrant for the arrest of the person suspected of the homicide, but further than this it is without effect. Portions of the evidence given at the inquest may sometimes be admissible at the trial of the accused for the homicide, but the verdict has itself no probative effect as evidence, and is binding upon no one as a judgment. It can prejudice the rights of no one, and is therefore not subject to be reviewed, set aside, or quashed in the superior court, either at the instance of the person accused by it or of any other person. Under our system, the writ of melius inquirendum will not lie to such verdict. Penal Code, §§ 1235-1269.

*Headnote by SIMMONS, Ch. J.

NOTE.—As to necessity or propriety of coroner's inquest, see Lancaster Count v Holyoke (Neb.) 21 L. R. A. 394.

The judgment of the court below, sustaining the demurrer to the petition, was without error, and is therefore affirmed.

1. The uses of streets prevailing at the time of the taking or dedication of a street are not the limits of the uses to which the public is entitled and which the soil owner is deemed to have contemplated, but such uses are to be enlarged to include all of the additional and improved methods of attaining the same objects and enjoying the same privileges, not, however, to the denial or substantial impairment of the fee owner's use and enjoyment of his abutting property.
2. The reasonable use of the streets of a city for the equipment of a telephone system, including poles and wires, is not a new and additional servitude for which the abutting property owner is entitled to compensation.

The public easement in a highway is not limited to travel or transportation of persons or property or movable vehicles.

The setting of telephone poles is not necessarily an additional burden on abutting property and on the easement.

Hackney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Rufus Magee, the owner of a business property fronting upon one of the principal business streets of the city of Logansport, and the owner of the fee in the street, brought this suit for a mandatory injunction to cause the removal of a telephone pole placed by the appellee, Overshiner, in the curb line of the sidewalk in front of said property. The appellee, the owner of the telephone system in said city, placed said pole, and strung wires upon the same in the night-time, after protest by the appellant, and without compensation to or consent from him. The principal question in the case is as to whether such use of the street is a servitude, not within the contemplated uses of a city street, and therefore an additional burden upon the fee of the appellant, for which he should be compensated. The decisions of the courts of this country, so far from establishing a definite rule upon this question, are at such variance as to render hopeless any effort to reconcile them. At the threshold of our inquiries there are certain well-recognized propositions: The owner of the fee in a street which has been dedicated or condemned for a street is entitled to restrict its uses to such as are proper street uses, as stated by most of the decisions; to the uses contemplated at the dedication or condemnation. The public have only an easement for the proper uses of a street. When applied to new uses, the fee owner is entitled to compensation. When a use is by proper public authority, and is not an additional burden upon the fee, no compensation is due the fee owner. In the use of the public easement, there is no right to unreasonably burden the fee, to the special injury and damage of the fee owner. These general propositions, however, are of little service when we revert to the question: Is the telephone equipment an unnecessary or unreasonable obstruction, and a new and additional servitude? Will it suffice to say that because a street was dedicated or condemned fifty years ago, before electric inventions for lighting, communicating oral and telegraphic messages, and propelling street cars, were thought of, it could not therefore have been condemned or dedicated in contemplation of the uses therein of such inventions; or that, because gas had not been used as a method of lighting, the right to lay pipes to conduct the gas could not have been contemplated; or that because water, for protection against fire, had not been forced through pipes in the streets, such use could not have been contemplated; and so on as to the uses of the street for sewerage, for natural gas piping, for telegraph or telephone lines, above or below the surface of the street, or for the possible future uses of pneumatic tubes for the transmission of mails or parcels, and the distribution of steam or electricity for heating, etc.? If what was actually contemplated at the time of the dedication should be found to answer the question in every case, many of the uses common to the streets of every city would be additional servitudes, for which the fee owner would be entitled to compensation.

It must be, however, that the contemplated uses should be deemed to have been, not only in the walking, riding upon horseback and in wagons or other vehicles drawn by animals, in the going and returning upon business, social, religious, or political missions, but also by such methods of travel and communication, in addition or in substitution for those as might come into vogue and be accepted and recognized as proper and important uses of the street in the varying needs and demands of commerce, and the relations of man to man socially and otherwise. If this were not true, the way originally dedicated for a suburban highway, but by the growth of population becoming a city street, or the dedication of a village or town street afterwards becoming the principal thoroughfare of a great city, would be limited to the uses in vogue at the time and suited to the country road or the village or town street; and the growth of population, the advancement of commerce, and the increase in inventions for the aid of mankind would be required to adjust themselves to the conditions existing at the time of the dedication, and with reference to the uses then actually contemplated. That a dedication or condemnation is deemed to comprehend uses not actually in the minds of the parties at the time is seen from the almost unvarying rule that the electric street-railway systems are not a new use and an additional servitude, but are a new method of enjoying an old and ever existing use? Eichels v. Evansville Street R. Co. 78 Ind. 261, 41 Am. Rep. 561; Chicago & C. Terminal R. Co. v. Whiting, H. & E. C. Street R. Co. 139 Ind. 297, 26 L. R. A. 387; Lockhart v. Craig Street R. Co. 139 Pa. 419; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634. They carry the people by means of a propulsive force, which is a substitute for the horse or mule which formerly drew the cars. The horse car was accepted as a conveyance added to the numerous kinds of vehicles in use, and varying in the use of stationary tracks or railways. Poles and wires for electric lighting have been admitted as a proper use, on the ground that the streets are lighted, and their general uses thereby made safer and more expeditious. Incidentally, the same use has been employed for supplying light to public, business, and private houses. Sewers have been admitted as not constituting an additional servitude, because they afforded a means of drainage for the streets, although one use was in carrying the waste from buildings of the citizens. Gas mains and poles were admitted in like manner as electric lighting systems, and for like uses. In none of these cases has the inquiry been as to whether the fee owner contemplated such uses, or whether they were in vogue at the time of the dedication. They were always deemed to constitute a beneficial use of the streets, as in some degree aiding in the means or opportunities for conducting the affairs of the inhabitants, and in facilitating the communication indispensable to such affairs. Some of the authorities reaching the same conclusion, treat the uses of a street, arising from a dedication or condemnation, as expansive, not confined to uses already permitted, but, as civilization advances, admitting new uses. Angell & A. Corp. § 312; Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398; Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exchange Co. 60 Minn. 539, 28 L. R. A. 310; Detroit City R. Co. v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634. In Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exchange Co. 60 Minn. 539, 28 L. R. A. 310, it is said: "The question, then, is, What is the nature and extent of the public easement in a highway? If there is any one fact established in the history of society and of the law itself, it is that the mode of exercising this easement is expansive, developing and growing as civilization advances. In the most primitive state of society the conception of a highway was merely a footpath; in a slightly more advanced state it included the idea of a way for pack animals,—and, next, a way for vehicles drawn by animals,—constituting, respectively, the 'iter,' the 'actus,' and the 'via' of the Romans. And thus the methods of using public highways expanded with the growth of civilization, until to-day our urban highways are devoted to a variety of uses not known in former times, and never dreamed of by the owners of the soil when the public easement was acquired. Hence it has become settled law that the easement is not limited to the particular methods of use in vogue when the easement was acquired, but includes all new and improved methods, the utility and general convenience of which may afterwards be discovered and developed in aid of the general purpose for which highways are designed. And it is not material that these new and improved methods of use were not contemplated by the owner of the land when the easement was acquired, and are more onerous to him than those then in use." Judge Elliott, in his work on Roads and Streets (p. 529), quotes approvingly from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (p. 556) as follows: "When land is taken or dedicated for a town street, it is unquestionably appropriated for all the ordinary purposes of a town street; not merely the purposes to which such streets were formerly applied, but those demanded by new improvements and new wants. Among these purposes is the use for carriages which run on a grooved track; and the preparation of important streets in large cities for their use is not only a frequent necessity, which must be supposed to have been contemplated, but it is almost as much a matter of course as the grading and paving." Upon this branch of our inquiries, we must conclude, therefore, upon both reason and authority, that the uses of streets prevailing at the time of the taking or dedication of a street are not the limits of the uses to which the public is entitled, and which the soil owner is deemed to have contemplated, but that such uses are to be enlarged to include all of the additional and improved methods of attaining the same objects and enjoying the same privileges, not, however, to the denial or substantial impairment of the fee owner's use and enjoyment of his abutting property.

Is the telephone with its necessary poles and wires to be regarded as a new use, so disconnected from the purposes and objects in actual and legal contemplation when our city streets were dedicated or condemned as to constitute an additional servitude? The telegraph equipment, in its occupancy of the highway or street and its uses, is the nearest parallel we have to that of the telephone system. They are both inventions for communication by electricity. The equipment occupying the streets is the same. Some authorities have attempted to distinguish between the uses contemplated of city streets and of suburban highways. This distinction was recognized by this court in Kincaid v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co. 124 Ind. 579, 8 L. R. A. 602, where this language was employed: "There is an essential distinction between urban and suburban highways, and the rights of abutters are much more limited in the case of urban streets than they are in the case of suburban ways. We note the distinction between the classes of public ways, and declare that the servitude in the one class is much broader than it is in the other." In Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 299, it is said: "There is an essential difference between urban and suburban servitudes. The owner of the dominant estate in an urban servitude has very much more authority and much greater rights than the owner of the dominant estate in a suburban servitude. The easement of the one is much more comprehensive than that of the other. It is doubtful whether, of all servitudes, there is one so broad and comprehensive as that of a city in its streets." Again, the same author says, on page 307: "The easement in a city is so broad and exclusive as to leave very little, if any, private right of use in the owner of the servient estate."

If this doctrine is accepted,—and we think it must be,—the cases which hold that telegraph and telephone lines upon county highways are an additional servitude cannot be given much weight in determining the question before us. However, those cases which hold that these uses of the suburban ways are not an additional servitude, if their reasoning is tenable, apply to cases of city streets with greater force than to those of country ways. Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exchange Co. 60 Minn. 589, 28 L. R. A. 310, is such a case. In addition to the pertinent quotation already made from that case, we quote the following: "We are not unmindful that private property cannot be taken for a public use without compensation, however important that public use is. We are not forgetful of the fact that care should be taken that, in the popular zeal for modern public improvements, the burden of furnishing these improvements should not be shifted from the public, and imposed upon any particular class of individuals. But viewing as we do highways as being designed as public avenues of travel, traffic, and communication, the use of which is not necessarily limited to travel and the transportation of property in moving vehicles, but extends as well to communication by the transmission of intelligence, it seems to us that such a use of a highway is within the general purpose for which highways are designed, and, within the limitations which we have suggested, does not impose an additional servitude upon the land; in short, that it is merely a newly discovered method of using the old public easement." Another case of the same character is that of People v. Eaton, 100 Mich. 208, 24 L. R. A. 721. It was there said: "When these lands were taken or granted for public highways, they were not taken or granted for such uses only as might then be expected to be made of them, by the common methods of travel then known, or for the transmission of intelligence by the only methods then in use, but for such methods as the improvement of the country, or the discoveries of future times, might demand. . . . It would be a great calamity to the state if, in the development of the means of rapid travel and the transmission of intelligence by telegraph or telephone communication, parties engaged in such enterprises were compelled to take condemnation proceedings before a single track could be laid or a pole set." This latter 40 L. R. A. proposition can be the better appreciated by the supposition that in the city of Indianapolis a telephone company should be required to make legal condemnations as to the 20,000 or more properties fronting upon the streets of that city.

The cases of Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7; York Teleph. Co. v. Keesey, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 366, and Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398, are directly in point in holding that the erection of telephone systems upon city streets is not an additional servitude for which the adjacent fee owner is entitled to damages, but that such use, being an improved method of transmitting intelligence, and a substitute for the messenger upon foot, on horseback, or by vehicle, is within the contemplated uses at the time of the dedication. In the last case cited, it was said: "These streets are required by the public to promote trade and facilitate communications in the daily transactions of business between the citizens of one part of the city with those of another, as well as to accommodate the public at large in these respects. If a citizen living or doing business on one end of Sixth street wishes to communicate with a citizen living and doing business on the other end, or at any intermediate point, he is entitled to use the street, either on foot, on horseback, or in a carriage or other vehicle, in bearing his message. The defendants in this case proposed to use the street by making the telephone poles and wires the messenger to bear such communications instantaneously and with more despatch than any of the above methods, or any other known method of bearing oral communications. Not only would such communications be borne with more despatch, but to the extent of the number of communications daily transmitted by it, the street would be relieved of that number of footmen, horsemen, or carriages. If a thousand messages were daily transmitted by means of telephone poles, wires, and other appliances used in telephoning, the street through these means would serve the same purpose, which would otherwise require its use either by a thousand footmen, horsemen, or carriages to effectuate the same purpose. In this view of it, the erection of telephone poles and wires for transmission of oral messages, so far from imposing a new and additional servitude, would, to the extent of each message transmitted, relieve the street of a servitude or use by a footman, horseman, or carriage." In the case of Pierce v. Drew, 136 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7, a like reasoning is adopted. It is there said: "The discovery of the telegraph developed a new and valuable mode of communicating intelligence. Its use is certainly similar to, if not identical with, that public use of transmitting information for which the highway was originally taken, even if the means adopted are quite different from the post boy or the mail coach. It is a newly discovered method of exercising the old public easement, and all appropriate methods must have been deemed to have been paid for when the road was laid out." In Hershfield v. Rocky Mountain Bell Teleph. Co. 2 Mont. 103, it was held that the telephone equipment was not a new and additional burden upon the fee in a city street; quoting with approval from Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398. It is true that it was further held that the fee in the street was not in the abutting owner, but the proposition is distinctly adopted that it is germane to the proper use of streets to allow the setting of poles and wires for the telephone. In McCormick v. District of Columbia, 4 Mackey, 396, 54 Am. Rep. 284, the right of the telephone system to occupy the streets as a proper street use was held. The same right was recognized in Irwin v. Great Southern Teleph. Co. 37 La. Ann. 63; but it was placed upon the rule that the abutting owner could not complain, since the fee in the streets was in the public. We observe no means of distinguishing against the telephone equipment, on the ground that its poles are not in motion as are ordinary instruments of travel, since the permanent occupancy by the trolley poles, the gas and water pipes, etc., is maintained. See People v. Eaton, 100 Mich. 208 24 L. R. A. 721; York Teleph. Co. v. Keesey, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 866.

If the existence of private benefit to the fee owner were the turning point between the admission of those things not instruments of travel or movement, as the first cistern, the illuminating and heating gases, the water pipes, sewers, etc., and the telephone, it would be exceedingly difficult to establish the absence of private benefit to the property owner and business man in the employment of the telephone. Opposed to the view of the question as we have presented it are cited several authorities. Stowers v. Postal Telegr. Cable Co. 68 Miss. 559, 12 L. R. A. 864, involved the right to place telegraph poles upon the sidewalk in the city of Vicksburg. The controlling portion of the opinion is as follows: "There is some conflict in the authorities, but the decided weight is to the effect that telegraph companies form no part of the equipment of a public street, but are foreign to its use, and that where the abutting owner is the owner of the fee to the center of the street he is entitled to additional compensation for the additional burden placed upon his land. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 181, citing Board of Trade Telegr. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453; Dusenbury v. Mutual Union Telegr. Co. 11 Abb. N. C. 440; Metropolitan Teleph. & Telegr. Co. v. Colwell Lead Co. 18 Jones & S. 488; Broome v. New York & New Jersey Telegr. Co. 42 N. J. Eq. 141; contra, Hewitt v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 4 Mackey, 424; Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7; Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398." All of the cases cited by the court as in conflict with its opinion have been cited by us. Those cited in support of the opinion are by reference to Lewis on Eminent Domain, where the text is supported by the four cases first named by the court. Of those cases Board of Trade Telegr. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507, 47 Am. Rep. 453, involved the location of a telegraph pole in a rural highway as did also Dusenbury v. Mutual Union Telegr. Co. 11 Abb. N. C. 440. In Broome v. New York & N. J. Telegr. Co. 42 N. J. Eq. 141, the statute authorizing the establishment of the system required that the consent in writing of the property owner should be procured for the purpose, and without such consent the 40 L. R. A.

right was denied. The one case cited in the Stowers Case giving it any support was Metropolitan Teleph. & Telegr. Co. v. Colwell Lead Co. 18 Jones & S. 488. That case broadly asserts that the telegraph service is not a street use. That conclusion is at variance with our conclusion.

Among the other cases cited by counsel for the appellant are Eels v. American Teleph. & Telegr. Co. 148 N. Y. 133, 25 L. R. A. 640; Western U. Telegr. Co. v. Williams, 86 Va. 696, 18 L. R. A. 429; Postal Telegr. Cable Co. v. Irvine, 49 Fed. Rep. 113,—in each of which the question was as to the erection of telegraph poles upon a rural highway; and, if the distinction heretofore maintained is correct, they are not authorities in this case. In Willis v. Erie Telegr. & Teleph. Co. 37 Minn. 347, the judgment of the trial court, holding the telephone pole upon the city street an additional servitude, was affirmed upon a division of the court, and for the lack of a majority for either side of the question. It is therefore of little force as an authority. The only other decision thought to be analogous, to which we have been cited, or which our extended researches have discovered, is that of Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Mackenzie, 74 Md. 36. In that case the complaint was held sufficient upon the general allegation that the pole planted in the footway in front of the plaintiff's warehouse "obstructs and prevents the comfortable and reasonable and beneficial enjoyment and use of said premises" without permission and without payment of compensation. It was held to present a cause of action for a direct interference with the use of the warehouse, and the question of the use of a street or a highway as an additional servitude was expressly held not to be involved. It was held, also, that the legislature had not and could not authorize the substantial impairment of such beneficial enjoyment of one's property. We do not therefore regard that case as in point. Nor do we regard the New York Elevated Steam Railway Cases as in point. Those cases correctly held, as we think, that the use of the street for such railway was an obstruction of the easements of access, light, and air, if not an unanticipated street use.

Text-writers justly renowned have grouped many of the cases cited by us, and have variously expressed the opinion that the weight of authority forbids the use of an urban way for telephone equipment. We have found, however, no analysis of the cases, and no attempt by such writers to classify the cases applying to urban and suburban ways, and no effort has been made by them to consider the reasons supporting the cases which uphold the use as within the scope of proper street uses. As we have seen, there are but two decisions of authoritative force supporting the contention of the appellant. Those decisions involved the use of the telegraph equipment,—a use, as we have said, more nearly like that of the telephone than any other. The telegraph, however, has never been employed as a means of intraurban communication. It requires skilled persons to receive the messages, and then they are to be carried to the persons for whom they are intended by just such means and uses of the streets as would other written communications. The telephone is particularly useful in communications between the people within a city, and it can be used for that purpose directly, and by persons without special skill. It is more clearly a substitute for the old methods of the communication of messages between persons within the city than the telegraph.

We conclude that the reasonable use of the streets of a city for the equipment of a telephone system is not a new and additional servitude, for which the abutting property owner is entitled to compensation. Nor do we agree that the ordinary pole and wires are a special injury to the employment of the abutting property. Nor do we agree with the appellant that a telephone system may not be owned and conducted by an individual because of the grant, by the legislature, of such rights to corporations. An individual may conduct any proper business without legislative assent, unless there has been some legislative restriction upon such right. If, in the present case, the appellant had been entitled to restrain the use because an additional servitude, the appellee could not have taken the use without an agreement with the appellant or some legislative power to condemn. That question is put at rest by the holding that there is no additional servitude in the erection of the pole.

The judgment of the Lower Court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

James CALLANAN, Appt.,

v.

M. VOTRUBA.

(.....Iowa.....)

A judgment is not rendered so as to constitute a lien from the "time of such rendition," within the meaning of Code, § 3801, until it is entered on the record of the court, as required by § 3784, although a form of judgment has been signed by the judge and indorsed "Filed" by the clerk.

(February 8, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant establishing the lien of a judgment upon certain property owned by plaintiff and the title to which he sought to quiet against defendant's judgment. Reversed.

The judgments were against J. W. McClure, and were filed in the office of the clerk of the district court September 24, 1895. They were not indexed until September 28 or September 30; in the meantime, on September 26 or 27, Callanan accepted a conveyance from McClure of the property in question.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Davis & Davis, for appellant:

Judgments and liens, in order to bind land as against persons having no actual notice thereof, must appear of record in the manner prescribed by the law; that is, they must be found in the records wherein the statute requires them to be entered.

Etna L. Ins. Co. v. Hesser, 77 Iowa, 385, 4 L. R. A. 122.

When a judgment is not indexed, a purchaser without actual notice is not bound thereby, for the reason that the record required by the statute to impart constructive notice, i. e., the indexed judgment, does not exist.

Thomas v. Desney, 57 Iowa, 58; Sterling Mfg. Co. v. Early, 69 Iowa, 94; Cummings v. Long, 16 Iowa, 41, 85 Am. Dec. 502; Howe v. Thayer, 49 Iowa, 154.

In many of the states there is a statutory requirement, designed for convenience and expedition in making searches, that the judgment be duly indexed. This is usually done in a separate book or series of books kept for that purpose, and under the judgment-debtor's surname in its alphabetical order. The statute may be so framed as to make the index an essential part of the record; and when this is the case, a judgment is no lien upon the debtor's property, until correctly indexed, as against a purchaser who has searched the index with due care. And the judgment, though duly filed and recorded, creates no lien if it is not indexed.

It was the duty of Votruba to see that his judgments were correctly entered and indexed in due time.

Woods v. Reynolds, 7 Watts & S. 406.

It is immaterial that the deed was not delivered until the 27th of September, because the delivery is not essential under the terms of the statute, nor is it required by the statute of frauds in other states.

Black, Judgm. § 106; Babcock v. Wolf, 70 Iowa, 676; Guthrie v. Guthrie, 71 Iowa, 744.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1895, McClure was the owner of a lot in the city of Des Moines, and conveyed it by warranty deed delivered to plaintiff September 27 of the same year, in pursuance of an oral contract so to do made September 3 previous. The agreed consideration was $800, of which $416 was credited on an antecedent indebtedness, and $384 a mortgage on the lot, subject to which Callanan took the deed. Two judgments by default were ordered in favor of plaintiff and against McClure September 24, 1895, and entries therefor were signed by the trial judge and indorsed "Filed" by the clerk on the same day, but were not recorded in the record book or entered until the 28th or 30th of the same month, and after the conveyance to Callanan. Are these judgments liens on the land? Section 3801 of the Code provides that "judgments in the supreme or district courts of this state or in the circuit or district courts of the United States within this state, are liens upon the real estate owned by the defendant at the time of such rendition, and also upon all he may subsequently acquire, for the period of ten years from the date of the judgment." What is meant by the "time of such rendition?" Rendering a judgment is the judicial act of the court in pronouncing the sentence of the law upon the facts in controversy, as ascertained from the pleadings and the evidence; and, technically, the ministerial act of spreading upon the record a statement of the final conclusion reached by the court is not included therein. Black, Judgm. § 106; Schuster v. Rader, 18 Colo. 329; Blatchford v. Newberry, 100 Ill. 489; Conwell v. Kuykendall, 29 Kan. 707; Hall v. Tuttle [6 Ill. 38], 40 Am. Dec. 382, and note; Stephens v. Santee, 49 N. Y. 39; Durant v. Comegys, 2 Idaho, 809; Re Cook, 77 Cal. 220, 1 L. R. A. 567. But in construing this statute its relation to others on the same subject, and the sense in which the words are used, as determined by this court, must be considered. Every final adjudication of the rights of the parties in an action is a judgment. Code, § 3769. All judgments and orders must be entered on the record of the court, and must specify clearly the relief granted or order made in the action. Code, § 3784. It will be noticed that the definition of a "judgment" in the Code differs somewhat from that of some of the lexicographers in that it is a final adjudication. Zeigler v. Vance, 3 Iowa, 528; Taylor v. Runyan, 3 Iowa, 474. See definitions by authorities collected in 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. In Humphrey v. Havens, 9 Minn. 318 (Gil. 301), it was held 40 L. R. A.

that, where a writ of error must be issued within a year after the "rendition of judgment," the time begins to run from the entry of judgment or order on the record. The question was first suggested in this court in Brown v. Scott, 2 G. Greene, 454; Kinney, J., remarking: "We are at a loss to know how the justice could have rendered a judgment that would have any force or virtue, without rendering that judgment in proper form in the docket, which he is required by law to keep for that purpose. It is true, he might, in his mind, resolve upon entering the judgment, but unless put into shape and form, it would be as though no judgment at all had existed in the mind." In Case v. Plato, 54 Iowa, 64, the court, through Day, J., after quoting the statutes, says: "It is apparent from the foregoing provisions that it is essential to the validity of a judgment that it should be entered upon the record book. This is the book in which a statement of the proceedings of the court is kept, and to which appeal must always be made to determine what has been done. The theory of the law is that it is kept under the direction and supervision of the judge, is approved by him, and constitutes the only proof of his acts." In Balm v. Nunn, 63 Iowa, 641, the opinion is by Beck, J., who states: "There can be no judgment until it is entered in the proper record of the court. It cannot exist in the memory of the officers of the court, nor in the memoranda entered upon books not intended to preserve the record of judgments. . . . It is not competent to prove a judgment in any other way than by the production of the proper record thereof." Elma L. Ins. Co. v. Hesser, 77 Iowa, 381, 4 L. R. A. 122, seems to be decisive. In that case the judgment was erroneously indexed, and the court, in holding it was not a lien superior to a subsequent mortgage, bases its conclusion on three grounds: (1) No constructive notice was imparted, owing to the failure to index; (2) the judgment, before it becomes a lien, must be of record, i. e., entered in the record book required by the statute; (3) a judgment is not rendered, so as to be effective and capable of enforcement, until it is "made up, finished, stated, or delivered" in the form and manner and entered of record as required by the statutes. Appellee insists the last two grounds stated amount to no more than dicta, but these are not stated in the way of argument, but as conclusions of law. In Winter v. Coulthard, 94 Iowa, 312, the court had announced its decision; but these had not been entered of record, and the executions were held invalid because no judgments existed. The judge's calendar is not a record of the court, but entries therein announce the judge's conclusions, and are intended for the guidance of the clerk. Traer v. Whitman, 56 Iowa, 443; Miller v. Wolf, 63 Iowa, 233; State v. Manley, 63 Iowa, 344; Burroughs v. Ellis, 76 Iowa, 649. While not proof of a decree or judgment, such minutes may tend to show a decree or judgment has been ordered. Re Edwards, 58 Iowa, 431. If the record is the only proof of a judgment, as has been repeatedly held by this court, then how can a judgment be said to have been rendered before spread on the records, when its very existence prior to that time cannot be as-established? If the statute making the judgment a lien "at the time of such rendition" refers to the time of announcement by the judge, rather than when entered on the proper books, it would certainly be capable of enforcement by execution. Section 8954 of the Code. But it was adjudged otherwise in Winter v. Coulthard, 94 Iowa, 312. If the court has announced judgment, the clerk may complete the record after the term. Code, § 242. But until the record is prepared no evidence exists of the rendition of the judgment. These records are under the control of the court (§ 248 of the Code), and through them it speaks the final adjudication defined by the statute as a judgment. Until so rendered, there is no judgment. The Code contains no provisions relating to judgment forms signed by the judge, and these amounted to no more than directions for judgments. Until recorded, they were not such, but merely evidence that the court had ordered judgments, and approved their form. This view finds support in Babcock v. Wolf, 70 Iowa, 676, and Guthrie v. Guthrie, 71 Iowa, 744. In these cases decisions were, by agreement, to be made in vacation, and were written and signed by the judges before the expiration of their terms of office, though not delivered in the clerk's office until afterwards. In the former it is said: "Now, we think the decision was made when it was deposited in the express office at Afton. Under the agreement of the parties, it was as complete then as if there had been no agreement and the judge had entered a decision in his minutes in open court, because the parties agreed that the decision was not to be made at Clarinda." But it did not have the force of a judgment until spread upon the records as required by law.

Reversed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Bertha L. WHITMORE, Admr., etc.,
v.
ORONO PULP & PAPER COMPANY.

(91 Me. 297.)

1. The lessor of a pulp mill does not owe to the servants of the lessee the duty of making the requisite examination, or of possessing the requisite technical learning, and communicating the results as to the safe condition of a digester in the mill, before turning the plant over to the lessee.

2. A digester in a pulp mill which is not dangerous unless it is used does not constitute a nuisance which will render the owner liable for injuries resulting to employees of a lessee, by its explosion.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for death alleged to have been caused by negligence which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Charles P. Stetson and C. J. Dunn, for defendant:

The lessor of a building in the absence of fraud or any agreement to that effect is not liable to the lessee, or others upon the premises by his invitation, for their condition or that they are tenantable and may be safely and conveniently used for the purposes for which they are apparently intended.

Messrs. P. H. Gillin and C. J. Hutchings for plaintiff.

Emery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant company, the Orono Pulp & Paper Company, constructed, and for a few years, up to October 1, 1892, operated a pulp mill in Orono. On that day it leased its mill and plant to another and distinct corporation, the Bangor Pulp & Paper Company, for twenty-five years. This latter company, the lessee, took possession of the leased property on the same day, and for some little time thereafter operated it as a pulp mill on its own account.

By the terms of the lease the Bangor Company, the lessee, was to have the exclusive possession of the property, and was to keep it in substantial repair; the lessor reserving the usual right to enter upon and view the premises at times convenient to the lessee. The lessor made no stipulation as to the condition of the property.

The plaintiff's intestate, Austin J. Whitmore, had entered into the employ of the lessee, the Bangor Company, and was in its employ, upon the premises thus leased and operated by it, on the 11th day of October, 1892. On that day one of the digesters (a large cylinder of deoxidized bronze, and an essential part of the machinery of the mill) exploded while Mr. Whitmore was at work near it in the line of his duty. He was so severely injured by the explosion that he died a few weeks afterwards. The explosion resulted from the inability of the digester to resist the usual pressure of steam injected into it in the course of the business of the mill.

For this injury the plaintiff, as administratrix, first brought an action against the Bangor Company, the lessee operating the mill and plant, and her husband's employer, counting upon the negligence of that company, and recovered judgment upon the ground that that company had not exercised due care in examining into and ascertaining the real condition of the digester, which in fact was too weak to withstand the steam pressure used. By reason of the insolvency of that company the plaintiff has not been able to collect any part of that judgment.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action against the lessor of the mill and plant, the Orono Pulp & Paper Company, counting upon its neglect of its duty in the matter of the faulty digester. The defendant company did not construct the digester, but purchased it from a reputable manufacturer of digesters. In selecting, purchasing, and setting up this digester, it is not questioned that the defendant company exercised due care. At the first it was sufficiently strong. It was weakened after a time by the peculiar and continued action of the necessary chemicals upon the particular metal of which it was composed. This action was wholly confined to the interior of the closed cylinder, and was invisible from the outside.

Granting that at the time of the execution of the lease, and the change of the possession and control of the premises from the lessor to the lessee, the digester was then in fact too weak for its purpose, it does not appear from the evidence that any officer or agent of the lessor company was actually aware of that condition of the digester, or that knowledge of it could have been obtained, except by actual examination of the interior, or by inference from sufficient technical learning as to the peculiar action of the particular chemicals upon the particular metal. The outward, visible indications all were that the digester was as strong as ever.

The defendant company did not make the necessary examination before or at the time of leasing, and did not possess the requisite technical learning to make the correct inference without examination, but there is no suggestion of fraud or concealment in the matter. It may be that this omission and ignorance were a breach of a duty owed by the defendant company to its own employees or servants, but that proposition alone will not sustain the plaintiff's action. A person may owe a duty to one individual or class which he does not owe to another. The duty may depend wholly upon the relation between the parties. The plaintiff must therefore maintain the proposition that the defendant owed to the servants of its lessee the duty of making the requisite examination, or of possessing the requisite technical learning, and communicating the results before turning the plant over to the lessee. Whether the law of this state supports that proposition is the question presented.

It should be noted at the outset that the defendant company is not a public corporation, engaged in a public business, enjoying public franchises, and owing special duties in consequence thereof. It is a private corporation, transacting a purely private business, and dealing in this instance with another private party. Hence the rules and principles applied to owners of railroads, wharves, elevators, public halls, etc., do not necessarily govern this case. Again, the plaintiff's intestate was not upon his own premises, nor upon any public road or place, at the time of the explosion, but was voluntarily upon the leased premises under a contract with the lessee only. Hence the doctrines of the law of liability for nuisances to strangers or the public are not necessarily applicable. It should be further noted that the lessee engaged to make repairs; that the lessee had as much ability and opportunity as the lessor to ascertain and guard against the actual condition of the digester before accepting and using it, and subjecting the plaintiff's intestate to the consequent danger. Indeed the plaintiff recovered her judgment against the lessee for this same injury upon that very ground,—that the lessee by reasonable effort could have done, and yet did not.

It is not questioned that under such circumstances the lessor owes no more or other duty to the lessee's servants or assigns than he does to the lessee himself. If his duty or freedom from duty to the lessee is made plain, his duty or freedom from duty to the lessee's servant is equally plain. The discussion therefore may be confined to the duty of the lessor to the lessee.

Under such circumstances as have been disclosed and stated in this case, does the owner of property unaffected by any public use owe to his prospective lessee the duty to actively exert ordinary care at the time of the lease, to find out and apprise him of unknown defects which the lessee can equally well find out for himself?

The development of the law has not yet progressed so far in this state. Here the common-law rule of caveat emptor is still in force, and is applied to the lease as well as to the sale of property. It was early said in Hill v. Woodman, 14 Me. 38, 42, 43, that, in the absence of express stipulations as to the condition of the premises, the lessee took them for better or worse,—at least, when he had sufficient means for ascertaining their condition. In Libbey v. Telford, 48 Me. 316, 77 Am.

Dec. 229, it was explicitly declared to be the law that there is no implied obligation upon the lessor to see that a leased building is safe, well built, or fit for any particular use; that a leased house is reasonably fit for habitation; or that leased land is fit for the purpose for which it is taken. In Gregor v. Cady, 82 Me. 181, the owner was held bound to effectually repair where he assumed and began to repair, but it was declared (page 186, 82 Me.), he was under no obligation to repair, and that "the tenant, on the principle of caveat emptor, and in the absence of any fraud upon the part of the landlord, takes them [the leased premises] in the actual condition in which he finds them, for better and for worse." In McKenzie v. Cheetham, 83 Me. 543, the defendant had leased the second story of a dwelling house, with a defective landing for a stairway, which was the only means of ingress and egress for the second story. The plaintiff had made a social call upon the tenant, and, on leaving, fell through the defective landing. The court held that the defendant owed no duty to the tenant or to his caller, the plaintiff, as to the defective landing upon the premises, even though the landing was essential to the reasonable use of the leased tenement. It was again iterated (pages 548, 549, 83 Me.), that "the law in the absence of any fraud or concealment on the part of the lessor, leaves the lessee to the operation of the maxim caveat emptor and he takes the premises as he finds them for better or worse;" and many authorities were cited. The court also necessarily decided that the lessor owed to no one on the premises under the lessee any more duty than he owed to the lessee himself.

So stands the law in this state to-day, well known and hitherto acted upon. Any desired change or extension of it should be asked of the legislature, and not of the court.

The case of Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 62, rightly understood, is no departure from the former decisions of this court. The defendant railroad company, the owner of the railroad, had not leased it to the Portland & Ogdensburg Railroad Company, the plaintiff's employer, nor had it in any way turned over the whole plant to the latter company. It had simply permitted the Portland & Ogdensburg Company to run through freight trains over a part of its tracks. It retained the possession and control of its tracks, station houses, platforms, etc. The plaintiff, a brakeman in the employ of the Portland & Ogdensburg Company, was injured, in the line of his duty, through the defective construction of a station awning on the defendant's road. It was conceded that, upon the above facts, the defendant company, having control of the station house, awning, platform, etc., and inviting the plaintiff to pass and repass in the line of his duty as such brakeman, owed him the duty of so constructing and maintaining the awning as not to be dangerous to him. But after this arrangement with the plaintiff's employer, and while it was in force, and before the injury, the defendant company leased its entire road, including stations, to the Boston & Lowell Railroad Company, which latter company completely took over and operated the entire road, agreeing to assume all liability for injuries, etc.

The plaintiff was injured while the lessee was in possession under that lease. It was contended by the defendant company that such lease and transfer of possession freed it from what otherwise would have been its duty and liability to the plaintiff. The court held that they did not. That was the point of the decision.

The decision in the Nugent Case, 80 Me. 62, is really based upon the proposition that the owner of a railroad, or other property affected by a public use, with which the public have business relations, owes a duty to all persons who lawfully come upon the property to make and keep the property safe for all such persons, and cannot avoid that duty by merely leasing the property and retaining rents. That proposition, as before stated, does not include this case of property of a purely private nature, with which the public has no business relations.

It is true, as urged by the plaintiff, that the learned justice writing the opinion in the Nugent Case also adduced as an additional support for the judgment the responsibility of a lessor in some cases for the condition of the demised premises; but this was not necessary for the decision, and was not intended to be applied to a case like this. The same justice afterwards wrote the opinion in McKenzie v. Cheetham, 83 Me. 543, reaffirming the doctrine of the earlier cases.

The plaintiff, however, advances another and distinct proposition,—that the weak digester was a nuisance, allowed to become and remain so by the owner prior to and at the time of the lease, and hence that the owner must answer as for a nuisance. This proposition cannot be assented to. Some things may be nuisances per se under all circumstances, and as to all persons. Other things are nuisances only under certain circumstances, and as to certain persons. A slaughterhouse may be a nuisance as to the owner's neighbors, but none at all as to his employees in the business. What may be a nuisance as to others may not be a nuisance as to one's lessee, and here we are dealing with lessee and lessor.

To constitute any particular thing a legal nuisance per se (apart from statute nuisances), as between lessor and lessee and the servants of the lessee, the thing itself must work some unlawful peril to health or safety of person or property,—as defective cesspools, imperfect sewers and drains, walls and chimneys liable to fall, unguarded excavations, etc. A fixed, inert mass of metal, upon a solid foundation upon one's own land, like this digester, was not in itself dangerous to anyone. The employees of the lessee could have worked around and near it without any danger from it, to person or health, so long as it was let alone. The danger arose only when the lessee, the employer, began to make use of the digester without first ascertaining its tensile strength, and gauging the applied force accordingly. Indeed, the plaintiff has once alleged, and recovered judgment upon proof, that the misconduct of the lessee caused the peril and injury complained of. This is inconsistent with her present contention that the digester was a nuisance per se as to her intestate, the lessee's employee.

The question of what is a nuisance upon leased premises was considered at some length, with citation of authorities, in McCarthy v. York County Sav. Bank, 74 Me. 815, 43 Am. Rep. 591. It was there held that a discharge pipe insufficient to vent the water flowing into a bowl from a faucet, so that the water overflowed the bowl and caused damage, was not a nuisance as to the tenant. See also Brightman v. Bristol, 65 Me. 426, 20 Am. Rep. 711; Burbank v. Bethel Steam Mill Co. 75 Me. 373, 46 Am. Rep. 400, and Leavitt v. Bangor & A. R. Co. 89 Me. 509, 36 L. R. A. 382, though those were not cases between lessor and lessee.

We have hitherto confined our citation of authorities to the decisions in this state, thinking they sufficiently showed our law to be against the plaintiff's contentions. She has, however, cited cases from other states, of which one or two notably support her contentions. Stenberg v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 163, 34 L. R. A. 615, and Hines v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 148, 34 L. R. A. 824. As to these cases, the learned editor of the Lawyers' Reports Annotated Series says they are a new departure in the law; that they transfer to the landlord a duty which has heretofore rested upon the tenant,—the duty of taking active care to find out unknown and unsuspected defects. As we have said above, we think it is for the legislature, not the court, to make this transfer of duty, if thought desirable.

On the other hand, many courts, in late decisions, adhere to the long-established rule of caveat emptor. In Jaffe v. Harteau, 56 N. Y. 398, 15 Am. Rep. 438, a boiler defective in construction exploded. In Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 249, 50 Am. Rep. 659, a gallery defective in construction fell. In Doyle v. Union P. R. Co. 147 U. S. 414, 37 L. ed. 225, a house was too weak structurally to resist snow slides known to the lessor to be recurrent and dangerous. In Tuttle v. George II. Gilbert Mfg. Co. 145 Mass. 169, a floor defective in construction fell. In Bowse v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 46 Am. Rep. 471, a stair tread had been sawed. The lessor knew of the sawing, but supposed the tread sufficient. In Kern v. Myll, 94 Mich. 477, a well had been used as a cess pool, and thus had become offensive. In Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767, fixtures put up by the lessor were structurally defective, and fell. In Willson v. Treadwell, 81 Cal. 58, a stairway was defective. In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mangum, 68 Tex. 842, a defective platform fell. In Fellows v. Gilhuber, 82 Wis. 639, 17 L. R. A. 577, an unsafe awning fell upon a guest. In McConnell v. Lemley, 43 La. Ann. 1433, 34 L. R. A. 609, a defective gallery fell upon a guest. In Johnson v. Tacoma Cedar Lumber Co. 8 Wash. 722, defective machinery in a mill gave way. In all these cases, it appearing that the lessor was unaware of the defects, it was held that he was not liable to the lessee or his servants for the injury occasioned by them.

Motion and exceptions sustained.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Mary LOWNDES, Appt.,

v.

J. Wilkins COOCH, Exr., etc., of Nathan H. Clarke, Deceased, et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. The law of the testator's domicile governs the lapsing of a legacy of stock in a bank of another state in which the legatee resides, although a statute of the latter state, if applicable, would prevent the lapsing.
2. Shares of stock of a corporation are personal property only, and governed by the law of the owner's domicile.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court, No. 2, of Baltimore City, in favor of defendants in a suit brought to compel defendants to transfer to appellant certain stock which had been bequeathed under the will of Nathan H. Clarke, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to validity of gift of shares of stock causa mortis, see Leyson v. Davis (Mont.) 81 L. R. A. 429.

Questions which relate merely to the mode of distribution and devolution of property in the case of intestacy, or the legal requisites, interpretation, and legal construction of a will, in cases of testacy, are matters involving merely individual and private rights, and not the interests of the state at large. In all questions of this kind the laws of the owner's domicil are to govern.

Although the courts may exercise their discretion as to whether they will require administration to be made by the local court, or whether they will remit the property for administration to the court of the domicil, in any event the law of the domicil will always be applied in determining the mode of distribution of the estate.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from a decree of circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore city, sustaining a demurrer to the bill of complaint, and dismissing the same. The facts are that Nathaniel H. Clarke, a resident of the state of Delaware, departed this life on the 18th day of March, 1892, leaving a last will and testament by which he bequeathed to his brother, Moses Clarke, the dividends to accrue upon the stock held by the testator in the Commercial & Farmers' National Bank of Baltimore during his life; and thereafter the said stock was bequeathed to his "friend, Andrew Lowndes, of Baltimore." Mr. Lowndes died on the 16th of March, 1892,—two days prior to the death of the testator, Clarke. The dividends upon said stock were paid to the said Moses Clarke, the life tenant, during his life; he having only recently died. The children of said Andrew J. Lowndes, subsequently to the death of the life tenant, assigned all of their interest in said bequest to their mother, who is the appellant in the record of this appeal. This bill is filed against J. Wilkins Cooch, the executor of said testator, and against the said bank, to compel the transfer to the appellant of the stock bequeathed to said Lowndes. The will of the testator had been admitted to probate in the orphans' court of Baltimore city, and letters testamentary have been granted by said court to said executor. The bank answered the bill, disclaiming any interest in the controversy, and submitting its rights and liabilities to the order and direction of the court below. Cooch, the executor, demurred to the bill, and, while relying on the same, he, by way of answer, set up the defense that there is no statute in the state of Delaware, similar to that of our own state, to save the lapsing of a legacy given by a testator to one dying before him, which is the meaning and effect of § 313, art. 93, Code Pub. Gen. Laws. The leading inquiry, therefore, which this appeal presents, is, Does the law of Delaware or the law of Maryland control the disposition of the bank stock in controversy here? The facts of this case are few, and easily understood, and the law is well settled, and free of difficulty. It is undoubtedly true that, so far as it can be done consistently with its own interests, one country will respect, and give effect to, the laws of another. This doctrine finds expression in the legal maxim that "mobilia sequuntur personam," which is the maxim of our own, as of the Roman, law, while things immovable are governed by the lex rei sitæ. The leading case in this state is that of Noonan v. Kemp, 34 Md. 79, 6 Am. Rep. 307. The facts are, briefly, that David Kemp, a citizen of this state, bequeathed to his daughter Mrs. Noonan, who then resided with her husband in the state of Kentucky, certain distributive portions of his personal estate. Mrs. Noonan survived her father and died in the state of Kentucky, leaving her husband and two children surviving her. No distribution of her father's estate was made until after her death. Her surviving husband claimed the portion which had been distributed to his wife. It was admitted that by the law of Kentucky the surviving husband was entitled to the personal estate of his deceased wife. Robinson, J., in delivering the opinion of this court in that case, said: "If there be a principle of international law settled beyond dispute, it is that the succession to personality is governed and regulated by the law of the domicil," etc. And he quoted approvingly the language of Chancellor Kent in 2 Kent. Com. 429, where he says: "It has become a settled principle of international jurisprudence, and one founded in a comprehensive and enlightened sense of public policy and convenience, that the disposition, succession to, and distribution of personal property, wherever situated, is governed by the law of the country of the owner's or intestate's domicil at the time of his death, and not by the conflicting laws of the various places where the goods happen to be situate." Judge Story says: "Be the origin of the doctrine what it may, it has so general a sanction among all civilized nations that it may be treated as part of the jus gentium." But nowhere is the general doctrine stated with greater force and vigor than by Lord Loughborough in Sill v. Worwick, 1 H. Bl. 690, where he says: "It is a clear proposition, not only of the law of England, but of every country in the world, where law has the semblance of science, that personal property has no locality. The meaning of that is, not that personal property has no visible locality, but that it is subject to that law which governs the person of the owner. With respect to the disposition of it, with respect to the transmission of it, either by succession, or the act of the party, it follows the law of the person. . . . If he dies, it is not the law of the country in which the property is, but the law of the country of which he was a subject, that will regulate the succession." The principle so admirably expressed, which we have just quoted, finds recognition and support in numerous decisions of this court. De Sobry v. De Laistre, 2 Harr. & J. 191, 8 Am. Dec. 535; Newcomer v. Orem, 2 Md. 297, 56 Am. Dec. 717; Wilson v. Carson, 12 Md. 54; Hooper v. Baltimore, 12 Md. 464; Latrobe v. Baltimore, 19 Md. 14; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Glenn, 28 Md. 322, 92 Am. Dec. 688. This doctrine, however firmly established, is nevertheless subject to proper limitation, to the effect that if a foreign law directly violates some recognized principle of public policy, or some established standard of morality prevailing in the forum exercising jurisdiction, the rules of comity will not compel such forum to enforce the foreign law, rather than its own, if to do so would be hurtful or detrimental to the interest and welfare of its own citizens. The appellant contends that in the application of any proper test the law of Maryland, and not the law of Delaware, should control the case under consideration, for the reason that the shares of stock, the subject-matter of this controversy, are in their nature things immovable, and incapable of having any situs except that of the corporation of which they are a part, and that in the event the law of Delaware shall be allowed to prevail the result will be, as heretofore stated, the lapsing of the legacy, contrary to the policy recognized in the law of this state. It is not essential to the merits of this case that we should indulge in extended comments upon the subject of the character of the bank stock in question, or as to what may be its situs. It has been variously held by the courts of other states, and text-writers as well, that shares of stock have no situs apart from that of the corporations of which they are a part, as already stated, but that for various purposes shares of stock may be given an arbitrary situs, as in attachment cases, or for purposes of taxation. The law in this state has, however, been settled and determined to the effect that shares of stock of a corporation are personal property only and governed by the law of the owner's domicile. Donovan v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 30 Md. 159; Keyser v. Rice, 47 Md. 212, 28 Am. Rep. 448; Appeal Tax Ct. v. Rice, 50 Md. 317; Appeal Tax Ct. v. Gill, 50 Md. 377; Bonaparte v. State, 63 Md. 472; Baldwin v. Washington County Comrs. 85 Md. 145; Kerr v. Urie, 86 Md. 72, 38 L. R. A. 119.

Other questions have been argued at the hearing of this case which are not necessary to its determination, and we forbear comment upon them. It is only just that we say that the case has been argued with exceptional ability and learning. From what we have said, it follows that the court below has committed no error in its decree, and we affirm the same with costs.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

1. Interference with ownership of land by advertising and selling it under a fraudulent mortgage and notifying tenants not to pay rent to the owner constitutes an actionable wrong.
2. A declaration is bad for duplicity when it states in one count a good cause of action for interference with real property and one for injury to reputation, as to which it is demurrable.
3. The disgrace and disrepute into which the owner of property is brought on account of the advertising and sale thereof under a fraudulent mortgage do not constitute a cause of action.
4. Inducing one of two parties to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure the other, or to obtain a benefit for one's self, constitutes an actionable wrong.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful interference with plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. P. Jordan and R. E. Jordan. for appellant:

Even if this were a declaration for a malicious prosecution of civil action, it falls within the exception laid down by this court in all the cases of the kind that have come before it.

Clements v. Odorless Executing Apparatus Co. 67 Md. 461; McNames v. Minke, 49 Md. 188.

In contemplation of law, all acts done, and transactions had, in pursuance of a purpose to defraud, are but one act. The order in which they occur is immaterial, and any person within the range of the fraudulent purpose, and affected adversely by it, is entitled to have all or any part of the acts constituting the fraud annulled and set aside.

Moore v. Blondheim, 19 Md. 176; McAleer v. Horsey, 35 Md. 439; Wilson v. Watts, 9 Md. 357; Diggs v. McCullough, 69 Md. 592; Gehhart v. Merfeld, 51 Md. 822; Lamm v. Port Deposit Homestead Asso. 49 Md. 233, 33 Am. Rep. 246; Smith v. Davis, 49 Md. 470; Tome v. Parkersburg Branch R. Co. 39 Md. 44, 17 Am. Rep. 540.

Messrs. Richard B. Tippet & Bro. and W. Sherman Bansemer, for appellee:

The ex parte decree in the circuit court under the consent clause in said mortgage was sufficient to protect the mortgagee against inquiry, and was conclusive as to the question of fraud, in obtaining the mortgage. A decree is res judicata in respect to all matters of defense existing and which was available to the defendant at the date of passing the decree.

Trayhern v. Colburn, 66 Md. 279; McDowell

NOTE.—As to liability to damages for inducing breach of contract with third person, see Boysen v. Thorn (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 233, and note; also Raycroft v. Tayntor (Vt.) 38 L. R. A. 223.

v. Goldsmith, 6 Md. 319, 61 Am. Dec. 305; Beall v. Pearre, 12 Md. 550.

From the nature of things this case is and can be nothing more than a case for damages for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit.

A judgment rendered by a lower court in favor of the plaintiff, though reversed on appeal, ought to be conclusive as to the question of probable cause, in instituting the suit, "otherwise in every case of reversal an action would lie for the institution of the original suit."

Clements v. Odorless Excavating Apparatus Co. 67 Md. 464; Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U. S. 141, 30 L. ed. 614.

The absence of any one of the four essential averments in a declaration for malicious prosecution will render such declaration defective.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendant upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. The cause of action set forth is of an unusual character, and we will state it in the language of the declaration itself, which is as follows: "And the said Martha E. Gore, by her husband and next friend, Lewis D. Gore of Baltimore city, in the state of Maryland, sues Levi Z. Condon, of the city and state aforesaid, for that on or about the 11th day of May, 1889, the said defendant fraudulently obtained from one Daniel Frazier a fraudulent and void mortgage for the sum of $600 upon the property of the plaintiff, situate in the city of Baltimore, on North Gilmor street, near Pressman street, which said fraudulent and void mortgage contained a consent clause for an ex parte decree; the said Condon well knowing at the time of obtaining said fraudulent mortgage that the property upon which it was obtained, and which was described therein, was the property of the said Martha E. Gore, and not the property of the said Daniel Frazier, the mortgagor therein, and that said mortgage was fraudulent, and null and void, as to the said plaintiff and her said property therein described. Yet, notwithstanding the said defendant knew that the said mortgage was fraudulently obtained, and was fraudulent and void as to the said plaintiff, the said Martha E. Gore, and her said property therein described, yet, nevertheless, to further carry out his fraudulent design, the said defendant did, on or about the — day of —, 1894, file his petition and said fraudulent mortgage in the circuit court of Baltimore city, alleging said mortgage to be in default, and under the said consent clause therein obtained an ex parte decree from the said circuit court for the sale of the plaintiff's property, Charles W. Nash, Esq., of the Baltimore city bar, being appointed trustee by the said decree to make said sale; and on or about the 13th of June the said defendant actually caused said trustee to advertise said property for sale, and he (the said defendant) notified the said plaintiff's tenants on the property to pay no more rents to the plaintiff. That in order to save her said property from the sale as aforesaid under said fraudulent mortgage and decree so fraudulently obtained as aforesaid, plaintiff was compelled to file her bill of complaint in said circuit court aforesaid (which she did on or about the 20th day of June, 1894), setting forth the fraudulent character of said mortgage, and praying for an injunction to restrain said sale aforesaid, and that said mortgage be decreed to be fraudulent and null and void as to her and her property therein described. The said writ of injunction did issue, and was served upon the defendant, Condon, and the said trustee, and remained in force until on or about the 8d day of June, 1895, during all which time the said plaintiff received no rents or profits from her said property on account of the said defendant notifying the tenant in said property to pay her no rents; and during all which time the taxes, water rents, and ground rents were accumulating,—when, after hearing said cause, said circuit court dismissed the plaintiff's bill of complaint with costs to the defendant, from which said last decree the said plaintiff, on or about the 5th day of June, 1895, took her appeal to the court of appeals of Maryland; the said defendant, Condon, having full knowledge of said appeal. That, notwithstanding the said defendant, Condon, had actual knowledge of the fraudulent character of said mortgage, and that the property therein described was the property of the said plaintiff, Martha E. Gore, and that there was an appeal pending in said court of appeals from said decree dismissing her bill of complaint, yet, pending said appeal, he seized and sold said property under said ex parte decree; whereupon all her tenants moved out without paying her any rent, and leaving said ground rents, taxes, water rents, and other expenses unpaid. That, after arguing said appeal in the court of appeals, the said court reversed the decree of said circuit court of Baltimore city, and decided the said mortgage from said Frazier to said Condon to be fraudulent and void as to the said plaintiff, the said Martha E. Gore, and her said property, and remanded said cause to said circuit court, the said defendant, Levi Z. Condon to pay all costs above and below; all which more fully appears from the opinion of said court of appeals, recorded among the cases of said court designated to be not reported, liber —, folio —, October term, 1895,—a copy of which opinion, taken from the Daily Record of November 25, 1895, is hereto attached as part hereof. And said circuit court of Baltimore city, in pursuance of said opinion and decree of said court of appeals, pass a decree setting aside said sale made pending said appeal aforesaid, making said injunction perpetual, and declaring said mortgage null and fraudulent as to the said plaintiff, Martha E. Gore, and her property. That at the time of advertising the said property, and of the defendant, Condon, notifying her tenants to pay her no more rent, the plaintiff had upon the premises three good, prompt-paying tenants, who had occupied the premises for some time previous to said advertising and notice aforesaid, to wit, a tenant in the dwelling house, paying $20 per month; a tenant in the two rooms over the stable, paying $5 per month; and a tenant on the ground floor of the stable, paying $2.50 per month rent,—all of whom, upon the sale of said property, moved out, paying the plaintiff no rent, and leaving the property in the hands of the defendant vacant (unless tenants he may have put in), the said defendant not even paying the taxes, ground rents, and other expenses during all the time he was in possession thereof. And the plaintiff claims she has been damaged by the unlawful trespass upon her property, and advertising the same for sale, and sale thereof, and for the disgrace and disrepute into which she was brought on account of said advertising and sale, for the loss of her rents and profits from the time the defendant notified her said tenants to pay her no more rents, and for her large expenditure of money in securing possession of her said property, in paying witnesses' per diem and mileage, besides her own loss of time and expense, and for the depreciation in the value of her property from neglect and nonoccupancy while in the hands of the defendant, and other damages to the said plaintiff and her property from and by the unlawful acts and doings of the said defendant in this behalf."

It will be seen that this is not an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit without probable cause. Such an action is generally maintainable, as was held by this court in McNames v. Minke, 49 Md. 138, where there has been an alleged malicious arrest of the person, on a groundless and malicious seizure of property, or the false and malicious placing of the plaintiff in bankruptcy, or the like. But such suits are not, however, encouraged, says this court in Clements v. Odorless Excavating Apparatus Co. 67 Md. 463, and 605, because the law recognizes the right of everyone to sue for that which he honestly believes to be his own; and the payment of costs incident to the failure to maintain the suit is ordinarily considered a sufficient penalty. In an action for malicious prosecution or the abuse of process the plaintiff must allege and prove that the suit was instituted maliciously, and without probable cause. The declaration before us does not aver malice or the want of probable cause, and does not count upon the malicious prosecution of a civil suit. No suit was, in fact, instituted against the plaintiff. It alleges a wrongful interference by defendant with the property of the plaintiff, and is an action on the case for consequential damages.

The allegations of the declaration which are admitted by the demurrer show that the defendant caused plaintiff's tenants to refuse to pay to her their rents, and caused other injuries to plaintiff, and that the defendant did intermeddle with property of which plaintiff was in possession with the right to possess, and which defendant knew to belong to the plaintiff. The question, then, is whether the conduct of the defendant, under the circumstances stated in this case, constituted such a wrongful act as will give rise to an action of damages. It would certainly seem just that if a man knows that certain property is not his, but another's, and that he acquired an apparent title to the same by fraud, and that the title is void, then his intermeddling with such property to the damage of the real owner is an unlawful act, for which a remedy should be afforded. To deny a remedy to the aggrieved party in such cases would be a reproach to the law. The mere fact that the interference with another's property was done under a claim of right and title is no defense, especially when, as in the present case, he knows that his title is fraudulent and void. An action has been held to lie in many cases of such interference when the parties have acted in good faith, and under an honest mistake. Levi v. Booth, 58 Md. 313, 42 Am. Rep. 332, this court regarded it "as clear law that a person is guilty of a conversion who intermeddles with the property of another and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under authority from some other person, who had himself no authority to dispose of it." No good reason can be given why the same principle is not applicable to such acts of interference with a party's ownership of land as are described in the present case. The right to maintain the action can also be sustained upon the doctrine that a man who induces one of two parties to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure the other, or to obtain a benefit for himself, does the other an actionable wrong. Lucks v. Clothing Cutters & T. Assembly, No. 7507, K. of L. 77 Md. 398, 19 L. R. A. 408; Angle v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 151 U. S. 14, 38 L. ed. 63; Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; Bowen v. Hall, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 333; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555.

But it is manifest that the declaration in this case is bad for duplicity. It states two distinct causes of action in one count,—one for damage to the interference with plaintiff's real property, and the other for damage to reputation. As we have seen, the first is a good cause of action; but the second, which seeks to recover for "the disgrace and disrepute into which plaintiff was brought on account of the advertising and sale," etc., is clearly demurrable. It is well settled that no action will lie for words spoken or written in the course of giving evidence, or for words spoken or written in the course of any judicial proceeding. Bartlett v. Christliff, 69 Md. 225. We are therefore of opinion that the demurrer to the declaration was properly sustained and the judgment will be affirmed; but, inasmuch as the declaration contains a good cause of action, the cause will be remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to amend; the costs to abide the result of this suit.

Judgment affirmed, and cause remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to amend; the costs to abide the result of this suit.

CITY ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

Leaving a platform car with no machinery about it, or any brake, on a side track of a street railway in such condition that it may be moved by the united strength of several children, is not negligence which will render the company liable for an injury to a child playing with it.

(March 15, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for St. Clair County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Phillips & Jenks, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff was a trespasser. The car was rightfully on the track, and while the defendant would not have the right to leave a car upon its track in such a way as to impede or prevent the ordinary use of the street, the plaintiff had no cause for complaint for the purposes for which she was using the street.

In the "turntable cases" the defendants were held liable on the ground that leaving attractive and dangerous machinery in places accessible to and frequented by children was such gross negligence as to make them liable even though the children were trespassers, but the extent of this doctrine has been considerably modified and in some of the most respected courts it has been expressly denied.

Messrs. Avery Bros. & Walsh, with Messrs. Muir & Smith, for defendant in error:

The defendant could not invite these children to play upon a small car that could be propelled by two small boys along its track and be shielded from the consequences that might occur in such a place of danger, on the theory that the child was a trespasser.

Baker v. Flint, & P. M. R. Co. 68 Mich. 90; Schindler v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 87 Mich. 409.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff by one of defendant's cars, which, it is claimed, was negligently left by it on a side track without being guarded or brakes set, or other means employed to prevent children from moving it. On the trial it appeared that plaintiff was nearly seven years old when the accident upon which this action is founded happened.—September 17, 1895. Defendant operated a street railway in the city of Port Huron. The car which caused the injury was a small flat or platform car, and was about 14 feet long by 6 feet wide, with a box about 12 feet long, having drop sides, and leaving 1 foot of platform at each end projecting beyond the platform, the platform being about 26 inches from the ground. The weight of the car was from 1,500 to 1,800 pounds. It had four iron wheels, and had no brake upon it, or other means to prevent its being moved. On the afternoon of the accident an order was received by the company to go to Huronia Beach, a point about 4 miles north of the center of the city. The employees operating the combination of motor car and flat car decided to leave the platform car at the point of the accident while they proceeded with the motor car alone to Huronia Beach to get some trunks and return, which would occupy from 40 to 45 minutes, and avoid the necessity of drawing the flat car and making switches that would be necessary in order to reverse the position of the cars on the return trip. There is testimony that this car was in that place in the morning and noon, and that there were then no blocks or anything under or beside the wheels to prevent the car's being rolled; and the car was in the same place when witness came from school at night, about the time of the accident. The place of the accident was the only point on the company's line where the platform car could be left without interference with other cars, and had been left in the same way and place a number of times before under similar circumstances. The conductor in charge of the cars on this occasion testified that when the flat car was left at this point on this occasion he blocked the wheels with a stone and a stick, which could be removed, however, by the kick of a small boy, if he hit it hard, and that he always blocked this car every time he left it there. The plaintiff lived about the length of a block from the place where this car was left, and, coming from school in the afternoon of September 17, seeing children playing upon the car, came to the place of the accident. At that time there were eight or ten children playing with it, pushing the car a short distance west, and then returning it east. A part were pushing, the others riding. At this point there is a slight descent to the west, but not enough to start the car of itself, and there was much dust upon the track. At the time the plaintiff arrived, the children playing with the car were just starting, or about to start it, towards the west, and had run it up and down the track a number of times, and there were then no blocks under the wheels. She climbed upon the west end of the platform to ride, and, without having got into the box, either slipped, or was pushed in the play from the car, falling in front of the wheels, one of the wheels running over her leg, and causing the injuries complained of. The plaintiff had been told by her mother "not to go near the cars, that she was liable to be hurt;" but the danger was not explained to her, and she testified she did not think or know it was dangerous. She was not told not to go near the car on this day. This car had been left in the same position before, and children had played upon it, and pushed it, and street-car employees had taken the car from that position when the children were playing upon it, and the children had helped the street-car men shove the flat car up to the motor car for the purpose of connecting it. The plaintiff was injured almost immediately after going to the car. The children had been playing upon the car from three quarters of an hour to an hour. At the conclusion of the proofs, counsel for defendant requested the court to instruct the jury, among other matters, that under the undisputed evidence the defendant was entitled to a verdict. This was refused, and, inasmuch as this is the only question discussed in appellant's brief; we need not state the other requests to charge. The court submitted two questions to the jury: (1) Whether the defendant was guilty of negligence; (2) whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Upon the first the court instructed the jury as follows: "If this car had been left there by the railway company at other times, and the street-railway company knew of that fact, knew that children were in the habit of going there and playing with the car, and moving it up and down the track, and riding upon it, and with that knowledge left the car there, and left it unfastened and unblocked; and, in your opinion, taking all the surrounding facts and circumstances into consideration, you deem the use of that car in that manner by children dangerous to them, and that careful, cautious, and prudent men would not have left it there in that condition,—you would be justified in finding that the railway company was liable for the injury that this child suffered, provided that she has not been guilty of contributory negligence." Upon the second question the court charged the jury, substantially, that they might take into consideration the age of the child, the means she had of knowing the danger, the judgment, intelligence, and reason of the child, and say whether, under all the circumstances of the case, she was guilty of contributory negligence; and, "If you feel that she was, and that any act of hers contributed to the injury, you should deny her claim; otherwise, if she did contribute to it, and you think that in her tender years, and in her judgment and reasoning powers, she was incapable of knowing any better, you would be justified in passing that over." Plaintiff recovered, and defendant brings error.

Plaintiff contends that, this car track being in a public highway, the child was not a trespasser, either in moving the car or in getting upon it. The plaintiff does not contend that the car was of itself an object dangerous to children, but that, the car being so light that children could move it on the track, it became a dangerous object in being moved along the track, and, being an attractive object, they were likely to move it, and thus be put in danger; that the defendant's employees knew, before leaving the car there on that occasion, that on former occasions children were attracted to it, had moved it along the track, and that such employees had countenanced the children in thus playing with it; that, with this evidence in the case, the court very properly left the question to the jury to determine whether, taking all these matters and the surrounding circumstances into consideration, careful, cautious, and prudent men would have left the car there in that condition. In support of this contention counsel cites the Turntable Cases in note to 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 344. It is said in that text: "The general rule of liability, as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States and adopted by the great majority of the state courts, is, that if a railway company leaves a turntable, or other like machinery upon its own property likely to attract children, so unsecured that children may put it in motion, the company is negligent and, if a child is injured thereby, will be liable in damages." We are not called upon in the present case to express any opinion upon the questions decided by those cases. In Massachusetts and New Hampshire that ruling is not followed, it being held in those states that a railroad company is not liable for injuries.

sustained by a child while playing upon a turntable, either upon the ground of an implied invitation to come there, or of a duty on the part of the company to make the place safe. Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L. R. A. 248; Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220. All the Turntable Cases are rested upon Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. In that case a child of six years was injured by playing upon the defendant's turntable. The turntable was unlocked and unguarded. The court charged the jury upon the question of the defendant's negligence in the management or condition of the turntable as follows: "To maintain the action it must appear by the evidence that the turntable, in the condition, situation, and place where it then was, was a dangerous machine,—one which, if unguarded or unlocked, would be likely to cause injury to children; that if, in its construction and the manner in which it was left it was not dangerous in its nature, the defendants were not liable for negligence; that they were further to consider whether, situated as it was as the defendants' property in a small town, somewhat remote from habitations, there was negligence in not anticipating that injury might occur if it was left unlocked or unguarded; that, if they did not have reason to anticipate that children would be likely to resort to it, or that they would be likely to be injured if they did resort to it, then there was no negligence." The court, in passing upon and approving this charge, said: "That the turntable was a dangerous machine, which would be likely to cause injury to children who resorted to it, might be fairly inferred from the injury which actually occurred to the plaintiff. There was the same liability to injury to him, and no greater, that existed with reference to all children. When the jury learned from the evidence that he [plaintiff] had suffered a serious injury, by his foot being caught between the fixed rail of the roadbed and the turning rail of the table, they were justified in believing that there was a probability of the occurrence of such accidents. So . . . when it was proved to the jury that several boys from the hamlet were at play there on this occasion, and that they had been at play upon the turntable on other occasions, and within the observation and to the knowledge of the employees of the defendant, the jury were justified in believing that children would probably resort to it, and that defendant should have anticipated that such would be the case." It is difficult to see how that case can be likened to the present. In that case a dangerous piece of machinery was left open, exposed, and unguarded, to the knowledge of the defendant. The turntable itself was dangerous. In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, the supreme court of California said: "The rule of the Turntable Cases is an exception to the general principle that the owner of land is under no legal duty to keep it in a safe condition for others than those whom he invites there, and that trespassers take the risk of injuries from ordinary visible causes; and it should not be carried beyond the class of cases to which it has been applied." Even in some 40 L. R. A.

of these Turntable Cases it is held that railroad cars are not dangerous machines, and attractive to children, within the meaning of those cases. Elliott, Railroads, § 1259, says that this is regarded as the true rule. In Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 659, 21 L. ed. 745, the court charged the jury that: "If [the turntable in question] in its construction and the manner in which it was left was not dangerous in its nature, the defendants were not liable for negligence." The car in question in the present case was not dangerous in its construction. It was a plain car, with four wheels, with no machinery about it. It had no brake, but was a small platform car. It is true that it stood upon a track where it might be moved by several children applying their united strength. Several children might, in the same way, move a wagon or carriage left beside the highway. We apprehend that no claim of negligence could be sustained against the owner of such a vehicle if one of the children climbing upon it should fall off, and be run over, even if the wheels were left without blocking. In Robinson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 7 Utah, 493, 13 L. R. A. 765, it appeared that a hand car had been left beside the track. Some boys had lifted it upon the track, and were running it back and forth, when plaintiff, being attracted by it, went there, and was injured by jumping or falling from it while in motion. The boys had used this car eight or ten times before, with the permission of the "boss," while the men were there at work; but he had never given them such permission while the men were not at work. This car weighed 600 or 700 pounds. It was held that the car was not a thing dangerous in itself, and that the company was not negligent in leaving it unlocked beside the track.

In the present case, assuming that the defendant left the car without sufficient blocking, it must be held that plaintiff could not maintain this action, for the reason that there is nothing in the case showing or tending to show any negligence on the part of the defendant.

It is not necessary to determine whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, or whether that question was properly left to the jury. Neither is it necessary to say that the plaintiff was a trespasser in going upon the track there, which was laid along the highway. It is proper, however, to say that she was a trespasser in any attempt to use this car. The defendant had just as much right to leave this car where it did as would a farmer have to leave his wagon or carriage upon his own side of the highway, and no one would have the right to move it, except upon the claim that it impeded public travel. The car being rightfully left where it was upon the track, and not being a thing dangerous in itself, the court should have directed the verdict in favor of defendant.

Judgment below must be reversed. No new trial will be ordered.

ST. BARNABAS HOSPITAL, Respt.,
v.
MINNEAPOLIS INTERNATIONAL ELEC-TRIC COMPANY, Appl.

"The defendant took one of its employees, who had been seriously injured, to plaintiff hospital, and at its request and upon its promise to pay for his care and treatment the plaintiff accepted and received him as a patient for an indefinite period, no length of time being mentioned. Subsequently, and while the patient was yet incapable of being removed or discharged from the hospital without great danger to his life or health, the defendant gave notice that thereafter it would not be responsible for his care or treatment. Held, that defendant had no right to thus terminate its liability; that, under the circumstances, it was an implied condition of the contract that defendant could only terminate it by removing the patient or when he could be dismissed by the plaintiff without serious danger to his life or health. In order to relieve itself from liability for care and treatment, furnished after the notice, on the ground that the patient had means of his own to pay for it, the burden was on defendant to prove that he had means out of which the plaintiff could and should have collected its pay.

and treatment of one Soutar, furnished and performed at the instance and request of the defendant. The undisputed evidence is that Soutar, having sustained very severe injuries while in its employment, the defendant brought him to plaintiff's hospital, and that plaintiff received and accepted him as a patient upon the faith of defendant's promise to pay for his care and treatment. The evidence on part of the plaintiff was to the effect that nothing was said as to length of time, while defendant's evidence was to the effect that its promise was to pay for his care until further notice. As we view the case, it is immaterial which is correct. Soutar was taken to the hospital on October 22 and a few days afterwards was, at the request of the defendant, removed from one of the hospital wards to a private room where he was kept and cared for until the 8th of the following April. The usual price for a private room was $15 a week, while the price for a place in one of the wards was only $7. These accommodations were, respectively, worth these prices. On November 12 defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that it would not continue responsible for any further treatment or care of Soutar after the next day. The contention of the defendant was that it had the absolute right to terminate its promise instantly at any time by giving notice to that effect, and therefore could not, under any circumstances, be held liable for Soutar's care and treatment after November 13. The contention of the plaintiff, and the view of the law on which the court submitted the case to the jury, was that under the circumstances the agreement was not one which the defendant had an absolute right to terminate at any time merely by giving notice; that defendant, having brought a seriously injured man to the hospital, and the plaintiff having taken him in and accepted him as a patient at the request of defendant, on the faith of its promise to pay, it would remain liable, notwithstanding notice to the contrary, until it removed him, or until he sufficiently recovered, so that he could have been dismissed or put out of the hospital without great danger to his health or life, unless it appeared that he had means of his own out of which plaintiff could have collected its pay. This was an implied condition, upon which the contract could be terminated. It is in accord alike with common sense and the dictates of humanity. The plaintiff, having taken in a helpless and severely injured man at the defendant's request, and upon its promise to pay for an indefinite time, it would be monstrous if the defendant could, the very next day, summarily withdraw its promise, leave the sick man on plaintiff's hands, and put it to the alternative of either keeping and caring for him without pay, or else cruelly and inhumanly throwing him into the street. The plaintiff assumed the burden, which doubtless belonged to it, of proving that Soutar could not have been dismissed or removed from the hospital without great danger to his health or life until the date of his dismissal, on the 8th of April. The evidence abundantly established this fact unless it was as to the last four weeks. The jury evidently took the view that he might have been safely dismissed four weeks sooner than he was, and hence allowed plaintiff nothing for that time. There was no evidence that Soutar had any means to pay for his own treatment. All that it shows is that he was a single man, and presumably had no home of his own. The charge of the court implies that the burden was on the defendant, if it would relieve itself from liability on that ground, to show that Soutar had means to pay for what care he received. We are of opinion that this was right. Plaintiff's contract was with the defendant, and not with Soutar. Defendant having brought the patient to the hospital, and promised to pay for his treatment, if it would relieve itself of liability after notice, notwithstanding its failure to remove him, and the further fact that he was in no condition to be dismissed, it was at least incumbent on it to show that plaintiff could and should have collected its pay from Soutar himself.

The point is made that, after defendant gave notice that it would be no longer liable, the plaintiff should at least have minimized defendant's liability by removing Soutar from the private room to one of the hospital wards, where the cost would have been less than half. It is sufficient answer to this that no such point was made on the trial in the court below, either in the introduction of evidence or by requests to charge the jury. The defendant squarely took the position that it was not liable for anything after November 13, and no question seems to have been made but that it was liable for the full amount charged per week, if it was liable at all.

Several of the assignments of error relate to the admission or exclusion of evidence; but, as the defendant has failed to specify the pages or folios in the paper book where these rulings are to be found we do not feel it to be our duty to read over the whole record to find them. We may add, however, that such of them as we have discovered contain no prejudicial error.

such necessity for the connection in question, arising from the benefit which will accrue to state traffic alone, that the state railroad and warehouse commission were warranted in ordering the connection to be made. Worcester v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 109 Mass. 112.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Willmar & Sioux Falls Railroad extends from Willmar, in this state, in a southwesterly direction, to Sioux Falls, in South Dakota, and is crossed nearly at right angles by the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad near Hanley Falls, in this state. The former railroad is a part of the Great Northern system of railroads, and the latter is operated in connection with the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway, and as a part of the same. The crossing near Hanley Falls is a grade crossing, and there has never been any switch connecting the two railroads at that point. Chapter 10, Gen. Laws 1887, as amended by chapter 91, Laws 1895, provides: "Sec. 3. (A) That all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall provide, at all points of connection, crossing, or intersection at grade where it is practicable and necessary for the interest of traffic, ample facilities by track connections for transferring any cars used in the regular business of their respective lines of road from their lines or tracks to those of any other common carrier whose lines or track may connect with, cross or intersect their own, and shall provide equal and reasonable facilities for the interchange of cars and traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers, property, and cars to and from their several lines and those of other common carriers connecting therewith." The act further provides that, on the application of any person interested, the state railroad and warehouse commission shall order connections to be made at such crossings and this is conceded by appellants. The commission did so order in this case after notice, and a hearing had in the manner provided by the statute. Both railroad companies appealed to the district court from the order. On a hearing had in the district court, the order was affirmed, and the connection ordered to be made by a curved switch, 778.6 feet long and particularly described, just as the commission had ordered. From the judgment of the district court entered thereon, both railroad companies appeal to this court. The Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad Company has appealed and filed a brief, but the other appellant has not argued the case or filed any brief.

The connecting switch will, at the middle of the same, extend outside of the right of way of each and either railroad, and it will be necessary to condemn at that place a narrow strip of land, a few hundred feet long, for the use of the switch. One of the lines of the Great Northern system extends from Duluth southwest to Willmar. Another extends from St. Paul and Minneapolis west to Willmar. These two lines pass through large areas of wood land, the timber on which is available for fuel and fence posts. Southwest of Willmar, and for many miles in all directions around Hanley Falls, the country is mostly prairie. Timber is scarce, and great quantities of cordwood and fence posts are brought down on the Willmar & Sioux Falls Railroad from said timbered regions, and distributed along that road. Timber is not as plentiful along the Minneapolis & St. Louis System. For that reason cordwood and fence posts are much dearer at the stations on the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad, east and west of Hanley Falls, than such wood is at that station and the stations north and south of it on the Willmar & Sioux Falls Railroad. For this reason it is for the benefit of the people in the territory tributary to the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad, but no tributary to Hanley Falls, that this connection should be made so as to enable them to have cars of wood transferred at that point from the Willmar & Sioux Falls Railroad to the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad, and distributed at the stations along the latter road. But this will deprive the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad Company of the benefit of a much longer haul on dearer wood. The loss of revenue which will result to it by reason thereof is one of the grounds of its complaint here. A large number of cattle are raised in the territory tributary to the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad west of Hanley Falls. For such of these cattle as are fat enough for beef, Minneapolis and St. Paul are the best market, but, for the stockers and feeders, Sioux City or Omaha is the best market. But there is no way of reaching Sioux City or Omaha with cars of stock shipped from said territory over said last-named road, except by running the cars first to Hopkins, within 8 miles of Minneapolis, and then transferring them to another railroad with which the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway Company has traffic arrangements, and running the cars over such other road to Sioux City or Omaha.

The distance from Hanley Falls to Sioux City by this route is 380 miles, while the distance from Hanley Falls to Sioux City over the Willmar & Sioux Falls Railroad is but 181 miles. Making the connection in question will deprive the Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad Company of the benefit of such longer haul on such stockers and feeders, and the loss of revenue which will result to it by reason thereof is another ground of its complaint.

1. Appellant Wisconsin, Minnesota, & Pacific Railroad Company contends, that as the shipping of stock to Sioux City and Omaha is interstate commerce, the state tribunals have no jurisdiction over it, and must not take into consideration the question of the transferring of cars of such stock when determining the necessity of a connection at this crossing. Conceding, without deciding, that the state tribunals would have no jurisdiction to require the making of this connection for the sole purpose of transferring cars engaged solely in the carrying of interstate commerce, it does not follow that these tribunals may not take into consideration the benefit to such commerce also, when determining the necessity of this connection. The whole traffic to be benefited by the making of the connection may be amply sufficient to justify requiring the same to be made; yet the part of such traffic commencing and ending in the state may not be sufficient when taken alone, and the part which consists of interstate commerce may not be sufficient when taken alone. If appellant's position is correct, neither the state tribunals nor the Federal tribunals would have jurisdiction in such a case. Clearly such is not the law. In such a case jurisdiction is concurrent. If there is some necessity resulting from the benefit which will accrue to exclusively state commerce by reason of the putting in of the connection, this gives the state tribunals jurisdiction (Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 126, 24 L. ed. 84); and in disposing of the case, they may take into consideration the whole necessity resulting from the whole benefit which will accrue to all classes of commerce. But, even if this position was not correct, there is, in our opinion, ample evidence in this case of necessity resulting from the benefit which will accrue to exclusively state commerce, when considered alone, to justify the ordering of the connection in question. We will go further. Under the statute, every presumption is in favor of the action of the commission, and the burden was upon appellant to show that such action was contrary to law. See Steenerson v. Great Northern R. Co. (Minn.) 72 N. W. 718. Appellant has totally failed to maintain that burden. No evidence was offered by appellant in the district court at all as to the want of necessity for the making of this connection, but it rested its case wholly on the evidence of the witnesses called in behalf of the petitioner. That evidence was not in appellant's favor, and certainly did not show conclusively that there was no necessity for this crossing.

2. Appellant further contends that said act of the legislature is unconstitutional and void, and the judgment entered in this case is erroneous, because they contravene numerous provisions both of the state and Federal Constitutions. Such law and judgment required appellant to exercise the power of eminent domain, construct a railroad track, operate the same, and exchange business with intersecting roads; and it is contended that all of this is outside of and beyond what its charter requires, and that, therefore, the law impairs the obligation of the charter contract between appellant and the state, deprives appellant of the equal protection of the laws, takes its private property without just compensation, deprives it of the right to contract with reference to its own business, etc. All of these constitutional objections may be considered together. These two railroads are public highways, and all of these objections amount simply to this: It is wholly foreign to the purpose of two public highways of the same character to require them to connect where they cross each other, so that public traffic may pass from one to the other. And, where a private corporation has been chartered to construct, maintain, and operate such a public highway, with the right to charge reasonable compensation for its services in so doing, it is a violation of its charter to compel it to connect its highway with another intersecting highway of the same character, unless the right to require the connection is expressly reserved in the charter. We cannot so hold. If appellant's position is correct, it has the constitutional right to completely isolate its railroad at any time by cutting it off from all connection with other railroads, unless the right to compel connections is expressly reserved in its charter. Its road commences at the village of Morton, in this state (an unimportant station at the terminus of a branch of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway), and extends westerly to Watertown, in South Dakota; so that it may at any time, and in spite of all public authority, be very completely isolated and cut off from all large commercial centers, if appellant sees fit so to cut it off. The legislature chartered appellant to construct, maintain, and operate a public highway, not a cul de sac or something worse, which has no connection with like highways either at its ends or sides. A railroad is an improved highway, on which certain modern appliances are used. It will not, as a general rule, serve fully the purposes for which it was intended, unless the connections between it and other like highways which cross or touch it are improved in like manner, and the same modern appliances are used in passing from one road to another over those connections.

Again, why is not the doctrine advanced by appellant a two-edged sword? If the legislature cannot compel the making of such connections, because there is nothing in the charter expressly authorizing or requiring the making of them, why is it not ultra vires under such a charter, and without express legislative authority, to make such connections voluntarily? But who will contend that a railroad company may not, without express authority, and as incidental to its general powers, connect its track with the tracks of other railroads that extend to its road at its ends, or intersect it at its sides. Appellant's property is dedicated to public use, "is affected with a public interest," and the legislature certainly has the power to regulate that use in a reasonable manner, unless appellant's charter expressly protects it from such regulation. See Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 126, 24 L. ed. 84; State v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 88 Mo. 144; Allnutt v. Inglis, 12 East, 527; Lord Hale's Treatise De Jure Maris, 1 Hargraves, Law Tracts, 6. Appellant was chartered to serve the public within the scope of its charter powers and franchises, in the best and most efficient manner possible. It was not, as it seems to contend, chartered to obstruct public traffic or serve the public the least that self-interest might dictate. Appellant cannot be allowed to obstruct the course of public traffic under the claim that, by, putting in this connection and letting such traffic take its course, appellant will lose a large amount of revenue which it would otherwise earn. If, by reason of putting in the connection, its revenues will be so reduced that it will not, on its whole business, receive a reasonable compensation for its services, its remedy is by a readjustment of the whole or such part of its schedule of rates and fares as, under the circumstances, ought to be readjusted, in order to enable it to earn such reasonable compensation.

It is contended that, even if the connections were made, neither railway company could be compelled to deliver its loaded cars to the other, to be carried with their contents to their destination over the road of such other; that to compel appellant to deliver up its cars to be carried away from the line of its road to distant points would be in violation of its charter contract, and unconstitutional; that, for this reason, it is useless to compel the making of the connection in question, and therefore the legislative act fails of its purpose, and is unconstitutional and void. Such interchange of cars between different railroads is a common and almost universal practice; yet, there are few railroad charters which expressly authorize this practice. It would hardly be contended that such an act of interchange is ultra vires on the part of a railroad company whose charter is silent as to such authority. As incidental to the operation of its road, a railroad company has the power to interchange cars with other connecting companies, and this is the ordinary and usual way of doing business. We are clearly of the opinion that the legislature has the power to compel a common carrier to do business in the ordinary and usual way, and therefore may compel such interchange of cars as incidental to the business for which the company was chartered. The supreme court of Iowa reached the same conclusion in Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey, 82 Iowa, 312, 12 L. R. A. 436, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 584. See also Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 667, 28 L. ed. 291; Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 109 Ill. 185, 50 Am. Rep. 605; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212; State v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 144.

The statute provides: "In the event that said railway companies fail to establish through joint rates, or fail to establish and charge reasonable rates for such through shipments, . . . it shall be the duty of the railroad and warehouse commission of this state . . . to establish reasonable joint rates for the shipment of freight and cars over any two or more connecting lines of railroad in this state, and to prescribe the reasonable rules under which any such cars so transferred shall be returned." Laws 1895, p. 214, § 3. (C). Appellant suggests that cases may arise where it would be compelled to deliver its cars to another carrier, who is insolvent, or where the couplings, air brakes, or other appliances of the cars of one of the carriers will not match with those of the other, and where it would be unsafe to haul such other cars. It is only necessary to say that such cases can be disposed of when they arise. There is no suggestion that this is any such case. Appellant seems to contend that this statute attempts to make the two or more railroad companies partners for the purposes of such a through shipment; that it attempts to compel the making of a joint shipping contract by which each company will be liable for all the defaults of the others in the through shipment; and that, therefore, the statute is unconstitutional and void. The statute merely provides that, in case all the railroad companies concerned in the through shipment fail to fix a reasonable total sum for the total haul, the commission shall do so for them. There is nothing in this which requires any company to assume any liability beyond its own line for the acts of others in making the haul.

There is nothing in the suggestion that the two appellants are competing roads, within the terms of subdivision F of § 3 of said statute, at least as far as regards the traffic for which the connection in question is required.

This disposes of the case, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Recorded, but unacknowledged, agreements regarding land may be considered in an action to quiet title under a statute making them evidence in cases brought after its passage, although a portion of the relief asked is injunction against an ejectment suit begun before the passage of the act.

2. A strict construction will not be placed upon a power of attorney to convey an interest in land after the lapse of many years, the effect of which would be to oppose the clear intent of the parties and divest titles acquired in good faith under it.

3. A recorded power of attorney to convey land is not revoked by an unrecorded conveyance of the land by the principal so as to defeat titles subsequently acquired in good faith from the attorney.

4. Claimants under a deed prior in time but subsequent in record in order to defeat after a great lapse of time a subsequent deed first recorded, have the burden of showing notice or fraud on the part of the subsequent grantees.

5. A conveyance of a certain number of undivided acres out of a tract of land is not void for uncertainty.

NOTE.—Separation of riparian rights from upland.

If a person owns both the banks and bed of the stream or body of water the authorities agree that he may separate them and convey the one without the other. Where he does not own the water, but has only the rights of a riparian owner therein, there is some conflict as to his power to effect the separation.

One man may have the river and another the soil adjacent. Hale, De Jure Maris, chap. 1.

One man may own the bed of a stream and another may own its banks. Rockwell v. Baldwin, 58 Ill. 22.

The proprietor of adjoining land, who is also the owner of the bed of the stream, may convey the bed of the stream separate from the land which bounds it. Den, Hartshorn, v. Wright, Pet. C. C. 64; Child v. Starr, 4 Hill, 369.

The submerged land may be reserved and sold separately from the upland. Axline v. Shaw, 35 Fla. 305, 23 L. R. A. 901; State v. Black River Phosphate Co., 32 Fla. 82, 21 L. R. A. 189.

The owner of the bed of a river and of the upland may separate the ownership of the one from the other. Smith v. Ford, 48 Wis. 164; Norcross v. Griffiths, 65 Wis. 599, 56 Am. Rep. 642; Elliott v. Baird, 26 Graet, Ch. (U. C.) 549.

In Massachusetts the owners of upland to which flats adjoin may sell the upland without the flats or the flats without the upland. Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 4 Am. Dec. 155; Barker v. Bates, 13 Pick. 255, 23 Am. Dec. 678; Mayhew v. Norton, 17 Pick. 367, 28 Am. Dec. 300; Valentine v. Piper, 22 Pick. 85, 33 Am. Dec. 715; Drake v. Curtis, 1 Cush. 395; Knight v. Wilder, 2 Cush. 199, 48 Am. Dec. 630; Saltonstall v. Proprietors of Boston Pier, 7 Cush. 202; Doane v. Willoult, 5 Gray, 323, 66 Am. Dec. 399; Porter v. Sullivan, 7 Gray, 441.

And the same is true in Maine. Deering v. Proprietors of Long Wharf, 25 Me. 51; Pike v. Munroe, 26 Me. 309, 58 Am. Dec. 751; Stone v. Augusta, 46 Me. 137; Hill v. Lord, 48 Me. 83; Abbott v. Treat, 78 Me. 121.

It is competent for the riparian proprietor to sell his upland to the top or edge of the bank of the river, and to reserve the stream or flats below high-water mark, if he does it by clear and specific boundaries. People, Highway Comrs., v. Madison County Supers., 125 Ill. 21.

Right of fishing.

The owner of upland has a right of fishery adjacent to his shore, which is capable of alienation. Fitzgerald v. Faunce, 46 N. J. L. 536.

The owner of soil beneath water may convey his fishing privileges separate from the upland. Matthews v. Treat, 75 Me. 594.

Right of wharfage.

The right of wharfage may be separated from the upland. Simons v. French, 25 Conn. 346; Ladies' Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Halstead, 58 Conn. 144.

The owner of improvements which have been made in front of his property has a right to convey them separate from the upland. Goodsell v. Lawson, 42 Md. 348.

The owner of land bordering on a river may sell his land and retain his statutory right to build wharves into the river. Hastings v. Grimshaw, 153 Mass. 497, 12 L. R. A. 617.

The owner of land bounded on navigable waters may reserve to himself his right to build wharves when he conveys away the land above high-water mark, or he may grant it to another to enjoy. Parker v. West Coast Packing Co., 17 Or. 510, 5 L. R. A. 61. In that case the right was held to be an incorporeal hereditament. Later Oregon cases, however, have denied the existence of any right to wharf out.

In Hagan v. Gaskill, 42 N. J. Eq. 215, there was a lease of the right to build a pier, and it was upheld in favor of a mechanic's lien as against the grantor.

But in Iowa it has been held that the right of the owner of land upon the bank of a stream, the bed of which he does not own, to construct piers and landing places, is not a subject of independent sale. Musser v. Hershey, 42 Iowa, 356.

Mere riparian rights.

If the owner of upland conveys by metes and bounds a portion of the flats lying in front of the upland, leaving a portion of the flats unconveyed outside beyond the conveyed portion cut off from the upland, the grantee will take the right to reclaim and use the outer flats with the portion definitely conveyed. New Haven S. B. Co. v. Sargent, 50 Conn. 199, 47 Am. Rep. 632. This ruling is put upon the ground that the grantor had not the title, but only an incorporeal hereditament, in the shore, and public policy dictates that the right to reclaim land and construct wharves should be in someone in respect to all parts of the shore in a harbor. And if the grantee has not the right no one has. But it is expressly stated that the decision is rested on the particular circumstances of the case.

A mere right of getting seaweed on the beach in front of land is an incorporeal hereditament, and cannot be severed from the estate to which it is annexed. Phillips v. Rhodes, 7 Met. 322.

So, it has been held that if the owner of the upland does not own the land under water he cannot upon conveying his upland reserve his right to apply to the state authorities for a grant of such

6. Title to a proportionate share of land under water, depending on title to the upland, will pass by a deed of a certain number of undivided acres out of the tract of upland bordering on the water.

(October 4, 1897.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Wisconsin in favor of complainant in a suit brought to quiet title to certain real estate and restrain the prosecution of an ejectment suit to recover possession thereof. Affirmed.

Before Woods, Jenkins, and Showalter, Circuit Judges.

Statement by Jenkins, Circuit Judge:
Fractional section 16 in township 49 north, land. E. G. Blakslee Mfg. Co. v. E. G. Blakslee's Sons Iron Works, 129 N. Y. 155, Affirming 59 Hun, 209.

And the same rule was followed in People, Blakslee, v. Land Office Comrs. 39 N. Y. S. R. 642.

In Steele v. Sanchez, 72 Iowa, 85, where the question was as to the title to certain stone in the bed of the stream which the owner of the upland had attempted to convey to a third person, the court said the grantor had certain rights between high and low water mark, but those rights were peculiar to himself, and were not the subject of sale or transfer independently of a conveyance of the land to which those rights were appurtenant. In that case the riparian owner had not a title to the bed of the stream.

In Massachusetts it has been held that there is no legal impediment to a grant of land without a water privilege or to a grant of water privilege without the land. Ashley v. Pease, 18 Pick. 268.

The owner may sell the land without the privilege of the stream. Hatch v. Dwight, 17 Mass. 298, 9 Am. Dec. 145.

In Dexter Sulphite Pulp & Paper Co. v. Frontenac Paper Co. 20 Misc. 442, a reservation of water rights was enforced.

There may be a severance of an owner's private right of use and occupation in a public body of water from his adjacent upland. Concord Mfg. Co. v. Robertson, 66 N. H. 1, 18 L. R. A. 679.

A riparian owner conveying land adjacent to navigable waters may so limit his grant as to reserve to himself, not only his riparian privileges in the waters, but also subsequent accretions to the soil formed by the operation of natural causes. People, Burnham, v. Jones, 112 N. Y. 597.

In Lake Superior Land Co. v. Emerson, 38 Minn. 406, it was held that riparian rights belong and are incident to the abutting shore, and cannot be severed and transferred apart from the shore.

But the owner of the upland may by a conveyance estop himself from asserting his riparian rights. Miller v. Mendenhall, 43 Minn. 95, 8 L. R. A. 89.

And the Lake Superior Land Company Case was overruled in Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 104, 110, 7 L. R. A. 722.

And the new doctrine was followed in Gilbert v. Eldridge, 47 Minn. 210, 13 L. R. A. 411; Gilbert v. Emerson, 55 Minn. 254; Bradshaw v. Duluth Imperial Mill Co. 52 Minn. 59.

Upon the partition of land the riparian rights connected with it may be left to be held in common. Organ v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 51 Ark. 235.

Cases merely recognizing the doctrine.

Head v. Chesbrough, 13 Ohio C. C. 364, Affirming 4 Ohio, N. P. 73, recognizes the right of the riparian owner to separate the water rights from the upland.

of range 14 west, in the county of Douglas and state of Wisconsin, is bounded on the north and west by the St. Louis river and St. Louis bay. The section was surveyed by the government of the United States in the year 1854, and according to that survey and the plat thereof returned to the general land office of the United States, and filed in the office of the surveyor general, the section contained 522.80 acres of land, as follows: The northeast fractional quarter, 180.25; the northwest fractional quarter, 86.50; the southwest fractional quarter, 146.05; the southeast quarter, 160. Under the school-land grant of the enabling act admitting the state of Wisconsin into the Union, approved August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. at L. 56, chap. 89), this section, with others, was granted to the state of Wisconsin for school purposes. On August 4, 1855, Frederick J.

riparian owner to separate the water rights from the upland.

And the same is true of Day v. Pittsburg, Y. & C. R. Co. 44 Ohio St. 406.

In Gouverneur v. National Ice Co. 184 N. Y. 355, 18 L. R. A. 695, it seems to be assumed that the water might have been severed from the upland by proper calls in the conveyance.

In Palmer v. Farrell, 129 Pa. 162, it is assumed that the rights may be separated from the upland.

In St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S. 226, 34 L. ed. 941, there was a contention that a grant of land did not pass title to the land below low-water mark, but the court, without questioning the fact that a separation of the title could be made at low-water mark, held that by the terms of the deed the whole title of the grantor had passed.

In Jones v. Janney, 8 Watts & S. 443, 42 Am. Dec. 209, it is said that flats pass by a deed of upland, "if not expressly excluded."

And that case was followed in Risdon v. Philadelphia, 18 W. N. C. 73.

Adverse possession.

Title to flats may be acquired by adverse possession. Boston v. Richardson, 105 Mass. 353; Treat v. Chipman, 35 Me. 84; Clancey v. Houdlette, 39 Me. 451.

Partition.

A landowner cannot dedicate the banks of a river to public use, and reserve to himself the interest in the river bed and landing. Godfrey v. Alton, 12 Ill. 37, 52 Am. Dec. 476.

Method of separation.

If the water is non-navigable a conveyance by metes and bounds which excludes the water will not pass title to it. Lembeck v. Nye, 47 Ohio St. 336, 8 L. R. A. 578.

The owner of city lots bordering on a water-course may sell the lots separate from the water right, but the intention to do so must be plain, and it will not be sufficient merely to plat the property with a line running along the shore. Watson v. Peters, 23 Mich. 508.

When the trustee of a town site advertises and sells a lot bounded on a stream, and on the same day, and as part of the same sale, he sells the bed of the stream to another person, an intention is shown to separate the ownership of the bed of the stream from that of the land, and it will overcome the presumption that a deed to a lot on a stream carries the title to the center. Denver v. Pearce, 13 Colo. 383.

H. F. F.

Whittaker, William Herbert, Frank Perfect, and Wellington Gregory agreed with M. W. McCracken (for A. S. Mitchell and others) by an instrument in writing under their respective hands and seals, but not acknowledged, and recorded in the register's office of Douglas county on the 9th day of July, 1856, substantially, that the parties first named should proceed to the capital of Wisconsin, and purchase school section 16, and, upon receiving title thereto from the state, should convey to McCracken or Mitchell, or such others as McCracken might request, a full, equal, undivided one half of the section, in fee simple. McCracken therein agreed to convey to one James A. Markland an undivided sixteenth of an undivided one half, to be conveyed to him upon payment within one year from that date by Markland of a one-sixteenth part of the expenses incurred by McCracken. On August 17, 1855, Mitchell agreed with McCracken, by instrument under their respective hands and seals (witnessed by Whittaker, but not acknowledged by the parties thereto, and recorded July 24, 1856), upon payment by McCracken within a year of an amount equal to one half of the sums paid in that time by Mitchell, to convey to McCracken an undivided half of the undivided half of the section. By these arrangements the title to the section was designed to be vested as follows:

A. S. Mitchell, an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$	130.70 acres
M. W. McCracken, an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$	130.70 "
Herbert, an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$	65.35 "
Perfect, an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$	65.35 "
Whittaker, an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$	65.35 "
Gregory, an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$	65.35 "

Total 522.80 acres

The undivided quarters owned by Mitchell and McCracken were subject to the right of Markland to an undivided one thirty-second. December 7, 1855, Herbert and wife executed a power of attorney to Whittaker and Perfect, authorizing them to convey, in whole or in separate parcels, "a certain tract of land, with the appurtenances, whereof we are seised in fee," described as follows: "The undivided one fourth of the school section in township 49, of range fourteen (14) west." On June 2, 1856, the four pre-emptors executed to Joseph G. Wilson a bond conditioned to convey an undivided one-eighth part of the section when the title should become perfected in them. This instrument was executed on the part of Herbert by his attorneys in fact, and recorded on the 2d day of June, 1856. On June 18, 1856, the state of Wisconsin, by its governor and secretary of state, issued patents for the land in question, as follows: To Herbert, for the northeast fractional quarter of section 16, containing 130.35 acres, to Perfect, the northwest fractional quarter of section 16, containing 86.50 acres; to Gregory, the southwest fractional quarter of section 16, containing 146.05 acres; to Whittaker, the southeast quarter of section 16, containing 160 acres. It would appear that these patents were irregular or invalid because not executed by the commissioners of school and university lands. To cure the error, proper patents executed by the latter officers were issued November 26, 1861, 40 L. R. A.

to the same parties, and for the quarter sections as stated. On July 7, 1856, Perfect, Whittaker, Gregory, and Herbert (the deeds of the latter being executed by Whittaker and Perfect, his attorneys in fact) executed to Mitchell, each, two deeds, which conveyed to him the quarter sections by them respectively entered, thus vesting the entire legal title to the section in Mitchell. At the same time, Mitchell conveyed to Perfect, Gregory, Herbert, and Whittaker, jointly, the undivided half of section 16, the deed reciting, "The intention of this deed being to convey to each of said four parties of the second part, Frederick J. Whittaker, Frank Perfect, Wellington Gregory, and William Herbert, the undivided one-fourth part of said undivided half of said section hereby conveyed." By these deeds the title of the section was vested, or supposed to be vested, an undivided one half in Mitchell, and an undivided one eighth in each of the four pre-emptors. On July 8, 1856, Herbert deeded to Mitchell "all of his right, title, and interest in section 16, being the undivided one-fourth part of the undivided one half of said section." This deed was not recorded until July 15, 1856, and was executed by Herbert in person. On July 9, 1856, Herbert, by his attorneys in fact, executed to James A. Markland an undivided one thirty-second part of the section. This deed was recorded the same day. On that day Whittaker, Gregory, Perfect, and Herbert (by his attorneys, Whittaker and Perfect) deeded to Joseph G. Wilson an undivided one-sixteenth of the section. This deed was also recorded on that day. If the two deeds named take precedence of the deed from Herbert to Mitchell, the latter would own the following interests in the section: An undivided one half under deeds from all the pre-emptors, 261.40 acres; under deed from Herbert, 40.84 acres; total, 302.24 acres. Mitchell deeded, July 7, 1856, to Joseph G. Wilson, an undivided one thirty-second; on May 4, 1857, to Edmund H. Taylor, Jr., "an undivided 57 acres" of the section; on February 13, 1858, to M. W. McCracken, "the undivided fourth part of section 16 minus 8 acres, and supposed to contain 122.70 acres, more or less, and situated on the bay of St. Louis, in the county aforesaid." This deed purported to be executed and to be received in abrogation of any other deed of land in that section made by Mitchell to McCracken, and in discharge of all bonds given by Mitchell to convey land in that section. On February 26, 1861, Mitchell conveyed to certain trustees for Mary B. Mitchell, his wife, and her four children, 114.86 acres, undivided, in section 16, and afterwards on February 19, 1874 (his former wife having died, and he having thereafter intermarried with Nellie B. Mitchell, who joined in the deed), conveyed to certain trustees in trust for the children of Mary B. Mitchell "an undivided interest, amounting to 114.86 acres," in the section. Mitchell died on May 1, 1882, and his heirs and the trustees under the trust deed in December, 1882, executed conveyances to John C. Spooner of 106.21 acres, undivided. Upon the assumption that Mitchell acquired from Herbert 40.84 acres, making, with the previous conveyance to him by the pre-emptors, a total of 302.24 acres owned by him, he would seem to have conveyed to his trustees 8.15 acres more than he owned.

The appellee the Land & River Improvement Company acquired the title under these several owners to the 522.80 acres, assuming the validity of the conveyances by Herbert, through his attorneys in fact, to Markland and to Wilson. Anderson Gratz as trustee and the other appellants represent the interest, if any, existing in Mitchell, his children or heirs, remaining undisposed of. This property remained vacant until the year 1884, and is now incorporated within the limits of the city of Superior. From erosion by the waters of the river or bay of St. Louis, the acreage of the upland is now reduced to 424.98 acres. On April 4, 1887, under a statute of the state of Wisconsin, the commissioners of Douglas county established a dock line in front of this property, which was approved by the United States War Department December 5, 1894. The east and south boundary lines of section 16, prolonged to meet this dock line, would include an area of 837.66 acres. It was stipulated as a fact, subject to objection to its materiality, that neither Mitchell nor any of his children supposed that the section in controversy contained more than 522.80 acres, as stated in the government survey, until about the year 1890, when the surviving children were advised by their counsel that the section extended to the thread of the current of the St. Louis river, bounding the section on the northwest. In November, 1890, the present appellants brought ejectment in the circuit court of the state of Wisconsin for the county of Douglas against the present appellees to recover an undivided $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section, which suit was removed to the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin. Thereafter, in the year 1892, the appellee the Land & River Improvement Company filed its bill in the latter court to restrain the proceedings in the action at law, and to quiet the title to the section; setting forth at length the history of the devolution of the title, and praying that its title and possession of the premises might be quieted in the complainant by decree of the court, and that the parties defendant to the bill asserting any title or claim to the lands in question may be decreed to release the same to the complainant therein. To this bill the present appellants duly answered, setting forth their claim of title, and they also filed their cross bill, asking that they be decreed to be the owners in common of the undivided $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section; that all instruments of conveyance specifying undivided acres of the section shall be equivalent only to a conveyance of an undivided interest, of which the numerator shall be the specified number of acres in the deed, and the denominator the entire acreage of the section, whether upland or overlaid with water; and that their title be quieted as against the claim of all the defendants to the cross bill. This cross bill was duly answered, and a replication was filed. And at the hearing a decree was rendered in behalf of the original complainant, the Land & River Improvement Company, the appellee here, quieting and confirming its title to the section, enjoining the prosecution of the action in eject-ment, and decreeing that the appellants have no right, title, or interest in or to any of the land, privileges, appurtenances, or water rights, or any right in the bed of any stream or streams adjoining the section.

Mr. Alfred D. Eddy for Standard Oil Co., appellee.

Jenkins, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is urged that the court should not consider the record of the unacknowledged agreements of the parties to this title. It is enacted by chapter 288 of the Laws of Wisconsin of 1891, published April 24, 1891, that all agreements relating to sales and conveyances of land, or of any interest therein, which have not been acknowledged but which shall have been recorded in the proper register's office for twenty years, may be proved and admitted in evidence, by the production of the record of a duly certified copy, with the same effect as if such instrument had been properly acknowledged. The act contains, however, a proviso that its provisions should not affect any pending suit or proceeding. This bill was filed on December 15, 1892—nearly twenty months after the publication of the act. It is true that the action in ejectment was instituted in November, 1890, and prior to the act, but that action and the question of competent evidence upon the trial of that action are not before us. The bill here is one to quiet the title, the restraining of the prosecution of the action at law being merely incidental relief to effectuate the decree in this suit. The act is manifestly applicable here, however ineffectual it might prove to sanction the introduction in evidence of the recorded but unacknowledged agreements upon the trial of the suit in ejectment. We think these instruments are properly before us for consideration, under the provisions of the statute in question.

It is clear that the parties contemplated that the four pre-emptors should obtain the title to section 16 as tenants in common,—each to own an undivided one-fourth. All the agreements speak thus; but when it came to the entry of the land, either because of the custom of the land office of the state, or through error, the title was taken to each quarter section in severalty. Each pre-emptor then conveyed to Mitchell the quarter section entered by him, and Mitchell at the same time conveyed to the four pre-emptors an undivided one half of the whole, thus placing the title as originally designed. The power of attorney from Herbert to Whittaker and Perfect under date of December 7, 1855, before the legal title was obtained, authorizes a conveyance of a certain tract of land, whereof Herbert was seised in fee, described as the one undivided one-fourth of the section, and was clearly made in view of the agreement of the parties to obtain undivided interests in the section. By the subsequent deeds inter partes the title was placed as originally contemplated. We cannot, therefore, doubt that the power of attorney was effectual to authorize a conveyance of the undivided interest of Herbert. Such was the practical construction placed upon the instrument by all the parties, and Herbert, by his subsequent deed, sanctioned such construction of it. We cannot at this late day give to the instrument the strict construction contended for, which runs counter to that placed upon it by those interested, and which would be effectual to oppose the clear intent of the parties, and to divest titles acquired in good faith under it.

We proceed to inquire with respect to the validity of the deeds to Wilson and to Markland under this power of attorney. It is objected to their validity that the execution by Herbert to Mitchell of the deed of July 8, 1856, of all his interest in section 16 accomplished the object of the agency created by the power of attorney, terminated the authority of the agents, and that notice of such termination was not essential. The objection cannot be sustained. The power of attorney was recorded, giving notice to the world of the authority of the agents. The law requires that the termination of that authority, to be effective against purchasers in good faith from the attorney, should be likewise recorded. It may be conceded that the conveyance by Herbert, in a sense, terminated the agency, because the subject-matter upon which the agency operated was disposed of by his deed; but, the deed not having been recorded, the termination of the agency was not effective against those dealing in good faith with the agents, for without notice of revocation the parties were justified in acting upon the presumption of the continuance of the agency. Hatch v. Coddington, 95 U. S. 48, 24 L. ed. 339; Southern L. Ins. Co. v. McCuin, 96 U. S. 84, 24 L. ed. 653; Johnson v. Christian, 128 U. S. 374, 381, 32 L. ed. 412, 414.

It is further objected that the deed from Herbert to Mitchell, being prior in point of time, although subsequent in point of record, was effectual to pass the title of the premises, and was valid against the whole world, except bona fide purchasers for value, without notice, and that the burden of proof with respect to the bona fides of the deeds subsequent in date, but prior of record, is cast upon those claiming under them. This presents a question not altogether without difficulty, and in respect to which the authorities are not wholly at agreement. Jackson, Rounds, v. M'Cheaney, 7 Cow. 360, 17 Am. Dec. 521; Wood v. Chapin, 13 N. Y. 509, 67 Am. Dec. 62; Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410; Hoyt v. Jones, 31 Wis. 389, 404; Lampe v. Kennedy, 56 Wis. 249; Culler v. James, 64 Wis. 173, 179, 54 Am. Rep. 603; Prickett v. Muck, 74 Wis. 199, 206. In the state of New York it is ruled that under the recording act the junior purchaser, whose deed is first recorded, is presumptively a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, and that the burden of proof to the contrary rests upon the senior purchaser, whose deed has not been recorded. In Michigan it is held that the burden is upon him who claims by virtue of priority of record to show affirmatively the payment of a valuable consideration, but that the burden is upon him claiming under a deed of prior date, but subsequent record, to show that such purchaser under the deed having priority of record had notice of the prior, unrecorded deed. Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410. This ruling is founded upon the notion that, the payment of the purchase price being peculiarly within the knowledge of the grantee under the deed having priority of record, the law would not impose the burden of proving the negative fact upon the opposite party. In this case there was a very able and strong dissent by Campbell, Ch. J., to the effect that there is no ground for any such distinction, and that the burden rests upon the party claiming under the unrecorded deed. In Hoyt v. Jones, 31 Wis. 389, 404, the supreme court of Wisconsin for the first time considered the subject, and, in an able opinion by Chief Justice Dixon, concurred with the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Campbell, and with the decisions of the state of New York, and held that the law would not presume fraud or bad faith on the part of the subsequent purchaser, and that the grantee under the unrecorded deed, being a party in the wrong, by omitting to record his deed, must assume the burden of showing a want of consideration or notice in the purchaser under the deed having a priority of record; and this, we think, is the better rule, because, as suggested by Chief Justice Campbell, any other doctrine would render the registry laws of very little value, especially in a case like the present, in which we are dealing with transactions of over forty years ago. The witnesses to the transaction may have died, or may have become inaccessible. If the prior record deed was fraudulent, Mitchell had ample means to protect his title by resorting to the courts at a time when the transaction was fresh, and the witnesses to it were living and could be obtained. His delay is that which at this time renders proof difficult, and it seems but just, under such circumstances, that the burden should be cast upon him and those claiming under him, rather than that the law should indulge the presumption that these deeds executed almost simultaneously with Mitchell's were fraudulent. There is no proof here of the time of the delivery of the deed to Mitchell. It was not recorded for a week after its execution. Mitchell and his heirs rely, as they probably may, upon the presumption of law that it was delivered at its date. But, to effectuate that presumption, it seems unjust that we should indulge the further presumption that the grantees of the recorded deed were guilty of fraud, which is never to be presumed. The authority of Hoyt v. Jones is thought to be weakened by the subsequent decisions in the supreme court of Wisconsin. In Lampe v. Kennedy, 56 Wis. 249, it was ruled that between the subsequent purchaser, whose deed is first recorded, and one not claiming under the grantee in the prior conveyance, the burden is upon the latter to show notice of the prior conveyance, and want of valuable consideration. No one will dispute the correctness of the rule, but Mr. Justice Lyon, after rightly deciding the point, enlarges in the following language: "Probably, also, in a contest between two grantees of the same grantor (the last deed being of record and the first unrecorded) the onus would be upon the junior grantee to show that he purchased in good faith for a valuable consideration."

This observation is purely obiter, was made without any reference to the prior decision of the court in Hoyt v. Jones, and is not authority. In Outler v. James, 64 Wis. 173, 179, 54 Am. Rep. 603, the point does not appear to have received much consideration, but the opinion indicates that the burden of proof may be shifted from one party to the other, according to the circumstances of the case. There was no direct evidence on the one side or the other with respect to notice of the prior, unrecorded deed, but certain inferences from the facts indicated want of notice; and the court held that the burden was upon the party claiming under the prior, unrecorded deed. There was no reference to the case of Hoyt v. Jones. This case supports, rather than questions, the doctrine of Hoyt v. Jones. In Prickett v. Muck, 74 Wis. 199, 206, the court ruled that, because the defendant was shown to have actual notice of the existence of the will and the death of the testator at the time that he took a conveyance of the property from the grantee in the deed having priority of record, he could not be entitled to the protection of the statute without showing that his grantor was a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration. No reference is made to the case of Hoyt v. Jones, except that it is cited approvingly upon another point. The case seems to have turned largely upon a question of pleading, and there is no indication that the court designed to overrule its former decisions. We are satisfied that the rule in Hoyt v. Jones is the better rule to work out substantial justice. If the rule, however, were otherwise, there are here certain facts, and inferences which we may properly indulge from the facts, which we think should avail to shift the burden upon the appellants, if it originally rested upon the opposite party. The deed to Mitchell is dated July 8. It was retained from the record until July 15. On July 9 the two deeds were executed by Herbert, by his attorneys, to Wilson and Markland, respectively, and were recorded on the same day. The four pre-emptors had, on the 2d day of June previous, executed to Wilson a bond conditioned to convey to him an undivided one-eighth part of the section when the title should become perfected in them. This instrument acknowledges the payment of the consideration of $900, was executed on the part of Herbert by his attorneys in fact, and was recorded on the 2d day of June, 1856. By this instrument Wilson obtained an equitable interest in the land, of which Mitchell had constructive notice by the record at the time of the execution to him by Herbert of the deed dated July 8, 1856. We cannot doubt, moreover, that Mitchell had also actual notice of the equitable title of Wilson, and agreed to assume, and did assume, in part, the obligation of the pre-emptors to convey; for on the 7th day of July, 1856, the day previous to the conveyance by Herbert to him, Mitchell conveyed to Wilson an undivided one-thirty-second part of the section. This conveyance is by the answer asserted to have been in compliance with the undertaking of Herbert on the bond, but the further allegation that it was in full satisfaction of that obligation is not proved, and cannot be assumed, because it was a conveyance of but one-fourth part of the amount agreed to be conveyed. The two conveyances vested in Wilson an undivided three thirty-seconds of the section, whereas by the bond he was entitled to an undivided one-eighth; and the record does not satisfactorily account for the deficiency, unless it be represented in the deed to Markland made in pursuance of some arrangement between the parties. The consideration stated in the various deeds and in the bond lend some countenance to the view that, as between the pre-emptors and Mitchell, one half of the equitable right of Wilson was by agreement imposed upon the undivided half which was conveyed to Mitchell. In this connection the language of the deed by Herbert to Mitchell is not without significance. There is enough, however, to show that Mitchell had both constructive and actual knowledge of the equitable rights of Wilson, and took the title from Herbert subject to them. We perceive, therefore, no reason upon which the conveyance to Wilson under power of attorney can, upon this record, be successfully impeached; and we think, aside from any general rule, that the circumstances cast the burden of proof upon those claiming under the deed prior in date but subsequent of record.

The equities with respect to the deed to Markland are less clear and strong, but we think there is sufficient to impose the burden of proof upon the claimants under the unrecorded deed. There does not appear, it is true, to have been any written agreement by Herbert to convey to Markland; but before the entry of the land there was an agreement by McCracken to convey to Markland an undivided one-thirty-second part of the section, upon payment of a certain proportion of the expense to be incurred. This appeared in the agreement with the original pre-emptors, and it is under this agreement that Mitchell obtained his title. Wilson did not obtain all the land to which he was entitled, and for which he had paid. An undivided one-thirty-second part was retained, which corresponds with the amount agreed to be sold to Markland upon payment by him of his proportionate part of the expenses incurred. The land was entered at the price of $1.25 an acre, and Markland was entitled to receive 16.83 acres. The consideration mentioned in the deed from Herbert to him was $20. We cannot, of course, say that there was an arrangement between Mitchell, Markland, McCracken, and Herbert by which the obligation to convey to Markland was imposed upon Herbert, but the indications point in that direction. Mitchell, in conveying to McCracken the undivided one-fourth of the section, retained 8 acres,—just one half of the acreage to which Markland was entitled,—which would indicate that McCracken and Mitchell each assumed the obligation to convey to Markland one half of the amount to which he was entitled. At this late day it doubtless would be impossible to ascertain with precision just what was agreed between the parties. It is pertinent to observe that down to the time of his death, in 1892, Mitchell claimed to have no remaining interest in the section, and to have conveyed all his interest in trust for his children. This deed, it is true, upon the assumption of the validity of the deeds to Markland and to Wilson, conveyed 8 acres more than he owned; but, if he had claimed those deeds to be void, there would have remained 16.83 acres unconveyed by the trust deed. It is not surprising that transactions of nearly fifty years ago, and with respect to lands of but nominal value, should be obscure and inexact. We think there is enough to show that Mitchell had recognized this deed to Markland to such an extent that the burden of proving that it was not executed for a valuable consideration is imposed upon those claiming under him, even if we are incorrect in the assumption that the burden of proof in the first instance rests upon those claiming under the unrecorded deed. In this view of the case, Mitchell acquired title to 302 acres and a fraction of the land, the title to all of which, by means conveyances, became vested in the Land & River Improvement Company, one of the appellees.

It is urged by the appellants that the deeds to Mitchell, to Taylor, to McCracken, and to the trustees for the benefit of Mitchell's children, and from the latter to Spooner, conveying undivided acres in the section, are void for uncertainty. The contention cannot be sustained. The grantee in such deed acquires an interest in the whole tract as tenant in common, and in the proportion which the number of acres conveyed bears to the whole number of acres in the tract, and such deed entitles the grantee to all the rights and remedies incident to the tenancy in common, Freeman. Coten. & Part. § 96. Thus, in Gibbs v. Swift, 12 Cush. 393, 398, the deed conveyed 211 undivided acres out of a tract of 1,878 acres, and the court ruled: "It gave him a share, as tenant in common, of the whole tract, in the proportion which 211 bears to 1,878."

In Battel v. Smith, 14 Gray, 497, there were deeds of "2½ acres, undivided, in lot 17;" "3½ acres, more or less, in number 17;" part of "20 acres and 60 rods, in common pasture, lying in common with other proprietors;" and "2½ acres of land" in the southeast division of common pasture, "in lot number 17, and is undivided." The court observed: "By these deeds we think it clear that the grantors intended to convey an undivided interest in the whole of lot number 17, in the proportion which the number of acres specified and granted by the deed bears to the whole quantity of land contained in that lot. The use of the word 'undivided' and the phrase 'lying in common' show that the interest conveyed was undivided and in common, and not an estate in severalty; and the quantity of land granted is ascertained and fixed with certainty by the grant of a designated aliquot part of the whole land owned in common."

To this effect is Jewett v. Foster, 14 Gray, 495.

In Small v. Jenkins, 16 Gray, 155, there was a conveyance of 1,750 acres, undivided, out of an estate of 14,000 acres held in common with other persons, no share in which had been set off in severalty. The court said: "Instead of expressing in the deed in express words or terms the part or proportion of their interest which they intended to convey, this was done indirectly, but just as intelligibly and effectually, by a conveyance of a specified number of acres. They conveyed 1,750 acres, undivided; so that, if the whole tract consisted of 14,000 acres, the conveyance was of 1750-14000 parts of it."

See also Jackson, Garnsey, v. Livingston, 7 Wend. 136; Corbin, Jackson, v. Garnsey, 14 Wend. 619, 28 Am. Dec. 550; Schenk v. Eddy, 24 Cal. 110; Sheafe v. Wait, 80 Vt. 735.

It is further urged that these undivided acre deeds conveyed only the number of acres designated, and did not grant an interest in the land under water. It is settled that the extent of the title of a riparian owner to the bed of a river is one of local law (Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. ed. 428; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018; Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 381), and that in the state of Wisconsin the riparian owner takes title to the bed of the river to the thread of the stream (Norcross v. Griffiths, 65 Wis. 599, 56 Am. Rep. 642). It is thereupon insisted for appellants that the conveyance of an undivided number of acres of upland carries with it no title to the bed of the river, that the language of the deed should not be enlarged to include more than the specified number of acres, and that at the most, if the grantee in an undivided acre deed is to be deemed a tenant in common, his interest is to be computed, not with reference to the acreage in the uplands, but with reference to the combined acreage of the upland and the bed of the stream to midchannel. We concur with the supreme court of Massachusetts (Battel v. Smith, 14 Gray, 497, 499) that by such conveyances as those in question "the grantors intended to convey an undivided interest in the whole" of the lot, "in the proportion which the number of acres specified and granted by the deed bears to the whole quantity of land contained in that lot." In other words, we think that Mitchell intended to convey to Taylor ⅙, to McCracken ⅙, and that the heirs of Mitchell intended to convey to Spooner ⅙, which, with the ⅙ conveyed by Mitchell to Wilson, would aggregate ⅙, or 302.24 acres, the total of Mitchell's holding. He therefore was correct in his assertion that he had disposed of his entire interest, unless the undivided acre deeds take no interest in the bed of the stream. We are of opinion that this latter suggestion must be resolved in favor of the appellees. The nature of the title to the bed of a stream or to a highway is peculiar. It is burdened in the one case with the paramount right of navigation, and in the other with the superior right of traffic, and of those uses to which the public may rightfully put a highway, which are so numerous and burdensome that it has been declared that there is no substantial difference between streets in which the legal title is in the private individual and those in which it is in the public, as to the rights of the public therein. Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 824, 24 L. ed. 224; La Crosse v. Cameron, 46 U. S. App. 722, 25 C. C. A. 899, 80 Fed. Rep. 264. So that it has come about, as expressed by Judge Redfield in Buck v. Squiers, 22 Vt. 484, 495, that "in ninety-nine cases in every hundred the parties, at the time of the conveyance, do not esteem the land covered by the highway of any importance either way; hence they use words naturally descriptive of the prominent idea in their minds at the time, and in so doing define the land which it is expected the party will occupy and improve."

See also Wallace's American Notes to Dowson v. Payne, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. in Eq. 7th Am. ed. 142. In the state of Wisconsin we therefore naturally find that the rule is established that a grant of land bordering upon the highway, one specified boundary of the premises conveyed being the south line of the street upon which the lot abuts, in the absence of other words of exclusion, carries the fee to the center of the street. Kneeland v. Van Valkenburgh, 46 Wis. 484, 32 Am. Rep. 719. And in respect to land bounded upon a navigable stream, a conveyance thereof by metes and bounds, without mention of the stream, but which included the whole of the bank of the stream along the whole length of the part conveyed, was presumed to have been intended to convey, and was held to have conveyed, all the rights of the grantor to the bed of the stream in front of the described land to the middle of the stream, and that such presumption can be rebutted only by an actual reservation in the deed, or by evidence of such circumstances attending the making of the conveyance as clearly show an intention to limit the ground to the exact boundary fixed by the description. Norcross v. Griffiths, 65 Wis. 599, 56 Am. Rep. 642. It is there ruled that the owner of the bank is presumed to be the owner of the stream, and that, while the ownership of the bed of the stream may be separated from the ownership of the bank, such intention to overcome the presumption must explicitly appear by the grant. In the light of these authorities, we have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the bed of the stream passed with the conveyance of the upland. We have shown that the undivided acre deeds constitute the grantees tenants in common with the other owners in this section. It is clear that the extent of their ownership was in proportion to the whole number of acres within the meander line. We do not overlook the fact that the meander line is not the boundary of the lot, but it was a line within the contemplation of the parties, by which to designate and ascertain the extent of the interest conveyed. There are no words of reservation which exclude the bed of the stream. The presumption must therefore obtain that it passed with the bank, and the evidence is clear that it was designed so to pass.

The decree is affirmed.

John ROWZEE et al., Appts.,

v.

E. C. PIERCE et al.

(.....Miss.....)

1. An amendment to a bill for an injunction against the improper use of land dedicated to the public should be allowed to join some of the original donors as plaintiffs, when the bill was filed by other resident citizens.
2. The erection of a schoolhouse upon a lot dedicated "only for public use as an ornamental park" is a wrongful use of the property.
3. An injunction against devoting property dedicated for an ornamental park to any other use can be granted in favor of the original donors of the property.

NOTE.—As to conveyance on condition for specified purposes, see Greene v. O'Connor (R. I.) 19 L. R. A. 262; also Kilpatrick v. Baltimore (Md.) 27 L. R. A. 643.

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Pontotoc County dismissing a suit brought to enjoin the erection of a schoolhouse upon land which had been dedicated for a public park. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. D. Fontaine for appellants.

Messrs. Blair & Anderson for appellees.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The original bill in this case charged that on the 25th day of May, 1854, a deed was executed by the grantors therein to the president and selectmen of the town of Pontotoc and their successors in office to lots Nos. 20

As to action by landowner to protect park, see Clarke v. Providence (R. I.) 1 L. R. A. 725.

As to conveyance for specified purpose as creating determinable fee, see First Universalist Soc. v. Boland (Mass.) 15 L. R. A. 231.

and 21 in the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of sec. 33, T. 9, R. 3 E., "only for public use as an ornamental park, subject to such regulations as they may make for the purpose of fencing and ornamenting the same, and keeping the same in good order, and preventing nuisances, or anything tending to subvert the before-declared object of the donors of money to purchase the same;" that said dedication was duly consummated by acceptance on the part of the public authorities; that the board of mayor and aldermen of the town of Pontotoc are the successors in office of the said president and selectmen of the said town of Pontotoc; that the said board of mayor and aldermen of the town of Pontotoc declared the said town to be a separate school district: that the school building—the Pontotoc Male Academy—in which said separate school district school was taught, had been, on or about the 28th day of January, 1897, destroyed by fire; that the said board had contracted with one E. C. Pierce to erect another schoolhouse, and that said Pierce, instead of building said schoolhouse upon the site of the burned school building, or on land belonging to said Pontotoc Male Academy, had begun the construction of said building upon said lot No. 20, and was doing this under the direction and with the consent and approbation of said board of mayor and aldermen; that complainants were lotholders within the corporate limits of the town of Pontotoc, without saying, however, whether their lots adjoined the public square or not; that the erection of said schoolhouse building upon said lot was putting it to a use other than that authorized by the terms of said deed of dedication, and was not consistent with or necessary to the principal use for which said dedication was made,—that of an ornamental park only; that the erection of said schoolhouse building upon said lot was a direct and palpable violation of the use for which said lots of land were dedicated; and prayed an injunction against said Pierce and the said board of mayor and aldermen of the town of Pontotoc to restrain them from erecting said building upon said lot, and using said lot for schoolhouse purposes, and to enforce the proper use of said lot according to the terms of the deed dedicating it. This bill was filed on behalf of complainants and other resident citizens of the town. Subsequently, the complainants asked leave to amend their bill by making J. F. Wray and W. J. Rodgers, two of the original donors of the purchase money of the land, parties complainant. The original bill further alleged that the dedication was made subject to "such regulations as the city authorities might make for the purpose of fencing and ornamenting the same, and keeping the same in good order, and preventing nuisances, or anything tending to subvert the before-declared object of the donors of money to purchase the same." The language of the deed is as follows: "To have and to hold the aforesaid lots to the party of the second part and their successors in office forever, but only for public use as an ornamental park, subject to such regulations as they may make for the purpose of fencing and ornamenting the same, and keeping the same in good order, and preventing nuisances, or anything tending to subvert the before-declared object of the donors of money to purchase the same." The defendants demurred to the bill upon the grounds: (1) That the complainants failed to show that they would be injured in any way whatever, either as taxpayers, property owners, or citizens of said town, or otherwise, by the building of said schoolhouse, and that they did not show that the construction of said building would be a public injury; (2) that the bill showed that the building of said schoolhouse would not cause any injury special or peculiar to complainants, or any injury other than such as would be common to all the citizens of said town; (3) that the complainants had no right to institute the suit, but that it should be brought by the proper public official on behalf of all the citizens of said town; (4) that the bill showed that said lots had been abandoned for the purposes for which they were dedicated, and that the said town therefore had acquired the right to use them for any other legitimate purpose. Affidavits were taken by both parties. The chancellor disallowed the amendment, sustained the demurrer, dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill.

It may be conceded that the preponderance of the testimony showed that the public school building was being erected on one corner of the square upon a part of the ground considerably cut up by gullies, and which the city authorities or Pierce had filled up to make a foundation for the building. The bill in this case is not filed to abate a nuisance, either public or private. The cases of Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 540, 28 Am. Rep. 378; and Whitfield v. Rogers, 26 Miss. 84, 59 Am. Dec. 244, are both inapplicable here. And the case of Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598, is also inapplicable, not being a bill filed on the line of the bill in the case at bar. Neither is this bill filed to enjoin the collection of taxes, or of local charges. Cases of that character are also mal appropos. The amendment should have been allowed; and, treating the bill as so amended, it would be one by the original complainants and two of the original donors of the purchase money of the land dedicated to public use as an ornamental park alone against the city authorities and the contractor, to restrain them from devoting the land dedicated to any other use than that named in the dedicating deed, and to secure to the town the very use to which the owners of the property making the dedication declared it should be devoted. It is well settled that such a bill may be filed by such donors, as well as by the city authorities, and against the city authorities, restraining them from devoting the property to an inhibited use, when they themselves violate the trust by seeking to devote the land to any other than the declared use; and many authorities hold it may be maintained by any lotowner in the city. Church v. Portland (Or.) 6 L. R. A. 259, and the exhaustive note thereto (18 Or. 73); Daniel v. Jacoway, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 59. In note, at page 260, in 6 L. R. A. it is said, "If the dedicated property be put to a use foreign to that contemplated by the dedication, any property owner may inhibit such use," citing many cases. And at page 262 the same doctrine is declared in the conclusion of the note, citing many other authorities. Warren v. Lyons City, 22 Iowa, 351; Van Wert Bd. of Edu. v. Edson, 18 Ohio St. 221, 98 Am. Dec. 114; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 658, and the authorities in note 1, and § 915. In this last section Mr. Dillon observes: "If the property or funds of such a corporation be illegally or wrongfully interfered with, or its powers be misused, ordinarily the action to prevent or redress the wrong should be brought by and in the name of the corporation. But if the officers of the corporation are parties to the wrong, or if they will not discharge their duty, why may not any inhabitant . . . be allowed to maintain in behalf of all similarly situated a class suit to prevent or avoid the illegal or wrongful act? Such a right is especially necessary in the case of municipal and public corporations, and if it be denied to exist, they are liable to be plundered, and the taxpayers and property owners on whom the loss will eventually fall are without effectual remedy." Carter v. Portland, 4 Or. 339; Price v. Thompson, 48 Mo. 361; Com. v. Rush, 14 Pa. 186. In Carter's Case it is said that "any lotholder of the city may proceed in equity to enforce the use according to the original dedication," citing numerous authorities. Briel v. Natchez, 48 Miss. 439; Rutherford v. Taylor, 38 Mo. 315; Le Clercq v. Gallipolis, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 217, 28 Am. Dec. 641; note to State v. Traak (Vt.) 27 Am. Dec. 569, under the title, "Changing the Use," where Mr. Freeman says: "Where property dedicated is put to a use other than that authorized by the terms of the dedication, then the dedicatrix or any lotholder of the city may proceed in equity to enforce the proper use." 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 418, note 1, and the authorities.

It is said that the title is absolute in the city authorities. This is a mistake. It is not absolute in the sense that the city had the whole title, legal and equitable, and the right to dispose of the property as an owner in fee simple might; and cases like Clarke v. Providence, 16 R. I. 337, 1 L. R. A. 725, where cities had such complete title, and their disposition of property thereunder has been upheld, are not applicable here. This property, according to the said terms of the dedicating deed, is held in trust "for use only as a public, ornamental park." It is specially provided that it might be fenced, and the sole authority which the city had was to regulate the use marked out; not to change it or alter it so as to put it to a used only inconsistent with the one named by the dedicatrix. It may be true, as said in note 4, p. 417, 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, that the land "might be put to any use consistent with the object of the dedication, and which would better adapt the premises to the particular use," but it is clearly settled by authority that the erection of a schoolhouse building in a public square is not consistent with the use of the lot as an ornamental public square. It is held in Rutherford v. Taylor, 38 Mo. 315, that buildings could not be erected in a public square; and in Edson's Case, 18 Ohio St. 221, 98 Am. Dec. 114, it is said: "The dedication in this case, as stated in the petition, was 'for school purposes, and on which to erect schoolhouses.' Without determining whether, under this dedication, the lots could properly be used for school purposes, other than the erection of schoolhouses thereon, it is enough to say that the dedication is of the land, and not of its value or proceeds." And in the case of Church v. Portland, 18 Or. 73, 6 L. R. A. 259, it is held that ground for a public park could not be used for the purposes of erecting thereon a city hall; the court saying: "Using land to erect a public building thereon is not using it for ornamental purposes, however grand or magnificent the structure erected may be. It devotes the land to a useful purpose, but it certainly is not using it for an ornamental one. . . . The city of Portland was no mendicant, nor was it expected to be. It has always been able to buy necessary and suitable grounds upon which to erect its public buildings; and it should do so, and not attempt to encroach upon its public squares, which were clearly intended to be left open and unoccupied for the health, comfort, and recreation of its inhabitants. The argument of the respondent's counsel, that the dedicatrix intended that the blocks might be ornamented with public buildings, if the city authorities should so determine, if maintained, would be liable to lead to absurd consequences. One set of the city officials might hold to one policy, and another set to a contrary one, and each act lawfully. The city authorities of to-day might determine that the blocks should be ornamented with public buildings, and proceed to erect them at a great expense; which would be entirely consistent with the intention of the dedicatrix. The city authorities of next year may conclude that the blocks should be ornamented only with walks, rustic seats, trees, grass, flowers, fountains, statues, and mementoes of heroic deeds, and, in order to carry out the latter mode of ornamentation, proceed to tear down the edifices erected by their predecessors; which would be equally consistent with the intention of the dedicatrix. I do not think that the court would be justified in adopting any such view. The rule in regard to property dedicated for public use, as laid down in 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 417, 418, is as follows: 'Property dedicated to the public use may be said to be restricted to the use for which it was fairly intended to be dedicated; although this rule is construed to include such uses as are consistent with, or necessary to the principal use. If dedicated property be put to a use foreign to that contemplated by the intention and purpose of the dedication, then not only the dedicatrix, but any property owner, will have his remedy in equity to enforce the proper use and inhibit an improper one.' . . . That the blocks were intended to remain open plazas, and be beautified and adorned by the hand of art, I do not think there can be any doubt. Spots of that character, especially in large cities, are highly important. They afford healthful and pleasant resorts in the heated season, and are, in fact, the only places where a large class of the community are able to go and enjoy the blessings and comfort of shade and pure air; and any attempt on the part of public officials to appropriate them as a site for public buildings, in which to conduct the economic affairs of a city, under any pretext whatever, would, as I view it, be a cruel effort to subvert a humane scheme." So, in Methodist Episcopal Church v. Hoboken, 38 N. J. L. 13, 97 Am. Dec. at page 698, it is said: "The word 'square' on this plot of ground, indicated a public use, either for purposes of a free passage, or to be ornamented and improved for grounds of pleasure, amusement, recreation, or health. That is the proper and natural meaning of the term, and its ordinary and usual signification." In Com. v. Rush, 14 Pa. 186, the same meaning is given the word "square." So that it is clear that the terms of this grant dedicated the ground to use as a public, ornamental park alone, and that the word "park" ex vi termini means a place to be kept open and ornamented for public uses such as above indicated. It is also clear that the right to regulate the park under this specific use furnishes no right to change that use. But it is said again that this ground cannot be dedicated to the use of a park better than by erecting this building; that the construction of such a building is, on the doctrine of cy près, appropriating it to the next best use in the nature of an ornamental public park; but the authorities above cited show that no such construction can be indulged on the facts in this case. See, especially, Van Wert Bd. of Edu. v. Edison, 18 Ohio St. 226, 98 Am. Dec. 114; Church v. Portland, 18 Or. 73, 6 L. R. A. 259; 2 Perry, Tr. § 727; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1027. In 2 Perry on Trusts, supra, it is said: "From this review of the law it appears that the object of all the rules upon this subject is to ascertain and carry out, as nearly as may be, the true intention of the donor. As thus explained, the doctrine of cy près is only a liberal rule of construction to ascertain intention. The intention of the donor is the point steadily aimed at by all courts." Apply these principles here, and the inquiry would be, What was the intention of the donors at the time the dedication was made in 1854? At that time it may well be supposed that this town was prosperous. War had not ruined the town, and destroyed its revenues, and the intention of the dedicators at the time the grant was made was doubtless to keep open this place as a public, ornamental park for the uses indicated in the authorities cited; and it is not for the court, on account of changed conditions, due to civil convulsion, to substitute what the dedicators might now wish to be done for the intention as it existed when the grant was made. It is said also that this property had been abandoned, and hence the city authorities might do as they pleased with it. This is not the law. If it had been abandoned, then the fee in the property reverted to the original donors, and not to the city. In Carter v. Portland, 4 Or. 389, it is said that "the original owner, though he has the naked fee, has no right whatever to interfere with the premises except where the use becomes absolutely impossible, or where the corporate authorities seek to put the premises to some other use than that to which they were originally dedicated." In Briel v. Natchez, 48 Miss., at page 438, it is said: "If the city had lost the easement by abandonment and nonuser, Green, or his heirs, would take the property by the original title discharged of the encumbrance of the servitude." In Van Wert Bd. of Edu. v. Edison, 18 Ohio St., it is said at page 226, 98 Am. Dec. 114: "Should the sole uses, to which the property has been dedicated, become impossible of execution, the property would revert to the dedicators, or their representatives," citing authorities. It must thus be clear that none of the objections interposed by the demurrer are available as against a bill of this particular nature. It certainly cannot be impossible for the town of Pontotoc to raise funds, with which to make this property a public, ornamental park, as was originally intended. The town may not be able, and it might not be desirable, to incur any great expense towards this end; but surely the expense would be small which would be required to properly keep it in order, and use it as an open, public, ornamental park, devoted to the amusement, recreation, and health of the citizens. Neither can it be necessary that a public school building should be erected in the park. No reason is shown why it might not as well have been erected on the site of the original building. But, however all this may be, it remains true, on principle and on authority, that the original donors dedicating this ground for a public ornamental park alone are entitled in equity to prohibit the city authorities, or anyone in conjunction with them, from devoting it to any other use than such as is clearly consistent with the purpose of the original grant.

Decree reversed, injunction reinstated, and cause remanded, with directions to allow the amendment, and proceed in accordance with this opinion.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

Charles SEARS, Appt.,
v.
GALLATIN COUNTY, Respt.
(.....Mont.....)

A county is not liable for services rendered by members of a sheriff's posse comitatus, in the absence of statutory provision for their compensation.

(February 14, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Gallatin County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover for services rendered and money expended by him as a member of the sheriff's posse. Affirmed.

Statement by Pigott, J.:

Plaintiff brought this action to recover judgment for $25 on account of services rendered and money expended by him as a member of the sheriff's posse comitatus. It appeared that the sheriff of Gallatin county attempted to execute a warrant for the apprehension of one Morgan, charged with the commission of a felony in that county. Being unable to take Morgan, who resisted arrest and fled, the sheriff deemed it necessary, and the admission is made that it was necessary, to command plaintiff and certain other citizens of the county to equip themselves, and accompany that officer, and assist him in pursuing and arresting Morgan. The sheriff, in the discharge of his duty, and by virtue of the power vested in him, did so command plaintiff and others. Plaintiff, believing that it was necessary for him to comply with the demand of the sheriff, and that he would be compensated by the county, procured, at his own expense, arms, ammunition, horse, saddle, and other equipment, and then proceeded to search for Morgan, who escaped. While so engaged, plaintiff expended $10.50 for food. The reasonable value of such services of man and horse was $14.50. The board of commissioners of Gallatin county disallowed plaintiff's claim. Upon appeal therefrom the district court adjudged that the claim was not a legal charge against the county, and plaintiff appeals to this court.

Mr. W. L. Holloway, for appellant:

Had the sheriff paid the plaintiff, and he, himself, then had sued the county for the $25, the case would occupy the same position it does now so far as the questions involved are concerned, and would be an exact parallel with the case of—

Lloyd v. Silver Bow County Comrs. 15 Mont. 438.

Section 4286, Political Code, provides, among other things, that accounts against a county for official services for which no specified fees are fixed by law must contain an itemized account of the time actually and necessarily devoted to such services.

The above provision furnishes ample authority to the board of commissioners of Gallatin county, to allow and pay plaintiff's claim.

Yavapai County v. O'Neil (Ariz.) 29 Pac. 430.

Mr. C. B. Nolan, Attorney General, for respondent:

Members of a sheriff's posse comitatus are not deputy sheriffs. The number of compensation receiving deputies allowed the sheriff is limited by §§ 4597 and 4603 of the Political Code.

Compensation to members of a sheriff's posse is nowhere made a county charge, either expressly or by implication.

The services rendered by the members of the posse belong to that class of general services which every man owes to the public, and is bound to render for the general as well as his own individual good.

Chapin v. Ferry, 3 Wash. 386, 15 L. R. A. 116; Randles v. Waukeesh County, 96 Wis. 629; Kuehn v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 283, and cases cited; Morin v. Multnomah County, 18 Or. 163. 40 L. R. A.

Every citizen capable of bearing arms, of every rank, description, and denomination, is bound to yield prompt obedience to the sheriff's command and repair to meet him at any appointed place of rendezvous within the county. This duty of the citizen is absolute. He has no discretion in the matter, and if he neglect or refuse obedience to the command of the sheriff requiring his aid in the suppression of a dangerous riot or other insurrectionary tumult, he may be fined and imprisoned for such contumacy, at the discretion of the court. His obligation to come to the aid of the sheriff is just as imperative as that imposed on the latter to see the community suffer no harm from lawless licentiousness.

Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. note to § 17; Lloyd v. Silver Bow County Comrs. 15 Mont. 438; Yavapai County v. O'Neil (Ariz.) 29 Pac. 430; State v. Shaw, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 20.

Pigott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented in the court below and in this court is whether or not a county is liable for services rendered by members of a sheriff's posse comitatus. Section 4381 of the Political Code provides that the sheriff must "arrest and take before the nearest magistrate, for examination, all persons who attempt to commit or have committed a public offense," and that he must "command the aid of as many male inhabitants of his county as he may think necessary in the execution of these duties." Section 1460 of the Penal Code provides: "When a sheriff or other public officer authorized to execute process, finds, or has reason to apprehend, that resistance will be made to the execution of the process, he may command as many male inhabitants of his county as he thinks proper to assist him in overcoming the resistance, and, if necessary, in seizing, arresting and confining the persons resisting, their aiders and abettors." Section 279 of the Penal Code is as follows: "Every male person above the age of eighteen years who neglects or refuses to join the posse comitatus, or power of the county, by neglecting or refusing to aid and assist in taking or arresting any person against whom there may be issued any process, or by neglecting to aid and assist in retaking any person who, after being arrested or confined, may have escaped from such arrest or imprisonment, or by neglecting or refusing to aid and assist in preventing any breach of the peace, or the commission of any criminal offense, being thereto lawfully required by any sheriff, deputy sheriff, coroner, constable, judge, or justice of the peace, or other officer concerned in the administration of justice, is punishable by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $1,000." Section 4286 of the Political Code provides, among other things, that the board of commissioners shall not allow any account for official services for which no specified fees are fixed by law, unless the time actually and necessarily devoted to such services is stated. Section 4681 of the same Code enumerates the county charges other than salaries of officers and fees of witnesses and jurors, and provides that the contingent expenses necessarily incurred for the use and benefit of the county shall be county charges. The right of appellant to recover depends upon the existence of express or implied authority of statute allowing compensation to members of the posse comitatus. No express provision is made by statute for the compensation of such persons; neither is there implied statutory authority warranting the payment of such compensation. Section 4681, supra, which provides that the contingent expenses necessarily incurred for the use and benefit of the county shall be county charges, manifestly restricts the liability of the county to such expenses as may be incurred under statutory authority directly conferred or necessarily implied from the powers granted to the county. Section 4286, supra, makes provision touching the contents of verified bills for services of officers for which specified fees are not fixed by law. It does not declare that the county shall be liable for any services, official or otherwise. Its effect, for the purpose of this case, is merely to provide that the board of commissioners shall not allow any account for official services chargeable to the county for which no fees are specified by statute, unless the bill therefor contains an itemized statement of the time actually and necessarily devoted to such service. Moreover, members of the sheriff's posse are not officers, nor do they render official services. Clearly, this section fails to raise an implication of liability to appellant.

Appellant insists, however, that under the terms of § 4681, supra, he is entitled to prevail. He argues that the section "furnishes ample authority to the board of county commissioners of Gallatin county to allow and pay plaintiff's claim." We are of the opinion that the county is not liable to plaintiff for his services and expenses incurred as a member of the posse comitatus. The statutes have imposed upon counties certain duties and expenses, but have not imposed the expense and compensation of members of the posse comitatus. "When the statutes impose upon counties or other municipal bodies certain duties and expenses in that behalf, they are bound to assume them, but whatever is not thus imposed is not thus assumed." Chapin v. Ferry, 3 Wash. 386, 15 L. R. A. 116. Appellant cannot recover upon the theory of an implied promise by the county to reimburse and compensate him, for the making of such a contract is beyond the power of a county. Again, there was no consideration moving from appellant which can support a promise, express or implied, by the county to reimburse or compensate him. The legislature imposed on appellant the duty of assisting the sheriff in his efforts to apprehend Morgan, and denounced him as guilty of a crime if he refused, and this created a promise from him to discharge that duty; "so that, being under the obligation, he can claim no pay for doing the duty, and any pay given him is a mere gratuity." Bishop, Contr. § 207, and cases there cited. "One who renders service to the state for which there is no compensation provided by statute cannot, as in the case of services rendered to a private person, raise an implied assumption against the state, and for such services he has no legal claim, that is no claim which can be enforced by process of law." State v. Baldwin, 14 S. C. 185. Even an express promise to reward a man for doing that which was his duty without the promise is void for want of consideration. The statutes of Montana with respect to the posse comitatus are, in the main, declaratory of the common law. Our attention has not been called to any case holding that the services of a member of the posse may be compensated by the county. The supreme court of Washington, in Chapin v. Ferry, 3 Wash. 386, 15 L. R. A. 116, said: "If they were part of the sheriff's posse, we find no authority for making them compensation out of the county treasury. The service of the citizen as a member of a posse comitatus is one which is based purely on patriotism and strict duty, and has never, so far as an investigation shows, been a compensated service." While these remarks of the court may not have been necessary to a decision, we are satisfied that they announce the correct rule of law. The state, in consideration of its protection extended, may impose upon its inhabitants the duty of rendering its services, at least in an emergency requiring the apprehension of a criminal, or one charged with the commission of a public offense; and these services are, as is well expressed by the supreme court of Oregon in a case involving the principle here invoked, of the class of general services which every man is "bound to render for the general as well as his own individual good." Morin v. Multnomah County, 18 Or. 163. As illustrating the doctrine we announce, and as supporting the reasons upon which it rests, we make these additional citations: Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. note to § 17,—being the charge to the grand jury by Judge King on the occasion of the Philadelphia riots in 1844. Randles v. Warukesho County, 96 Wis. 629; Kuehn v. Milwaukee, 92 Wis. 263; Johnston v. Lewis & Clarke Co. 2 Mont. 159; Washoe County v. Humboldt County, 14 Nev. 123; Rove v. Yuba County, 17 Cal. 62; Lamont v. Solano County, 49 Cal. 158; Presby v. Klickitat County, 5 Wash. 329; People, Hadley, v. Albany County Supers. 28 How. Pr. 22; Anderson v. Jefferson County Comrs. 25 Ohio St. 13; Cincinnati, S. & C. R. Co. v. Lee, 37 Ohio St. 479.

Appellant urges that, if the doctrine laid down in Lloyd v. Silver Bow County Comrs. 15 Mont. 433, be followed, he will be entitled to recover. But in the Lloyd Case the men for whose services the sheriff paid were employed by him to keep the jail and prisoners. A contract was made between the sheriff as master and the men as servants. They were appointed, not commanded. No duty was incumbent upon them to serve in their several capacities as jailer and death watch when commanded by the sheriff. The sheriff was not authorized to command their services. The only lawful means which the sheriff could exercise was adopted by him, namely, a hiring, with the necessary ingredient of a promise, express or implied, of compensation. The men so hired were entitled to wages or salary under the contract. The sheriff paid these expenses, and recovered from the county on the ground that he had paid the money for the benefit of the county, and at its implied request.

It is further contended that the case of Yavapai County v. O'Neil (Ariz) 29 Pac. 430, is persuasive authority in appellant's favor. Without expressing any opinion on the course of reasoning or the result reached in that case, we think it sufficient to say that the doctrine announced by the court in the Arizona case is not pertinent to the question raised in the case at bar. There the board of supervisors employed the sheriff of Yavapai county to go to Utah for the purpose of subpoenaing persons there resident who were needed as witnesses in a criminal action pending in Arizona, and ordered that he be allowed mileage therefor. The point decided by the court was that the sheriff acted, not as sheriff, but as a mere messenger, and, if actually employed in that service, he was entitled to compensation. Appellant is not entitled to recover from the county compensation for services rendered, or reimbursement for expenses incurred as a member of the sheriff's posse.

The judgment appealed from will therefore be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY OF BROOKLYN, Plff. in Err.,

v.
Fred A. FULLER.

1. Where no inquiries are made of an insured as to the character or condition of his title; where he makes no false representation as to the character and condition of his title, relying upon which the insurer is induced to and does insure the property; where the insured has an insurable interest in the property; the insurer accepts and retains the premium; and a loss occurs,—then the insurer cannot escape liability for such loss because of the fact that the insured at the date of the policy was not invested with an absolute and unencumbered title to the insured property, even though the policy provides that it shall be of no validity unless the title of the insured be an unconditional unencumbered one; as in such cases it will be conclusively presumed against the insurer that it intended to and did insure the interest which the insured had in the property, and waived the provision in the policy providing for its invalidity by reason of the imperfect title of the insured.

2. Where a case is tried to the court without a jury, and a general finding made, upon which judgment is rendered, and in addition thereto the court files a written opinion in the case, such opinion is not an essential part of the record of the case when it is brought here for review.

3. The judgment of the district court must stand or fall upon the statutory record of the case; that is, the pleadings, the findings and judgment, and the bill of exceptions made a part of the record.

4. In reviewing such case, this court will conclusively presume that the trial court considered all the competent evidence before it, and decided all the material and necessary issues presented, though from the language of the written opinion the contrary should be made to appear.

*Headnotes by RAGAN, C.

NOTE.—The present case is an unusually strong one in favor of relieving the insured from the strict terms of a condition in the policy, as the policy in question expressly provided that it should be void in case of an encumbrance, "whether inquired about or not."

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Greene & Breckenridge, for plaintiff in error:

Where an insurer stipulates in the contract of insurance that it shall not be liable thereon, or that the insurance contract shall be void if, without its knowledge or consent, the insured shall procure additional insurance upon the insured property, and the assured violates such insurance contract by so procuring additional insurance, then the first insurance contract is voidable at the election of the insurer, and such violation thereof is a defense against the insured in a suit upon such first contract, unless it be shown that such violation of the insurance contract in the procuring of the additional insurance was brought about through fraud or mistake, or has been waived by the first insurer.

Breaches of the conditions of an insurance policy which by its terms make the policy void, render it voidable only at the election of the company, unless it has waived such breaches.

The company has the right to say to its patrons exactly what it says in its policy. The fact that the insured did not read the policy cuts no figure. No case holds that one may plead ignorance of the terms of his policy.

Mr. George W. Shields for defendant in error.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

Fred A. Fuller sued the Phoenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, New York, in the district court of Douglas county, to recover the value of certain property of his destroyed by fire, which property the insurance company had insured against loss or damage by fire. Fuller had a verdict, and judgment, and the insurance company has filed here a petition in error to review such judgment.

1. The policy contained this provision: "If the interest of the assured in the property be other than an unconditional exclusive ownership, or if any other person or persons have any interest whatever in the property described, whether it be real estate or personal property, or if there be a mortgage or other encumbrance thereon, whether inquired about or not, it must be so notified to the company, and be so expressed in the written part of this policy, otherwise this policy shall be void." At the time of the issuance of the policy in suit the personal property insured was encumbered by a chattel mortgage. The insurer did not notify the company of the existence of this mortgage, and no memorandum of its existence was written in the policy. The insurance company interposed as a defense to the action in the district court the existence of this chattel mortgage upon the insured property; and the first argument here is that the judgment of the district court is contrary to law, because the undisputed evidence shows that such a mortgage existed upon the insured property at the date of the issuance of the policy, and that the insurance company was not notified of the existence of such mortgage, and no memorandum of its existence was written in the policy. The evidence on behalf of the insured tends to show that the agent of the insurance company solicited this insurance. At the time the agent had no actual knowledge of the existence of the chattel mortgage upon the property, but made no inquiries of the insured as to whether the property was encumbered. In fact the subject of an encumbrance upon the property about to be insured was not mentioned by either party, and, while the insured kept silent upon the subject of the encumbrance, he did not do so with any sinister motive. In other words, the subject of the encumbrance upon the property was not mentioned, because it seems not to have been thought of either by the insured or the insurer. The premium for the insurance was paid by the insured, and accepted and retained by the insurer. The evidence further shows that the value of the property at the date of its insurance exceeded the encumbrance thereon, and at the date of the destruction of the property by fire the encumbrance had been so reduced that the property destroyed exceeded in value both the insurance and the encumbrance thereon. In Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Bachler, 44 Neb. 549, it was held that where the insured was not questioned as to encumbrances on his property, and did not intentionally conceal the existence of an encumbrance, and did not keep silent in regard to the encumbrance from any sinister motive, the existence of a mortgage upon the property did not invalidate the policy. And in German Ins. & Sav. Inst. v. Kline, 44 Neb. 395, it was held that where the application for insurance is oral, and no inquiry made as to the condition of the title of the property, the insured in fact had an insurable interest in the property, and the premium paid and accepted and retained, the insurance company would be conclusively presumed to have insured the insurable interest which the owner had in the property, and to have waived the provision in the policy providing for its forfeiture by reason of the existence of an encumbrance upon the property. These cases control the case at bar.

2. This case was tried to the court without a jury, and the court found generally in favor of the insured, and against the insurance company, and entered an ordinary money judgment on such finding. But the learned district judge also wrote an opinion in the case, and in this opinion he states that he did not deem it necessary to pass upon the merits of the defense just considered, and reserved the question presented by that defense.

A second argument here is that the judgment must be reversed because the only issue in the case has not been passed upon or decided by the district court. But this argument assumes that the opinion of the district judge is an essential part of the record of the case brought here, but it is not. In reviewing a case brought here either on error or appeal, while this court is always pleased to have the benefit of the written opinion of the trial judge, still the judgment of the district court must stand or fall upon the statutory record of the case,—that is, the pleadings, the findings, and judgment of the district court, and the bill of exceptions made a part of the record; and where general findings are made by a court, and a judgment pronounced thereon, we must conclusively presume that the trial court considered all the competent evidence before it, and decided all the material and necessary issues presented by the pleadings, though from the language of the opinion the contrary should be made to appear.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

NORTH HUDSON COUNTY RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Clarence ANDERSON.

(.....N. J.)

*1. A dollar bill from the upper left-hand corner of which a piece one inch and a half by one inch and a quarter had been torn is not a legal tender for car fare, and the conductor may eject a passenger who refuses to make another payment. He was not bound to accept a bill which was substantially mutilated. If any part was absent which might aid in determining whether it was genuine, he was under no duty to receive it.

2. The rules of the Treasury Department of the United States in regard to the redemption of mutilated notes relate simply to redemption, and do not affect the question of legal tender.

(March 1, 1898.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court at Circuit in Hudson County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged illegal ejectment from defendant's car. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George Holmes, for plaintiff in error:

The United States statute makes certain notes and certificates legal tender (U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3598, 3589, 3590, but there is nothing in the statute which makes any part of a note or certificate a legal tender.

There are provisions in the statute, by which the Treasury Department is directed to receive notes and certificates which are mutilated or otherwise injured so as to be unfit for use, and issue others in place thereof (U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3580, 5184), and the Treasury Department has adopted certain rules regarding the redemption of such mutilated notes and certificates.

Nothing less than a "bill," i. e., a whole bill, is legal tender. A person is entitled to have the whole bill presented to him, in order that he may judge of its validity, and he is not required to pass on the validity of a part of a bill.

United States v. Lissner, 12 Fed. Rep. 840; Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Morgan, 52 N. J. L. 61.

Mr. Warren Dixon, with Messrs. Bentley & Gedney, for defendant in error:

The fact that the bill was torn on the upper left-hand corner an inch and a quarter on one side by an inch and a quarter on the other, at right angles, does not invalidate the note. A United States note has no intrinsic value as has a United States coin.

*Headnotes by VAN SYCKEL, J.

NOTE.—As to the tender of old, worn, or mutilated coin, see Atlanta Consol. Street R. Co. v. Keeny (Ga.) 33 L. R. A. 824, and note.

Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Morgan, 52 N. J. L. 60.

The United States treasury rules, § 10, says: "United States notes when not mutilated so that less than $\frac{1}{2}$ of the original proportion remains, are redeemable in coin." Notes of the United States are lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, both public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

U. S. Rev. Stat. p. 712, § 3588.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Anderson, the plaintiff below, tendered the conductor on a car of the company defendant below a mutilated one dollar note for his car fare. The conductor refused to accept the note because it was imperfect, and put Anderson off the car for not paying his fare. Thereupon Anderson brought suit to recover damages for the alleged wrongful act of the conductor. The evidence of Anderson was that a piece one inch and a quarter by one inch and a half had been torn from the upper left-hand corner of the bill, while the evidence on the part of the company was that the piece torn off was two and a half inches by one inch and three-quarters. The trial court was requested by the counsel of the company to charge the jury that the note was not a legal tender for the car fare, which request the court refused to grant. On the contrary, the court did charge that the note was a legal tender. To the refusal to charge as requested, and to the charge as made, the defendant company excepted, and error is thereupon assigned.

The case of Jersey City & B. R. Co. v. Morgan, 52 N. J. L. 60, is relied upon to support the ruling of the trial court; but it is not parallel. There a genuine silver coin, worn smooth by use, not appreciably diminished in weight, and distinguishable as a coin duly issued from the mint, was held to be a legal tender. The United States statutes make certain paper money legal tender, but there is no provision that part of such notes shall be impressed with that quality. The rules of the Treasury Department with regard to the redemption of mutilated notes relate simply to redemption, and do not make such notes legal tender. The company was not under any obligation to take upon itself the burden of applying to the Treasury Department at Washington for a perfect note, or to assume the risk of failing to obtain it. The conductor had the right to demand an entire bill, and was not bound to accept one from which a portion had been torn. If any part was absent which might aid in determining whether it was a genuine bill, he was under no duty to receive it. The portion torn off the bill presented in this case constituted a substantial mutilation of it. It was not a legal tender, and the trial court erred in refusing so to charge.

The judgment below should therefore be reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Maryanna HUDA, Admr., etc., of Valentine Huda, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

AMERICAN GLUCOSE COMPANY, Respt.

(164 N. Y. 474.)

1. Screwing down the windows of a factory so that there is no access to fire escapes except by breaking the windows, and forbidding employees to open the windows, in order to preserve a high temperature, which is necessary for the business, does not violate a statute requiring the construction and maintenance of fire escapes on such buildings, where the windows are so light in frame as to offer but the slightest difficulty in breaking through, if there is not time to unscrew them.
2. It is not negligence for a master to fasten windows leading to fire escapes, when this does not violate any statute and the windows can be easily broken through to reach the fire escapes if there is not time to unfasten them.
3. An employee assumes the risk of his employer's methods which are known to and acquiesced in by him, if they do not violate any statute.

(December 14, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court for the Fourth Department affirming a judgment of the Erie County Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Le Roy Parker, for appellant:

The direct cause of Huda's death was the fire which originated in defendant's dynamo room. A concurring cause was the unlawful screwing down of the windows whereby escape from the building was obstructed.

The evidence given as to the defective and dangerous character of the appliances used by defendant was sufficient to show that it had not maintained its plant in that reasonably safe and proper condition required by law.

When experience has demonstrated that a certain business may be carried on, and certain machinery used without causing damage, if reasonable care is exercised, then the fact of damage may be sufficient, under such circumstances, to show negligence.

Messrs. Rogers, Locke, & Milburn, for respondent:

The defendant's method of fastening the windows of its building was not a violation of the statute requiring the construction and maintenance of fire escapes on the building.

The defendant was not bound at common law to anticipate the destruction of its factory by fire, or to alter the adaptation of its internal arrangements to the conditions of the business with reference to the happening of a fire.

When Huda was on the fourth floor if he had reached the fire escape on the north wall which was nearest to him he would have found a clear way to it through Hull having broken the window out and escaped that way.

This point was absolutely fatal to any right of recovery in this action.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellate division of the supreme court in the fourth department has certified to this court certain questions for review in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligence of the defendant, whereby the plaintiff's intestate lost his life. A verdict was directed at the circuit for the defendant upon the evidence, and the appellate division, after overruling the plaintiff's exceptions, which were ordered to be first heard there, unanimously ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant. A brief preliminary statement of the facts, as established upon the trial, will aid in the discussion of the questions certified. In the evening of April 12, 1894, the defendant's factory, in the city of Buffalo, was destroyed by fire. The building was eight stories in height, and occupied a space of 160 feet on Scott street by 200 feet in depth. The business conducted therein was the manufacture of glucose, and the deceased was one of the workmen employed. The fire was alleged to have originated in some defect in the electric plant used for lighting the building. When the fire broke out, the deceased was at work upon the sixth floor, and he, with some others, ran down the stairway to the fourth floor, where the thick smoke prevented their further progress. Some of them then broke through a window, and escaped to the ground by a fireman's ladder. The deceased was last seen near the foot of the stairway, and did not follow his companions to the window. What, in fact, happened then to him is not known, and becomes purely a matter of presumption. There were three distinct stairways in this building leading from the top floor to the bottom floor, and two leading from the top floor to a flat roof. A large covered bridge led from the fifth and sixth floors to an adjoining building, which many of the workmen had been in the habit of using as a means of access to and of return from the four upper stories. Upon the outside of the building were three fire escapes extending from the roof to the ground; two being upon the south and one upon the north walls. Two windows upon each floor opened upon balconies which were constructed in connection with the fire escapes. In the process of the manufacture of glucose it was necessary that a high and uniform temperature should be kept up within the factory, and to that end the windows in the building were required to be kept closed. Directions to this effect being unobserved, at first strips of wood were so nailed to the sashes as to prevent the windows from being opened; but, these having been pried off at times, the more effective means had been resorted to, during the previous autumn, of screwing the sashes together, and notices were posted warning the workmen against opening or breaking the windows, under penalty of discharge. The windows in the building were constructed with two light sashes, containing, each, four panes of glass about 16 inches square. The sash frames were from an inch and a quarter to an inch and a half thick. The deceased had been working for the defendant for about twelve years, and the knowledge of the employees as to the fastening of the windows was testified to by several of the plaintiff's witnesses. When the fire occurred, the fire escapes were made use of by many by breaking through the windows, while some escaped by the stairways or by ladders. These facts are sufficient to inform us of the situation, and to enable us to consider the questions certified. They are: "(1) Whether the defendant's method of screwing down the windows of the building in which the deceased was employed, so that there was no access to the fire escapes except by breaking the windows, and forbidding the employees of the defendant engaged in that building from opening the windows, and requiring them to keep a high temperature in the work rooms, such as was necessary to accomplish the business carried on in these rooms, was a violation of the statute requiring a construction and maintenance of fire escapes on such buildings. (2) Whether doing the acts stated in the first question, or any of them, was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant that should have been submitted to the jury. (3) Whether the deceased, who was familiar with the defendant's methods as stated in the first question, and for a long period had worked under and acquiesced in the conditions stated in the first question, assumed the risks of the situation; and whether by reason thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action."

The statute referred to in the first question (Laws 1892, chap. 673, § 6) provided for the manner of construction of fire escapes upon factory buildings, and that they should have landings or balconies of a certain size, "embracing at least two windows at each story and connecting with the interior by easily accessible and unobstructed openings." The answer to the first question turns upon the propriety of the resort by the defendant to the methods adopted to keep the temperature of its factory sufficiently high and uniform. That such conditions were necessary is the fact assumed by the question, and it is conclusive here. Obviously, for their maintenance, the windows had to remain closed, and the duty of the defendant to its employees, in the face of that necessity, was not to interpose between them and the means of escape such a barrier in the description of windows constructed as would prevent a ready passage through them. The proof as to these windows is that they were so light in frame as to offer but the slightest difficulty in breaking through, if the time was wanting to unscrew them. The interior of the factory was connected with each balcony upon the fire escape through windows easily accessible by an unobstructed passage, and the requirement of the statute was thus met. If the windows, as "openings," were readily approached from the interior, and could be passed through, it cannot be said that the necessity of having to break them, which the testimony showed was easily done, constituted any greater obstruction than would have been the necessity of uncatching and of lifting them. The reading of the provisions of the statute, upon the subject of fire escapes in factories must be reasonable, and in view of the demands of the case. The construction of the fire escapes must be as prescribed for the outside of the factory building, and, unquestionably, that part of the law which requires a connection to exist with the interior is not to be slighted. But it would be wholly unreasonable to interpret the law as requiring a condition as to the openings upon the fire escapes which the successful prosecution of the business would forbid. There had to be a closed window during the manufacturing process, and, whether it was composed of one sash, or of two sashes fastened together, was immaterial, so long as it was readily removable by breaking through, and a ready access to and through it was preserved. The evidence shows that there was no serious obstruction at all to a passage to and through the windows. It must be borne in mind that all questions of fact are to be regarded as settled, with the unanimous affirmance by the appellate division, and we must assume every issuable fact in the case as determined below in favor of the defendant. Thus we have not before us any of the questions as to which negligence is alleged by the plaintiff except the one which relates to the defendant's method of preventing its windows from being opened during the operation of its factory, and as to that discussion is largely foreclosed by the assumption of fact that it was "necessary to accomplish the business carried on in these rooms." The first question certified is answered, therefore, in the negative.

The second question certified must be likewise answered in the negative. The discussion of the first of the questions renders amplification of our views quite unnecessary. If the method adopted by the defendant was not a violation of the statute in question, then there was no evidence of negligence in that respect for submission to the jury. At common law there was no duty imposed upon the employer to provide fire escapes in anticipation of the burning of the building in which he employed his workmen. If his building was properly constructed for the purposes of its intended use, such extraordinary and unusual precautions were not demanded of him. The statute of 1887 (chap. 462) created an absolute duty, and its effect was to give a cause of action for its breach in favor of anyone entitled to its observance and injured by a breach. Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 810, 34 Am. Rep. 536; Puuley v. Steam Gauge & Lantern Co. 131 N. Y. 90, 15 L. R. A. 194. For reasons already stated, I am unable to perceive any breach of duty here in the respect certified to us. It may be observed—as it might have been in our discussion under the first question—that the evidence utterly fails to show that the condition of the windows had anything to do with the death of the deceased workman. It does not appear that he tried ineffectually, or at all, to get through them; and the manner of his death is left to surmise from the probabilities of his situation, when, upon his reaching the fourth floor, in his descent, he was involved in the smoke.

In considering the third question certified, I think, with the assumption of facts to which the formulation of the question compels us, that but the one answer is possible, and that is that the deceased assumed the risks of the situation. An employee is very reasonably regarded as assuming those risks in his employment which are obvious as well as ordinary. If the master has done all that his duty demanded of him with respect to securing the safety of his workmen, as to the place where they have been set to work, and as to the tools and appliances with which that work was to be done, he will not be liable for a personal injury occurring by reason of a risk which is incidental to the business itself, or which results from the dangers of the environment into which the workman knowingly entered, under proper instructions. In discussing this point we have to assume that the deceased met his death from a cause connected with the fastening of the windows, without, perhaps, sufficient in the evidence to warrant the assumption. But the difficulty is not so much in that assumption as in that found in the question certified. That compels us to assume the knowledge of the deceased of the defendant's methods, and his acquiescence in the conditions under which the work was necessarily done. The court below has passed upon those facts with all the force of findings, and the form of the question certified eliminates them from our review. If the deceased knew the defendant's methods and acquiesced in those resorted to by it in the conduct of its business, we are simply thrown back upon the discussion under the first question,—whether there was any violation of the statute in what the defendant did. Having reached the conclusion that there was none, no other conclusion, in the present stage of the discussion, is possible, than that the defendant added nothing to the risks assumed by its employees, and imposed none which they should not be regarded as assuming. Of course, it is not to be understood from what has been said that it necessarily follows that employees would assume such risks connected with the management of the business as would result from a violation by the employer of the statute in a neglect to provide fire escapes. That presents a different question.

The first two of the questions certified are answered in the negative and the third question is answered in the affirmative, and it therefore follows that the judgment appealed from must be affirmed, with costs.

J. A. NARRON et al., Appts.,
v.
WILMINGTON & WELDON RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....N. C.)

1. An easement for a railroad right of way cannot be acquired by occupation under color of title as against an owner who has given no consent thereto, where the occupation is lawfully taken by right of eminent domain.
2. An easement in land can be granted only by those who could convey a fee-simple estate.
3. An exception of all railroads chartered before a certain date from the provisions of a statute of limitations does not deny them the equal protection of the laws.

(March 15, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Johnston County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the taking of plaintiff's property for railroad purposes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Simmons, Pou, & Ward, for appellants:

None of the limitations apply to the case at bar, because no statute of limitations bars proceedings to collect compensation for right of way, taken by the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company.

Land v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 72; Utey v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 119 N. C. 720.

This court has declared that a reasonable length of time must be given before the proceedings will be barred; and when the legislature neglects to give this time, the courts will, in effect, do so.

Nichols v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 120 N. C. 495.

The legislature cannot shorten the statute of limitations without giving parties a reasonable time to bring actions, which otherwise would be barred.

The exceptions to the statute of limitations, and the conditions on which the statutes are to take effect, depend on the discretion of the legislature.

Hare, Const. Law, pp. 715, 716.

The defendant has admittedly taken plaintiff's land. Admittedly the alleged deed it obtained was void.

Wherever the act of supposed disseisin is equivocal in its nature, the presumption is always that it is in accordance with, and not in hostility to, the title of the true owner.

Adverse possession is defined to be the enjoyment of land or such estate as lies in grant under such circumstances as indicate that such enjoyment has been commenced and continued under assertion or color of right on the part of the possessor.

At the death of Wiley Simms the title passed to his heirs as joint tenants; and one of them having been of full age for more than seven years prior to the beginning of this action, the same is barred.

The original deeds of trust limit the estate to Wiley Simms and his heirs. His heirs, therefore, take, not by the act of the law but by the original deed. They are not tenants in common.

The bar is complete in this case; not under the charter of defendant, but under the general law as to seven years' adverse possession.

Litermon v. Roanoke & T. R. R. Co. 109 N. C. 52; Land v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 72.

The action should be barred under the five years' statute.

It was not competent for the legislature to pass an act by which all railroad companies should be protected by a five years' period of limitation excepting certain roads.

This is a denial of the equal protection of the laws, and is contrary to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The statute of limitations cannot be suspended in particular cases, while allowed to remain in force generally.

There cannot be a reasonable ground, in law, for protecting the new company by a five years' statute, and excluding the old road, which certainly in reason should be preferred, because it has longer been exposed to action and therefore has the greater claim to protection. The main body of the act may be held good and the reservation void.

Assuming that the 2d section of the act of 1893, chap. 152, is not separable, and that therefore old railroads are not within the terms of that act, yet they are within the terms of the act of 1895, chap. 224.

Beach v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 120 N. C. 506; Nichols v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 120 N. C. 495.

Furches, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 20th of March, 1871, a part of the land upon which the defendant's roadbed is located was conveyed to Wiley Simms, and on the 6th day of July, 1872, the residue was conveyed to him. These lands were conveyed to Simms, as trustee, for the sole and separate use and benefit of Maria Heath for life, to be held free from all debt, charges, and encumbrances of her husband, A. J. Heath, and at her death for Ora M. Heath, Preston S. Heath, and Ava E. Heath, children of the said Maria Heath. On the 28th day of August, 1885, A. J. Heath and wife, Maria, J. W. Wellons, and Ora, one of the cestui que trust, and who had intermarried with J. W. Wellons, made and executed a deed to the defendant corporation granting it the right of way over said lands. Thereafter, and in the fall of 1885, the defendant entered upon the lands, located its roadbed, and has continuously held and occupied the same from that time until the commencement of this proceeding for damages. The trustee, Simms, was not a party to the deed to the defendant, nor did he assent to the appropriation and occupancy by defendant of said land. The said Simms is dead, and the plaintiff Narron has been duly appointed trustee in his stead. Upon these facts, which were agreed to by the parties, the court held that the defendant was the owner of the 130 feet of land, running across said lands for a mile, upon which its roadbed was located; that "it had been possessed of said right of way under known and visible lines and boundaries, and under color of title, for seven years next before the bringing of the action, and that the plaintiffs' claim is also barred by the five-years' statute of limitations." These facts and this ruling of the court present the only question necessary for our consideration in determining the rights of the parties. It is not contended that the defendant is the owner of the land upon which its roadbed is located, but that by the deed of Heath and wife the defendant is the owner of an easement upon the land covered by its roadbed; that this deed is color of title, at least; and that the defendant has occupied this land under said deed for more than seven years, which has perfected its title, if it was at first defective. The defendant further contends that this proceeding was not commenced within five years from the time the defendant entered upon and took possession of its roadbed, and that the plaintiffs' right to recover, if they had any, is barred by the lapse of time, under chapter 152, Acts 1893. An easement must be an interest in or over the soil. It cannot be made by livery,—by deed,— but lies only in grant. Washb. Easem. 27. It may also be acquired by prescription, or, more properly speaking, under the modern doctrine, by presumption. This presumption of a grant may arise by the continuous occupation for twenty years. Whether this presumption arises from the occupation of a railroad, it may not be necessary for us to decide in this case. But it would seem that the reason for presuming a grant by the continued occupation of the land for twenty years is wanting. This rule is founded upon the idea that, if there had not been a grant, the owner would have put an end to the wrongful occupation before the expiration of twenty years. In this case and that of other railroads it is not necessary that they should have a grant to authorize their entry and occupation. This is authorized by the charter under the state's right of eminent domain; and the owner of the soil has no right to prevent the entry and continuous occupation of the defendant road. This being so, the reason for the rule creating the presumption fails, and it would seem that the defendant would acquire no title by occupation and the lapse of time; and this opinion seems to be sustained by the decisions of the court in Land v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 72, and Utley v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 119 N. C. 720. This being so, the defendant must rely upon the deed from Heath and wife and the plea of the statute of limitations. No one but the owner of the soil can grant an easement,—no one who could not convey the fee-simple estate. Washb. Easem. 40. Heath and wife could not have done this. Kirby v. Boyette, 116 N. C. 165, 118 N. C. 244. And, as they could not have conveyed the land, they could not create the easement by grant. This leaves the statute of limitation to be considered. At common law there was no limitation to the right of action. This defense is entirely statutory. It does not affect the rights of the parties. It does not pay any debt or satisfy any demand. It only closes the courts,—puts up a legal bar between plaintiff and defendant. The defendant claims that the act of 1893 does this, as against the plaintiffs' demand. In the 1st section of this act it provides a bar against all such actions as this not commenced within five years from the time the defendant's occupation commenced. And, if the act had stopped with this section, the defendant's plea would have been a protection to the defendant, as against the plaintiffs' demand, in the proceeding. But the 2d section of this act provides that it shall not apply to any railroad chartered before 1868, and, as the defendant's road was chartered before 1868, it is admitted that this statute does not bar the plaintiffs' action, if the 2d section is constitutional. But the defendant contends that this section of the act is in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and void, for the reason that it does not afford this road the same protection that it does some other roads; that it discriminates against this road in favor of some other roads. If this were true, all our statutes of limitations would be void, as they all have such discriminations. They all except from their operation *feme covert*s, infants, and persons of unsound mind. But we cannot understand how it can be unconstitutional not to give a party that which it has no legal right to demand. The statute of limitations gives no rights to any one, and, in a legal sense, it gives no protection to anyone. It may deprive a party of his legal remedy, and this, it is said, should not be done without giving such party reasonable time to commence his action. Nichols v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 120 N. C. 495. This rule would apply to the plaintiff if it were his right of action that might be affected. But, as the statute of limitations takes from the defendant no right he has, this rule does not apply to him. But the defendant is one of a class,—“all railroads chartered before 1868.” This being so, it is no discrimination against the defendant. Gallin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119; State v. Call, 121 N. C. 643, and the great number of cases there cited. There is error.

New trial.

Clark, J., concurring:

When an action is brought for ejectment, one who has been in possession under color of title for seven years is protected by the statute, because, having been exposed to an action for that length of time, the statute has run in his favor. So where one has been exposed to an action for trespass for twenty years, the law presumes therefrom the grant of an easement. But here the defendant under its charter enjoys legal possession, and its easement by virtue of the right of eminent domain, and has never been exposed either to an action of ejectment or for trespass for an hour. The plaintiffs could not have maintained an action for either of these causes, and have not now attempted to do so. Their sole remedy is under the constitutional provision giving them a right to compensation. As to that cause of action there was no statute of limitations (Land v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 107 N. C. 72; Utley v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 119 N. C. 720), until chapter 152 of the Acts of 1893. But that statute conferred the right to plead that defense only upon railroads chartered since January 1, 1868, and the defendant cannot avail itself thereof. Chapter 224 of the Acts of 1895 applies to all railroads, but does not embrace “compensation for right of way;” and chapter 339 of the Acts of 1897, making the act of 1893 apply to railroad companies chartered prior to 1868, cannot affect this action. Nichols v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. 120 N. C. 495; Culbreth v. Downing, 121 N. C. 205.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Ohio, ex rel. NATIONAL LIFE ASSOCIATION of Hartford, Connecticut,
v.

William S. MATTHEWS, Superintendent of Insurance.

STATE of Ohio, ex rel. HOME MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY of Detroit, Michigan,
v.

SAME.

(.....Ohio.....)

*1. By virtue of the provisions of § 2745, Rev. Stat., the superintendent of insurance of this state may revoke, or decline to renew, a license to transact business in this state to a life insurance company created under the laws of another state, if, "after demand therefor has been made," such company refuses to pay the taxes assessed against it, and which are payable to him according to the terms of said section. This power of the superintendent continues, and may be exercised, notwithstanding the commencement and pendency of an action brought by him against such company to recover the taxes thus assessed.

2. Although § 3587-3596, inclusive, Rev. Stat., under which life insurance companies intending to transact business on the mutual or stock plan are organized, require such companies to have capital stock and stockholders, and although, when thus organized, they have no authority to transact business on the assessment plan, the want of such authority is not a consequence of their having capital stock and stockholders, nor of want of power in the legislature to confer it, but results solely from an omission of the legislature to clothe them with such power. Notwithstanding the want of such authority in an Ohio corporation created under those sections, yet, as the powers of a corporation depend on its charter and the laws of the state where it is organized, if the charter of an insurance company created in another state, together with the laws of such state, authorize it to transact business on the assessment plan, it should be admitted, under § 3630e, to transact business on that plan within this state, upon its complying with this section in other respects, although it may have capital stock and stockholders for whose benefit it was created.

3. However, what constitutes the transaction of the business of life insurance on the assessment plan, within the meaning of that term as used in said § 3630e, should be determined by the laws of this state, and according to those laws that phrase should be held to contemplate a scheme of insurance conducted for the sole benefit of the policy holders of a concern, the principal source of revenue of which must arise from post mortem assessments intended to liquidate specific losses.

PETITIONS for writs of mandamus to compel defendant to permit petitioners to transact life insurance business within the state. Refused.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. E. Powell, Daniel J. Ryan, and George B. Okey, for relator Home Mutual Life Insurance Company:

The relator complied with all the conditions prescribed by § 3630e, of the Revised Statutes as a condition precedent to the transaction by it of business in this state and of the issuance to it of a certificate of authority so to do by the superintendent of insurance, by depositing with him the documents, certificates, and proofs.

The attempt to force a construction of statutes which would confine and limit the co-operative associations to a system of "passing around the hat" to collect whatever might be possible to pay a loss after the contingency insured against had happened, has uniformly and justly failed.

16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 19.

Under an assessment contract a premium may be stipulated, but the liability of the insured cannot be limited thereto.

A simple reading of § 3630 would seem to refute the idea that a company or association organized to do business on the "assessment plan" is confined and limited to post mortem assessments.

Messrs. Henry M. Huggins, J. A. McEwen, and Huggins & Sowers, for relator National Life Association:

The law of Ohio provides a number of effectual methods for the collection of taxes. If the plaintiff owes the state of Ohio any taxes, the courts are open for their collection in the ordinary methods. There is no necessity, for the protection of the citizens of the state, to crush the business of the plaintiff within the state in order to collect a comparatively trifling sum of taxes, while the plaintiff is amply able to pay when called upon to do so by the adjudication of the court in a proceeding begun in the ordinary way for collection.

Mr. M. R. Patterson for defendant.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These two actions were brought in this court, by the respective relators, against the superintendent of insurance of this state, to compel him to issue to them, respectively, a certificate authorizing each of them to transact the business of life insurance within this state, under § 3630e, Rev. Stat., that prescribes the conditions upon which life insurance companies, organized under the laws of other states, etc., may be permitted to transact the business of life insurance on the assessment plan within this state. The superintendent of insurance, contending that the method of insurance pursued by these companies, respectively, was not according to the assessment plan, declined to issue the certificate demanded of him.

In respect of the National Life Association of Hartford, Connecticut, the refusal to grant a certificate rests on the additional ground that it had refused to pay the taxes which the superintendent of insurance claimed were assessable against it by virtue of § 2745, Rev. Stat. This section of the statute expressly authorizes the superintendent of insurance, in case "such company refuse to pay said tax, after demand therefor has been made," to "revoke the license of such company to do business in this state." If, upon this ground, he may revoke a license previously issued, it would seem to unquestionably follow that he may also, upon such ground, refuse to issue or renew such license to the defaulting company. An action brought by the superintendent of insurance to recover this tax is pending in the court of common pleas of Franklin county. This effort, however, to recover, according to the ordinary course of justice, through the instrumentality of the courts, the amount claimed to be due from the relator as taxes, does not suspend the power of revocation explicitly given by the section above cited. Even if this power of suspension should be regarded simply as an additional and summary remedy for such default, it ought not, in the absence of a legislative intention to that effect, to be held to require the state, through its officer, to elect between the two remedies. And certainly there is nothing in the statute, or in the nature of the proceedings in the courts to recover the amount already payable, to indicate that the legislature intended that the authority thus conferred on the superintendent of insurance should be held in abeyance during the pendency of such action. However, as the taxes claimed to be due from the relator rest on the assumption that it is not engaged in the business of insurance on the assessment plan, the right to revoke its license must stand or fall upon the determination of that question. If it is transacting business on the assessment plan, then the taxes in controversy were not legally assessable against it, and its refusal to pay them would not justify a revocation of, or refusal to renew, its license.

Both relators are bodies corporate,—the first named, the National Life Association, being organized under the laws of the state of Connecticut; the other, under the laws of the state of Michigan. An inspection of their respective charters shows that their schemes of organization widely differ. The charter of the National Life Association, as far as material to the consideration of any matter before the court, reads as follows:

"Sec. 2. The capital stock of said corporation shall not be less than $100,000, and may be increased as herein provided, from time to time hereafter, at the pleasure of said corporation, to any further sum not exceeding $500,000; and each share of said capital stock shall be $100; . . . provided that no stockholder shall be liable to said corporation for any claims against the same, nor shall the stockholders, or any of them, be liable in any event beyond the amount of their stock owned by them respectively for any losses whatever,

"Sec. 3. The capital stock of said corporation shall be personal property, and transferable on the books of said association in conformity with its by-laws."

"Sec. 5. . . . The affairs of said corporation shall be managed and conducted by not less than seven nor more than eighteen directors, a majority of whom shall reside in this state, and shall be elected on the second Tuesday in January in each year by the stockholders from among their number. . . . Every officer or director shall be a bona fide stockholder of at least five shares of said capital stock before he shall be qualified to act as such officer or director.

"Sec. 6. Notice of every stockholders' meeting shall be given ten days previous to such meeting in one or more newspapers printed in the city of Hartford. At all such stockholders' meetings no business transacted shall be legal unless a majority of the stock is represented. Each stockholder shall be entitled to one vote for each share of stock held by such stockholder. . . ."

These provisions of its charter show conclusively that it is a corporation created for profit. It has a capital stock of $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each, which capital stock may be increased to $500,000 and similarly divided. These shares are declared to be personal property, transferable on the books of the "association in conformity with its by-laws." The ultimate power to manage its affairs is lodged in its stockholders to the entire exclusion of its policy holders; for the right to attend corporate meetings, as well as to elect its officers, is vested solely in the former. Whatever net profits may accrue from its business will ultimately go to its stockholders, the policy holders having no interest therein; the rights of the latter being measured by the contract evidence by their respective policies. It is true that, in an agreed statement of facts submitted to the court, it is stated that "the plaintiff pays a dividend of 6 per cent per annum on the amount of stock actually paid into its treasury; the same being paid out of moneys raised and used by it for expense purposes, and the amount thereof being $3,000 per annum. We do not see how this bears upon the question of the character or nature of the concern. There is nothing in its charter to prevent the payment of a larger dividend, if the earnings of the company at any time would warrant it, or to prevent its setting aside or investing its accumulation in any way it may choose for the eventual benefit of its stockholders.

Counsel for defendant strenuously contends that a corporation of the character of the relator—that is, one possessed of a capital stock and created for the profit of the holder thereof—cannot transact the business of life insurance in Ohio on the assessment plan. This contention he rests on a fundamental distinction claimed to exist between the different classes of life insurance companies; the object of one class—that to which the relator belongs—being to make profit for its stockholders, while the other class, composed of those doing business on the "assessment plan," so-called, is not designed for profit at all, and in fact can have no stockholders among which to divide profits. Without setting forth our statutes that authorize and regulate the creating of life insurance companies, it may be said of them that, while they do not speak to this question with perfect precision, yet, as respects Ohio corporations, many of their provisions seem to conflict with the notion that a stock company can do business on the assessment plan. These statutes divide life insurance companies, other than fraternal, into two classes, into one of which it places those companies that have a capital stock, or, at least, capital, and into the other class such as do not have either capital stock or capital. The general powers of the former class are granted by § 3587, Rev. Stat. The things that may be done by the latter class are set forth in § 3630, Id. By the former section (3587) authority is given "to make insurance upon the lives of individuals and every insurance appertaining thereto or connected therewith on the mutual or stock plan, and grant, purchase, or dispose of annuities." By the latter section (3630) a company or association may be organized to transact the business of life or accident, or life and accident insurance on the assessment plan, for the purpose of mutual protection and relief of its members and for the payment of stipulated sums of money to the families, heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of the deceased members of such company or association, etc. The powers of a company belonging to the first class are unlimited as to the individuals it may insure, but are limited to insuring on the "mutual or stock" plan. Section 3587. A company or association belonging to the second class can only insure the life of a member of the company, and its business must be transacted "on the assessment plan." As the insured, by the act of insurance under this plan, becomes a member of the insurance company, and as there are no special restrictions respecting the persons who may apply for insurance and consequent membership, except as to the age and health of the applicant, the powers of the two classes in this respect do not greatly differ. But, as respects the structure of the companies that compose them, and the method by which they do business, the two classes fundamentally and radically differ. One class has a capital stock, or capital, and, of course, stockholders, or members who have contributed to its capital, for whose profit its business is primarily conducted, while the other has neither. The business of the first class is done none the less for the benefit of its stockholders, or members, because some of the companies which compose it,—perhaps all of them, now,—with a view to attract patronage, uniformly issue policies which stipulate that the holder shall share in the profits of the concern. The companies that compose the first of the classes are empowered to transact business on the mutual or stock plan; the other, only on the assessment plan. There may be some other minor distinctions between the two classes, but these are the chief ones. The two classes together seem to cover the entire field of general life insurance, and we think, in respect to Ohio companies, this field was designedly divided by the legislature between these two classes, and that the inference to be drawn from this legislation is that the portion assigned to each was intended for its exclusive occupation; and therefore an Ohio life insurance company must confine its transactions to such methods of insurance as pertain to the class to which it belongs. However improbable the supposition may be that men would invest their money in a concern the business of which was prohibited by law from returning any profit on the investment, yet there is nothing in the nature of life insurance on the assessment plan to forbid its being transacted by a corporation possessing capital stock, and having stockholders or members contributing to its capital, by whom its affairs are exclusively controlled. If the general assembly of Ohio, in the exercise of its legislative discretion, chooses to vest this power in corporations to be organized with capital stock and stockholders, and men elect to organize such corporations, and invest their capital therein, we know of no principle on which the exercise of this power could be prevented by an appeal to the judiciary. It might be claimed, with some show of reason, that, if the charter of such a corporation and the statutes under which it was organized limited the benefits that might accrue to its stockholders to lawful interest on the amount actually advanced for stock, it ought not to be held a corporation for profit, and that, while the stockholders were nominally such, their beneficial relation to the company would rather be that of creditors. However this may be, it is speculative, and the subject will be dismissed with the remark that it lies within the province of the legislative, and not of the judicial, branch of the government.

Counsel for relator, in an interesting discussion of the evolution of life insurance, shows that what is called "old line insurance" has in recent years been materially modified by the application to its original methods of insurance of some of the principles and practices that underlie insurance on the assessment plan, and also that, within the last decade or two the crudities of the latter plan have been systematized and improved by the adoption of a portion of the features of the former. That the two plans have been steadily drawing nearer to each other in recent years; that some of their distinctive features have become obliterated,—is true; and doubtless the causes that have produced that result are still in active operation. Our statutes do not seem to recognize, to the extent claimed, these evolutions; and, notwithstanding what may have been accomplished in this way in the sphere of general life insurance, or however near they may have drawn to each other in their methods of transacting business, those statutes quite clearly recognize three distinct methods in which it still may be done. Two of these methods, that upon the stock plan and that upon the mutual plan, are mentioned in § 3587, Rev. Stat.; while reference to the third method, that upon the assessment plan, is found in § 3630, Id. We have already seen that life insurance companies created under § 8587, Id., and which are required to have capital stock, or fixed capital, at least, cannot transact life insurance on the assessment plan; that the reason why they cannot thus transact life insurance is because the general assembly has not granted that authority to them, and is not founded on any incapacity, on account of the mode in which they are organized, to receive and exercise that power; on the contrary, that, if the general assembly chooses to confer on life insurance companies, organized under § 8587, Rev. Stat., the power to insure lives on the assessment plan, the exercise of such power would be unobjectionable. The power of a corporation, however, depends on its charter and the laws of the state where it is organized; and, although it may be true that our statutes do not authorize stock companies created under them to transact life insurance on the assessment plan, it does not follow that life insurance companies created in other states cannot be clothed with such power by their charters and the laws of the state in which they were organized. Whatever powers the relator the National Life Association of Hartford possesses in this respect is found in § 4 of its charter, which is in the following terms: "Sec. 4. Said corporation is authorized and empowered to make insurance upon the lives of individuals, and to make contracts upon any and all conditions appertaining to or connected with life risks of whatever kind or nature, and to grant annuities, and policies may be issued stipulated to be with or without participation in the profits." This grant of authority is very broad, and, while the object of the concern is, doubtless, ultimate profit for its stockholders, nevertheless, if, under the power thus conferred, the relator, without objection from its stockholders, sought to engage in the business of life insurance in this state on what is clearly and unequivocally the assessment plan, as that is recognized by the statutes of this state, and complied with the conditions prescribed in § 8630e, Rev. Stat., what ground could be assigned as a valid reason for denying it admission to transact business under that section?

That the relator the National Life Association of Hartford has complied with the formal conditions prescribed by § 8630e, Rev. Stat., necessary to entitle it to a license under that section, is admitted, and, as we have seen, the powers conferred by its charter warrant it to transact life insurance on the assessment plan. The only remaining question is whether the scheme of insurance it pursues, or proposes to pursue, within this state, is according to the assessment plan, as that phrase is used in our statutes.

The relator, in the course of its business in this state, has issued five different forms of policies. They do not materially differ as respects the matter now under consideration. One of them is given:

The National Life Association of Hartford.
Conn.

Amount, _____. Premium, _____.
In consideration of the written and printed application for this policy, and the warranties contained therein, together with the conditions and agreements on the back hereof, which, taken together in their entirety, constitute this contract, and of the payment of the premium of $ _____ at the home office of the association in Hartford, Connecticut, to be evidenced by the receipt of the association, and a payment of a like sum to be made at said office on or before 12 o'clock noon of the _____ day of _____ in every year during the continuance of this contract, this association does hereby insure the life of _____, of _____, county of _____, state of _____, in the amount of _____ dollars (less any indebtedness due the association by the insured or beneficiary), to be paid at the home office within ninety days from receipt of satisfactory evidence at the office of the association in Hartford, Connecticut, as required by it, upon blanks furnished, of a valid claim, conditioned upon the death of the insured from any cause assumed under the terms of this contract, to _____, if living; otherwise, to the legal heirs or assigns of the insured. In witness, whereof, etc.

The "privileges and agreements" on the back of the policy, to which reference is made, so far as material are as follows:

Privileges and Agreements.

This policy shall participate in profits as hereinafter provided, which shall be apportioned at the expiration of the accumulation period. If living, and all premiums have been duly paid, the insured shall be entitled to select one of the following benefits: First. To withdraw all surplus standing to its credit, and continue this policy in force for the original amount, on payment of stipulated premiums, either in (1) cash; (2) paid-up insurance; (3) life annuity. Second. To surrender this policy for its full value, consisting of the entire reserve, together with all surplus accumulations then apportioned by the association, either in (1) cash; (2) paid-up insurance; (3) life annuity. The accumulation period under this policy ends on the _____ day of _____, 19____, at which time the results are estimated at $ _____ in cash, or $ _____ in paid-up insurance. Should the insured elect to continue the policy beyond the accumulation period, dividends thereon shall thereafter be apportioned, to be used in reduction of premiums: Provided, that, in all of the preceding privileges, the amount therein referred to shall not conflict with the statutory requirements of any state in which the association is at the time doing business. After this policy has been in continuous force three full years, it may be exchanged for a nonparticipating paid-up policy, provided written application be made for the same while there is no default in the payment of any premium. Paid-up insurance will in no case be given for a larger amount than the original policy, unless the insured shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the association that he is then in an insurable condition. If at any time the proportion of funds credited to this policy (which, together with the entire assets, are hereby pledged for its payment) shall not equal the reserve calculated according to the Actuaries' Mortality Table with interest at 4 per cent.

then this policy may be charged with its share of such deficiency, which, at the option of the executive committee, shall be payable in cash, or be charged as interest-bearing premiums. The expense charged on this policy during the first year shall be the instalments specified, and thereafter three fifths of 1 per cent annually of its face value, and the expenses incurred in protecting and investing the funds of the association. Premiums are payable annually in advance; but if, for convenience of the insured, the same are paid semiannually or quarterly, the balance of any annual premium will be deducted in case this policy becomes a claim.

An examination of §§ 3604 and 3630e, Rev. Stat., before referred to, shows that, for the purpose of granting certificates of authority to transact the business of life insurance in this state, the general assembly has divided life insurance companies created under the laws of other states into such as insure lives on the assessment plan and such as do not. And while, as we have seen, supra, the powers of a corporation of this kind, and the scheme of insurance it may pursue, must be ascertained by an inspection of its charter, nevertheless, when it seeks a license to transact business in this state, the question whether that scheme falls within one or the other of those two classes must be determined according to our own laws. This division of life insurance companies, organized under the laws of other states, made for the purpose of providing for their admission in this state to transact business, distinctly appears for the first time in the statute of April 18, 1883 (80 Ohio Laws, p. 180). Under that statute life insurance companies created under the laws of other states, that transacted business on the assessment plan, were admitted into this state on terms that were much more liberal than those extended to such companies as did not pursue that plan. Section 3630e of the act of 1883 (80 Ohio Laws, p. 180), above referred to, which prescribed the terms under which life insurance companies of the former class might be admitted into this state, did not require of them either fixed capital or a deposit of any sum of money whatever as a condition to their admission; while, by the provisions of §§ 3604, 3605, Rev. Stat., all other life insurance companies organized in other states, as conditions to admission herein, were required to possess a prescribed capital, and to deposit with the superintendent of insurance, for the benefit of its policy holders, securities to at least the sum of $100,000. Doubtless the chief consideration that led to this classification, and consequently to granting to assessment companies admission upon more liberal terms as to capital than were prescribed in respect of other life insurance companies of other states, were that the former relying upon post mortem assessments to meet specific losses as they should occur, the possession of a fund accumulated for that purpose would not be necessary to the security of a policy holder, while, in respect to the other class,—those that exacted the payment of a premium in advance, and must rely wholly upon accumulations of capital already made to pay losses,—the security of their policy holders demanded that they should possess capital security invested and exclusively devoted to that object. Certainly these considerations are sufficient to account for the classifications made, and for the difference in the terms prescribed to the members of each class as conditions for admission to transact business in this state, and are entitled to considerable respect in construing the statute, and in a doubtful case might be decisive.

There is, however, little, if any, ambiguity in the statute of 1883 (80 Ohio Laws, p. 180) in this respect. Section 3630e, Rev. Stat., as then passed, clearly made the transaction of business "on the assessment plan" the test of admissibility under its provisions. If a life insurance company, organized in another state, did not insure according to that plan, it was not entitled to admission under that section (3630e), but must resort for that purpose to §§ 3604, and 3605, Rev. Stat. Manifestly, this phrase relates to the method by which the revenue of an insurance company is to be raised, or (which is the same) to the mode in which the company exacts from its policy holders the consideration to which it is entitled on account of the obligation or risk which it assumes on issuing a policy. In this connection it should be held to mean something specifically different from "premium," for it is used in contradistinction to the latter word. Our statutes do not define the word "premium," nor do they declare the meaning of the phrase "on the assessment plan." But the general assembly should be deemed to have used these terms in the sense in which they were understood at the time the statute was enacted. If, in the subsequent growth and development of life insurance, the different plans on which it is transacted have lost most of their distinctive features, it would not at all affect the construction of the statute. Section 3630e of the statute of 1883 (80 Ohio Laws, p. 180), however, was amended in 1891 (88 Ohio Laws, p. 252). The section as then amended is now in force, and differs from the section it superseded in a number of quite important provisions. The right to a license under the amended section depends upon specific conditions that the section it superseded did not contain. The fifth of these conditions requires of a life insurance company seeking a license under it to show that it "is paying, and for the twelve months next preceding has paid, the maximum amount named in its policies or certificates." The sixth condition is to the effect that it must show that the "liabilities of the assured or members are not limited to fixed or artificial premiums," while the seventh condition requires that it shall have accumulated and securely invested a fund "not less in amount than the proceeds of one periodical payment by or assessment on all certificates or policy holders," etc. The extent to which these conditions impliedly modify the method of raising funds, as contemplated by the phrase "on the assessment plan," as originally used, is difficult to determine. The sixth condition, by requiring the company to show that it does not rely solely on "fixed or artificial premiums," would indicate that it might raise part of its revenue in that way. The provision of the seventh condition, that it shall maintain and invest a fund "not less in amount than the proceeds of one periodical payment by or an assessment on all certificates or policy holders," points in that same direction. These provisions seem to contemplate that a scheme of life insurance, according to which a portion of the fund designed to pay losses may be raised by fixed periodical payments, would not be incompatible with the "assessment plan" of insurance.

However this may be, as long as the legislature retains this classification of life insurance companies for the purpose of granting to them permission to transact business in this state, the courts must regard it as substantial, and founded on some clearly understood and material features, wherein the two classes differ from each other. The retention of the classification would otherwise be unaccountable. This difference, we have shown, relates solely to the method in which a company exacts payment from a policy holder for the hazard it assumes by issuing a policy. The one class exacts premiums, or a fixed sum, payable periodically in advance, without reference to any specific loss; while the distinguishing feature of the other is an assessment of a sum, usually varying in amount according to the sum to be raised, to be ascertained and levied after the death of the insured. The reason, as we have seen, for this classification, and for granting a license to a member of the "assessment" class on more liberal terms than one belonging to the "premium" class, is that the former class does not necessarily pay its losses from a fund already in existence, but may raise it by a post mortem assessment, while the latter class must resort to a fund already accumulated, and which, for the security of policy holders, should be safely invested. The scheme upon which the state exacts taxes from foreign insurance companies rests, also, to some extent, on this distinction. Rev. Stat. § 2745.

We think, therefore, that, notwithstanding the fifth, sixth, and seventh requirements or conditions found in § 3630e, Rev. Stat., as amended in 1891 (88 Ohio Laws, p. 252), to bring a life insurance company into the class that transact business "on the assessment plan," within the purview of our statutes, its chief source of revenue should be post mortem assessments to pay specific losses. This view of the matter was, in substance, taken by this court in State, Atty. Gen., v. Monitor Fire Assn. 42 Ohio St. 555. The court held that "an annual deposit, paid in advance, based upon the hazards of the risk, and without reference to an amount necessary to pay losses that may occur during the year, is, in fact, a premium paid for carrying the risk, and not a specific assessment authorized by the statute." The question there related to the transaction of fire insurance, but the reasoning by which this court reached the conclusion announced in that case would seem to apply equally to the question of what constitutes insurance on the assessment plan in life insurance. State, Atty. Gen., v. Western Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 47 Ohio St. 167, 8 L. R. A. 129; State v. Moore, 38 Ohio St. 7. The policy of the relator, which has been recited, shows quite clearly that it exacts of its policy holders fixed sums, to be paid in advance at stated periods, and based on the hazard of the risk, and without reference to any specific loss.

An ingenious argument, based on the "privileges and agreements" set out on the back of the policy, has been presented by counsel for relator. In substance, however, these "privileges and agreements" do not differ from those provisions found in the policies of those companies, whether old line or mutual, which allow the holder to participate in the earnings of the company. Considerable stress was laid by counsel for relator on the proviso that appears on the back of the policy, in connection with the "privileges and agreements," to the effect "that, in all the preceding privileges, the amounts therein referred to shall not conflict with the statutory requirements of any state in which the association is at the time doing business." We know of no statute of this state with which those privileges and agreements conflict. These "privileges and agreements," however, assist in giving character to the plan on which the latter transacts its business. This plan falls within the reason of the statute that requires life insurance companies to deposit securities for the protection of policy holders as a condition to admission to transact business. The reason of that requirement, as we have shown, rests upon its necessity. It constitutes the chief reliance of policy holders who may reside within the state. Without such a deposit the guaranty of ultimate payment would be greatly weakened. The plan also conforms very closely to the letter of §§ 3587-3609, inclusive, Rev. Stat. Its features bear a striking resemblance to life insurance contemplated by those sections, but disclose little if any similarity to that which § 3630e, even since the amendment of 1891 (88 Ohio Laws, p. 252), describes.

We think the relator is not entitled to a license, by virtue of § 3630e, to transact business in this state, but in order to obtain a license for that purpose, must comply with §§ 3604, 3605, Rev. Stat.

2. The charter of the other relator, the Home Mutual Life Insurance Company of Detroit, omitting formal provisions immaterial to the questions before the court, is as follows:

ARTICLE III.

Sec. 1. The object of the incorporation of this company shall be to furnish life insurance to its members, for the benefit of the widows, widowers, heirs, and relatives of deceased members and other persons having an insurable interest in the life of such members.

Sec. 2. There shall be one class or division of members in said company, to be known as the whole life class; the object or purpose of which shall be to furnish life insurance to each member therein by such members paying continuous premiums during life.

ARTICLE IV.

Sec. 2. Special or extra assessments may be levied by the board of trustees, when it is necessary to meet mortuary losses. All special or extra assessments, or calls for additional premiums, shall be apportioned among the members in such manner as to equitably distribute the mortality cost among such members in proportion each should have contributed, since becoming a member, on the basis of the American experience table of mortality, due allowance being given for all previous payments."

Sec. 4. The moneys realized from assessments, premiums, and payments shall be apportioned to the general fund, mortuary fund, and emergency fund. The object of the general fund shall be to provide for the payment of general or managing expenses of the company. The object of the mortuary fund shall be to provide for the payment of death losses. The object of the emergency fund shall be to provide a trust fund for the payment of death losses or other benefits provided for in the policy of the member, and to protect the company from extra assessments in case of an extraordinary death rate. The emergency fund shall not at any time be less than the maximum amount at risk on any one life, from and after the date of the incorporation of this company. The board of trustees shall apportion the money so realized from assessments, premiums, and payments between the several funds named, as it may be deemed best for the interest of the company.

These provisions of its charter, together with that section of the statutes of Michigan (1 How. Anno. Stat. § 4217) which prescribes who shall be members of such corporations, and their rights as members, show that the relator the Home Mutual Life Insurance Company has neither capital stock nor stockholders for whose benefit it was created. Its policy holders are its members. They alone have a voice in the election of its officers, and it is for their benefit, at least in theory, that its business is conducted. Therefore the objection, founded on its internal structure, which was interposed to the claim of the other relator, the National Life Association of Hartford, to a license under § 8630e, Rev. Stat., does not apply to the claim of the present relator to a license under that section. The objection interposed to granting to the present relator a license rests upon its method of transacting business, which, the superintendent of insurance contends, is not conducted according to the assessment plan.

In order to obtain a correct notion of the scheme of insurance that it pursues, resort must be had to its form of policy, which is as follows:

"In consideration of the payment of the first ——— premium hereon of ——— dollars, and of the representations, agreements, and warrants made to it by insured, herein named, in his or her application for this policy of insurance, do hereby issue this policy of insurance to ———, of ———, state of ———, and in consideration of the payment in advance thereafter of ——— premiums of ——— dollars, this company does promise to pay the sum of ——— dollars to ———, the beneficiary herein named, if living at the time of the death of the insured, and, if not living, then to the heirs at law of said insured, at the office of said company, in the city of Detroit, Michigan, within ninety days after the acceptance and approval of satisfactory proofs of the death of said insured, provided said death shall occur while this policy is in full force. This policy is issued, delivered, and accepted subject to the conditions and agreements contained herein and on the back hereof, which are made a part of this contract as fully as if recited over the signature hereto affixed. In witness whereof," etc.

The conditions on the back of the policy are in the following terms:

"(1) It is expressly agreed that this policy shall not be in force until the same has been delivered to the insured and the first premium thereon shall have been paid in cash during the insured's lifetime and good health. (2) When this policy has been in continuous force for three years from its date, it shall be incontestable, except for the nonpayment of premiums when due, for understatement of age, or for fraud. (3) No personal liability is incurred by becoming a member of this company. Payments are optional with the insured, to continue as long as he may desire to keep the policy in force. Payments under this policy during its first two years, after providing for its pro rata of actual death claims occurring upon policies in the first and second policy years, and thereafter quarterly, an amount limited to one eighth of 1 per cent of the face value of this policy may be used for expense purposes; the remainder thereof to be apportioned by the trustees of said company among the mortuary, reserve, and emergency funds.

(6) The premiums herein required to be paid by the insured are to provide for the payment of mortuary claims, and for the general fund and reserve or emergency funds of this company, and are based upon the adopted tables of rates, and graded according to the age of the insured and the amount of insurance named herein. Said tables of rates are based upon the American Mortality Tables, and the actual experience of American life insurance companies, and are deemed adequate to meet all present and future liabilities of the company, without necessitating an increase in the rate with advancing age; but, as an absolute protection against the possibility of the mortuary or reserve funds becoming depleted, it is agreed that, should any emergency arise, through epidemic or otherwise, whereby the premiums are insufficient to meet the mortuary requirements as determined by the board of trustees, additional premiums may be levied to meet such emergency, of which special notice shall be served. (7) It is expressly understood and agreed, by and between the insured and this company, that if the insured shall not pay the sum or sums stipulated to be paid in the manner aforesaid, or if any misrepresentations shall have been made or any facts omitted which should have been stated in said application, or if the insured shall violate any of the provisions of this agreement, then this contract shall cease to be binding upon said company, and all payments made shall be forfeited to said company. . . . (9) In case the insured shall fail to pay any premium at the office of the company within the time specified for the payment thereof, a delinquent charge of 25 cents will be added. The membership of the insured in this company shall not lapse or determine until ten days after said company shall have mailed to said insured, as hereinabove provided, a notice that said premium has not been paid; and if said insured shall not pay said premium at the office of said company by twelve o'clock, noon, on the last day specified in said notice, then the insured's membership in this company shall lapse and determine, and this policy shall become null and void, and all payments made thereon shall be forfeited to the company, except when otherwise expressly provided herein. (10) The application of the insured for this policy of insurance, together with the articles of association and by-laws of this company now in force or which may hereafter be legally adopted, shall constitute a part of this policy. . . . (18) When the insured shall reach his life expectancy, computed on his age at the date of this policy, he may, by giving the company six months' notice in writing of his desire to do so, provided the policy is in full force and all payments have been made thereon, discontinue his payments upon the same, and apply his net contribution to the reserve or emergency fund, together with his equitable proportion of all accretions thereto, as determined by the actuary of the company, either to the maintaining of this policy in force until such credits are exhausted, when it shall cease and determine, or surrender this policy, and withdraw the same in cash, together with any unused dividend accumulations, in full settlement of all liability. (14) Dividends to be declared shall be limited to that part of the reserve fund in excess of $100,000 and in excess of the amount of one periodical payment from all policy holders. (15) When the policy has been kept in force continuously for a period of ten years from its date, the insured shall be entitled to participate in whatever dividends may be declared thereafter; the same to be determined and apportioned by the actuary of the company, and credited on premium accounts to reduce future payments on this policy. (16) In event the insured shall become totally and permanently physically disabled, said company will pay, upon proof satisfactory to the board of trustees, upon the receipt and surrender of this policy, in full discharge of all claims, the sum of one half the face value hereof, provided the insured shall so request in writing, while this policy is in full force, subject to the agreements contained herein."

Does the scheme of insurance thus displayed coincide with that conducted on the "assessment plan," as that term is used in § 3630e? The obligation of the insured is to pay a fixed sum at stated periods in advance, without reference to any particular death claim. Section 6 of the conditions and agreements on the back of the policy shows that the premiums to be paid by the insured are to provide, indiscriminately, for the payment of death claims, to create a general fund, and a reserve or emergency fund, which latter fund may be increased to at least $100,000. The obligation of the policy holder to pay a fixed sum periodically for three distinct purposes is subject to the right of the company to levy "additional premiums" to guard against "the possibility of the mortuary or reserve funds becoming depleted." Here there is no obligation or duty laid upon the company to await the exhaustion of these funds, or either of them, before calling upon the policy holder for additional premiums. These contributions, authorized by this emergency clause, though denominated "premiums," bear a close resemblance to assessments. The amount of the call is uncertain, and depends upon the will of the managing body of the concern,—its board of trustees. It is not, however, the chief or usual method of securing an income, and, if the affairs of the company are intelligently and honestly conducted, should never be resorted to, except in the event of some widely-spread and fatal epidemic. The ordinary, regular, and chief source of revenue open to the relator is the fixed periodical payments named in the policy, and, in our opinion, for the purpose of admission into the state, they characterize the method of insurance which the company pursues. The possibility that some grave and unforeseen calamity may call into operation an authority vested in the trustees to call for an additional and uncertain sum should not be regarded as sufficient to assign the company to that class which transacts the business of insurance on the assessment plan. The general assembly, in classifying life insurance companies into those that transact business on the assessment plan and those that do not, should be taken to have regarded their usual and regular mode of raising revenue, rather than the exceptional or occasional methods to which resort may be had upon the happening of some remote contingency.

We think neither of the relators transacts the business of insurance on the assessment plan, within the meaning of § 3630e, Rev. Stat. Writ refused, and petitions dismissed.

(.....S. C.....)

1. The costs and fees of the witnesses of a defendant tried for a misdemeanor are not chargeable to the county under a statute charging the county with such expenses in felony cases.
2. A constitutional right of an accused person to compulsory process for his witnesses does not carry a right of the witnesses to claim fees from the county.

(February 19, 1898.)

A PPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the General Sessions Circuit Court for Laurens County denying their claim to witness fees in a prosecution against Evans et al. for assault and battery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Johnson & Richey for appellants.
Mr. Thomas S. Sease for the State.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants were bound over to attend, and did attend, the court of general sessions for Laurens county, July term, 1897, as witnesses for defendants in the case of the state against Harry Evans and others, charged with assault and battery with intent to kill. After the acquittal of defendants, the appellants applied to the circuit judge for certificates that they were material witnesses, with a view to draw pay as witnesses. The circuit judge, while certifying as to their materiality as witnesses, directed the clerk of the court not to issue pay certificates to appellants, for the reason that defendants were tried for a misdemeanor, and that the county is not liable for costs and fees of defendants' witnesses in a case of misdemeanor. The only question presented here is whether the county of Laurens is liable for the costs and fees of defendants' witnesses in a case of misdemeanor. We hold with the circuit judge that the county is not liable. The right to such fees depends wholly upon statute. In § 622, Gen. Stat., being § 676, Rev. Stat. 1893, it is provided that "each county shall pay

NOTE.—As to right of state to require services of witness without compensation, see note to Dixon v. People (Ill.) 39 L. R. A. 118.

(2) witnesses' fees in the state cases, for actual attendance upon the circuit courts as provided by law." But by an act approved February 4, 1896, entitled "An Act to Amend § 2638 of the General Statutes, being § 45 of the Revised Statutes, Criminal Code, Vol. 2, in Reference to Defendants' Witnesses, and Regulate Their Pay," found at page 102 of the Acts of 1896, it is provided that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and in felonies, and no other cases, such witnesses shall receive the same pay as the state's witnesses upon the certificate of the trial judge that the testimony of such witnesses was material to the defense: provided," etc. It is manifest from this act that the liability of a county to pay fees of defendants' witnesses is limited to felonies. It is true that § 18 of article 1 of the Constitution gives the accused the right to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor in all criminal prosecutions. But no right of the accused is involved in this case, and the accused's right of compulsory process for his witnesses in all cases does not carry a right of his witnesses to claim fees from the county in such cases. The right to such fees must rest upon some express statute, and there is no such statute, except in cases of felony.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cheatham County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James L. Watts for appellant.

Messrs. Jacob Leech and J. B. De Bow for appellee.

Snodgrass, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error was in a wagon, driving a pair of mules over a bridge on the Charlotte pike near Nashville. This pike was a public thoroughfare much traveled, and vehicles of all kinds were constantly passing over the bridge. While plaintiff was so passing, an engine of the defendant, Nashville, Chattanooga, & St. Louis Railway Company, passed under it; and while under it, or just as it was passing out from beneath, its whistle was loudly blown several times. This frightened the mules, which ran away, and plaintiff in error was thrown out of the wagon and badly injured. Through a next friend (plaintiff being a minor) he brought this suit. Issue was joined, trial had, and, after all plaintiff's evidence was in, defendant demurred to it as insufficient in law to authorize recovery. In addition to what we have stated as facts of the case which were proved, plaintiff testified that he did not know the cause of the blowing, and made no effort to prove whether there was or not a legal or proper cause or excuse therefor. Upon the demurrer, which admitted all the evidence, and all legitimate inferences arising thereon, the question was whether negligence could be inferred from such blowing of the whistle under a public bridge on a thickly traveled thoroughfare while plaintiff in error was driving over it. The court held it could not, and dismissed the suit. Plaintiff took a bill of exceptions, which is objected to in this court as insufficient. This is immaterial. The demurrer incorporates the evidence, and a bill of exceptions was not necessary. 2 Elliott, Gen. Pr. § 855. On the merits, defendant's counsel, in connection with an ingenious argument of much plausibility, cites as authority for the action of the court the case of Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 104 Ind. 526, 54 Am. Rep. 384, in which it was held that it was not necessarily negligent in a railway company to sound a locomotive whistle at a point where the railroad crosses a highway by a bridge overhead, although the crossing is known to be one of extraordinary danger, and the sounding of the whistle causes a horse to run away. We have stated the principle of this case from its own syllabus as given in 54 Am. Rep. 384. It may admit of question if it is not too strong for a proper analysis of the case, which is a somewhat complicated one, and in which there were certain findings of fact, made by the court below, and certain omissions in finding, to which reference was made, and amid which findings and omissions the court with difficulty labored to a conclusion satisfactory to itself. But, assuming it to have squarely decided the question that such a blowing of an overhead engine would not be negligence per se, or such an act as that a jury or judge authorized to deduct legitimate inferences might not, in the absence of other proof, hold to be negligence, then such conclusion is not satisfactory to us, even upon its own facts. There, however, it will be remembered, the noise and smoke involved in the passage and blowing of an engine were above the animals, which might or might not be thereby frightened. Bad as these are, they are not, in the very nature of things, so terrifying as when puffing and blasting underneath the animal on a bridge above, where sound and sight and smell may all be combined to drive him to the verge of frenzy by terror. In such a case the supreme court of Pennsylvania held such blowing negligence per se. That court characterized it as an act of gross negligence. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259-265, 98 Am. Dec. 346. It was, of course, not decided that any blowing of a locomotive whistle would be negligence, or that every case of injury resulting therefrom would be made out by proving such blowing without more, and this the same court aptly illustrated in a late case. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Stinger, 78 Pa. 219. But it was distinctly held that a blowing under a bridge constantly used by the traveling public is prima facie negligence, and in that we cordially concur. See also 8 Elliott, Railroads, § 1264, reference to note 3, and cases cited; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Starnes, 9 Heisk. 52, 24 Am. Rep. 296. Ordinarily, the use of a whistle is of machinery and appliances necessary for many practical purposes, and where used under ordinary circumstances no inference of negligence could be drawn; but it is obvious that a blowing under a bridge is, in the absence of some special necessity therefor, an unnatural and reckless act, liable to cause great damage, and the circumstances and surroundings call, therefore, for proof of its necessity, when the act occasions the damage to be anticipated. The proof of such a blowing under such circumstances is sufficient to authorize the presumption of negligence. The onus is shifted to explain and justify or excuse it upon him who does it. This burden may be successfully carried, but it cannot be avoided by demurrer to plaintiff's evidence establishing the act.

It results that judgment sustaining the demurrer must be overruled, and judgment rendered here against demurrant. The case will be remanded for a jury to assess damages.

It is insisted here plaintiff could not recover, because he was driving one runaway mule. We find no such negligence in plaintiff's conduct as precludes a recovery. If he was guilty of any negligence to reduce the amount he might otherwise be entitled to, it is matter for the jury, which shall assess the correct amount to be given under the facts in evidence as demurred to. The defendant in error will pay the costs of the appeal.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Vermont

v.

Addie SHATTUCK.

(69 Vt. 403.)

1. The burden of proving restrictions in another state upon the remarriage of a divorced person is upon the person alleging them.
2. The marriage in another state where it is valid, of a divorced person incapable of remarrying by the law of his domicile, will not be held void under the law of his domicile unless the statute expressly so provide, although he went outside the state for the express purpose of evading the law, and immediately returned.

(July 17, 1897.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Windsor County Court made during the trial of an action charging defendant with adultery which resulted in a conviction. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William B. C. Stickney, for respondent:

There is no question that Coburn had no right to remarry in Vermont.

It shall not be lawful for the libelee to marry a person other than the libellant for three years from the time such divorce is granted, unless the libellant dies.

Vt. Stat. §§ 2703, 2704, 5056.

If a marriage is absolutely prohibited in any country as being contrary to public policy, and leading to social evils, the domiciled inhabitants of that country cannot be permitted, by passing the frontier and entering another state in which this marriage is not prohibited, to celebrate a marriage forbidden by their own state, and immediately returning to their own state, to insist on their marriage being recognized as lawful.

Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 219. See Penegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703; Barney v. Cuneen, 68 Vt. 51.

Messrs. J. G. Harvey and W. W. Stickney, for the State:

The marriage in New Hampshire between William H. Coburn and Grace Hoisington conformed to their statute on that subject.

The proof of marriage was by direct evidence of witnesses present at the celebration, and by a certified copy of the intention and certificate of marriage from the records of Claremont where such registration is required to be kept by the law of New Hampshire.

This evidence is sufficient and satisfactory proof of the marriage, and, taken in connection with the New Hampshire statute, is conclusive.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charge is that the prisoner, an unmarried woman, committed adultery with Coburn, a married man. It appeared that Coburn's first wife, who is still living, obtained a divorce from him in this state in December, 1895; that on June 13, 1896, he and Grace Hoisington, both of whom were then domiciled in Windsor in this state, went to Claremont, New Hampshire, and were there married by a clergyman authorized by the law of that state to solemnize marriages; and that immediately after the marriage they returned to Windsor, where they have lived ever since, and where they first cohabited as husband and wife, never having cohabited as such in New Hampshire. The only evidence of the law of New Hampshire respecting marriages was chapter 174 of the Public Statutes of that state, entitled Marriages. That chapter imposes no restraint upon remarriage by the guilty party to a decree of divorce. The court charged the jury that if it found that the marriage ceremony was performed by the clergyman, and that he was authorized to perform it, as his testimony tended to show, and also found that the said Grace cohabited with Coburn under the belief that the marriage was legal, as her testimony tended to show, the marriage was valid, and Coburn was a person with whom the crime of adultery could have been committed. To this the prisoner excepted, and also for that the court did not charge that there was no evidence in the case to show that Coburn, being disqualified by the laws of this state to contract a lawful marriage, was, notwithstanding such disqualification, competent by the laws of New Hampshire to contract a lawful marriage, and that without such testimony the fact of his marriage to said Grace was not made out. This last exception is not sustainable. As we have said, the chapter of the New Hampshire statutes put in evidence is not restrictive in this behalf; and if it be said that some other part of the statutes may be, the answer is that, as such restrictions upon marriage are exceptional, the burden was on the prisoner to show the restriction, if any there is. Hutchins v. Kimmell, 81 Mich. 126, 132, 18 Am. Rep. 164. And, as no restriction exists in the common law of this state, the presumption is that the common law of New Hampshire is like ours in this regard. Ward v. Morrison, 25 Vt. 593, 601. The marriage in question must, therefore, be taken to be valid by the law of New Hampshire. But, had it been celebrated in this state, it would be void here, for our statute provides that it shall not be lawful for a divorced libelee to marry a person other than the libellant for three years from the time the divorce is granted, unless the libellant dies; and imposes a penalty on a person who violates that provision, or lives in this state under a marriage relation forbidden by it; and we have recently held that a marriage celebrated in this state in violation thereof between parties domiciled here, was void here. Oritt v. Smith, 68 Vt. 35, 35 L. R. A. 223. The prisoner claims that this marriage is void here, notwithstanding it was celebrated in New Hampshire, and is valid there, for that, when a marriage is absolutely prohibited in a state or country as being contrary to public policy, and leading to social evils, the domiciled inhabitants of that state or country cannot be permitted, by passing the frontier, and entering another state, in which the marriage is not prohibited, to celebrate a marriage forbidden in their own state, and immediately return to their own state, to insist on their marriage being recognized as lawful. It is the common law of Christendom that as to form and ceremony a marriage good where celebrated is good everywhere. But as to capacity to marry the authorities are not agreed, some holding that, as in other contracts, it depends upon the law of domicile, and some that it depends upon the law of the place where the marriage is solemnized, as to form and ceremony, and that a marriage good where celebrated is good everywhere, unless odious by the common consent of nations, or positively prohibited by the public laws of a country from motives of policy. It is undoubtedly true that states may control this matter by statute, as Massachusetts does, where it is enacted that when persons resident in that state, in order to evade its marriage laws, and with an intention of returning to reside there, go into another state or country and are married, and afterwards return and reside in Massachusetts, the marriage shall be deemed void. We have no such express provision. The language of our statute is general, and it is a fundamental rule that no statute, whether relating to marriage or otherwise, if in the ordinary general form of words, will be given effect outside of the state or country enacting it. To bind even citizens abroad, it must include them, either in express terms or by necessary implication. Hence, if a statute, silent as to marriages abroad, as ours is, prohibits classes of persons from marrying generally, or from intermarrying, or declares void all marriages not celebrated according to prescribed forms, it has no effect upon marriages, even of domiciled inhabitants, entered into out of the state. Those marriages are to be judged of by the courts of such state, just as though the statute did not exist. If they are valid by the international law of marriage and the local law of the place where celebrated, they are valid by the law of such state, and the statute has nothing to do with the question if such international law is a part of the law of the state, as it is here, for a written law not construed to be extraterritorial does not change the unwritten law as to extraterritorial marriages; and therefore parties who are under no disability by international law may choose their place of marriage, and if the marriage is valid there, it will be valid everywhere, though they were purposely away from home, and the same transaction in the state of their domicile would not have made them married. There is, therefore, no foundation for an argument based simply on the idea of an evasion of the law of domicile.

This doctrine is entirely applicable to statutes prohibiting marriage after divorce. Such statutes are not extraterritorial, unless made so by express words or necessary implication, as has been frequently held in this country though there are cases the other way, among which is the recent and well-considered case of Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703, where the cases adopting the same view will be found. But the weight of American authority, as well as reason and analogy, sustain the proposition stated. This whole subject is very fully and satisfactorily discussed by Mr. Bishop in chapter 39 of the first volume of his work on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation; and, as we adopt his views, an extended discussion here is not necessary. The subject is also fully discussed in Com. v. Lane, 113 Mass. 458, 18 Am. Rep. 509, and Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321. In the latter case it is said that the relation of husband and wife being based upon the contract of the parties, and recognized by all Christian nations, the validity of the contract, if not polygamous nor incestuous according to the general opinion of Christendom, is governed, even as regards the capacity of the parties, by the law of the place of marriage; that this status, once legally created, should be recognized everywhere as fully as if created by the law of the domicile; and that, therefore, such a marriage, if valid by the law of the place where contracted, even if contracted between persons domiciled in Massachusetts, and incompetent to marry there, is valid there to all intents and effects, civil and criminal, except so far as the legislature has clearly declared that such a marriage out of the commonwealth shall be deemed invalid. The same doctrine is held in Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505, where it is said that, in the absence of express words to that effect, it is not to be inferred that the legislature intended its enactments to contravene the jus gentium under which the question of the validity of the marriage contract is referred to the lex loci contractus, and which is made binding by the consent of all nations, and professedly and directly operates upon all; and that, while every country can regulate the status of its own citizens, until the will of the state finds clear and unmistakable expression to the contrary, that law must control. Judge Marshall says in United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 389, 2 L. ed. 314, that "where rights are infringed, where fundamental principles are overthrown, where the general system of the laws is departed from, the legislative intention must be expressed with irresistible clearness, to induce a court of justice to suppose a design to effect such objects." Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 193, sustains the prisoner's contention. There a man and his deceased wife's sister, both of whom were lawfully domiciled British subjects, went temporarily to Denmark, and were there married, where their marriage was valid; but it was held void in England because an English statute prohibited such marriages. The law lords delivered separate opinions, and the only ground upon which they agreed was that, as the statute made such marriages between English subjects domiciled in England void because declared by the act to be contrary to the law of God, it must be construed to include such marriages though solemnized abroad. Judge Gray says, in Com. v. Lane, above cited, that the judgment in that case proceeds upon the ground that an act of Parliament is not merely an ordinance of man, but a conclusive declaration of the law of God, and that the result is that the law of God, as declared by act of Parliament, and expounded by the House of Lords varies according to time, place, length of life of parties, pecuniary interests of third persons, petitions to human tribunals, and technical rules of statutory construction and judicial procedure. Mr. Bishop criticizes the case very sharply, and says it is of the highest importance that it be sufficiently understood in this country to avoid any accident of its being followed by our courts. He discusses it very fully, admitting that it was difficult for him to write soberly about it, as the decision was announced in apparent oblivion of the course that justice had taken for ages in England, and ignored alike acts of Parliament and judicial decisions. To follow it, he says, would lead us into confusion not to be endured where marriage, good order, and Christian decency are respected. The French law is much like the English in this regard, though more exacting. By the Code Napoleon, a marriage contracted in a foreign country between French people, or between a French person and an alien, is valid if it has been celebrated in the manner followed in such country, provided it has been preceded by the publication required by the Code, and provided the French person has not violated the provisions of the Code concerning the qualifications and conditions required to contract marriage. Cachard's French Civ. Code, art. 170. This accords with the further provision of the Code that laws relating to the status and capacity of persons apply to Frenchmen even resident in a foreign country. Id. art. 8. On this principle the civilians generally, we think, hold that as to capacity to marry the law of the domicile governs. But the other view as suggested by Judge Story, is founded upon a more liberal basis of international policy that deems it far better to support as valid marriages celebrated in another state or country when in conformity with the laws thereof, although some minor inconveniences may arise therefrom, than to shake general confidence in such marriages, to subject the innocent issue to constant doubts as to their legitimacy, and to leave the parties themselves at liberty to cut adrift from their solemn obligations whenever they happen to become dissatisfied with their lot. Story, Conf. L. pl. 124.

Judgment that there is no error in the proceedings of the county court, and that the prisoner take nothing by her exceptions.

(..... Wash.)

1. Conveyances made to a corporation when a majority of the stock was owned by citizens will be declared void when a majority of the stock is transferred to and held by aliens, under Const. art. 2, § 33, prohibiting the ownership of lands by aliens, and providing that every corporation, the majority of the capital stock of which is owned by aliens, shall be considered an alien for the purpose of such prohibition.

2. A lease of land for forty-nine years to an alien is void under Const. art. 2, § 33, prohibiting the ownership of lands by aliens, and providing that all conveyances of land to any alien shall be void.

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in favor of defendants in an action to declare void certain conveyances of real estate which had been made to the defendant company on the ground that the company was an alien. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to ownership of real estate by alien corporation, see also Oregon Mortg. Co. v. Carstens (Wash.) 35 L. R. A. 841.

As to right of foreign corporations in general to own lands, see note to Lancaster v. Amsterdam Improvement Co. (N. Y.) 24 L. R. A. 322.

Mr. P. H. Winston, Attorney General, in propria persona.

Messrs. Cyrus Happy and Graves, Wolf, & Graves, for respondents:

By the common law aliens were incapable of acquiring and holding real estate.

2 Bl. Com. 249; 2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. 53, 55.

The courts of this country, while holding that an alien cannot acquire real estate by descent or other mere operation of law, hold that he may acquire land by purchase and hold the same until office found by the state.

2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. supra.

The common-law prohibition against alien ownership of real estate had its origin undoubtedly in the feudal tenures of the mother country.

Cooley's Bl. Com. p. 872.

Happily we are not troubled with many of the burdens which feudalism imposed.

The payment of taxes upon land has superceded all other burdens under which tenures were held in the days of feudalism.

Therefore we can discover no reason under present conditions for applying this constitutional provision to domestic corporations.

There has never been any common law, or any statute law, against an alien becoming the owner of personal property.

2 Kent, Com. 12th ed. p. 63.

The court is asked to impute to the framers of our organic law the intention that a corporation born and raised in this state shall be exiled, and its lands confiscated, not for any act done by it, but because of the act of a stockholder in transferring his stock. The act which is to work this attainder and corruption of blood, figuratively speaking, is nothing more than the transfer of personal property to one who never labored under any legal disabilities, either at common law or by statute, with respect to personal property.

The statute would seriously impair the value of the stock of all corporations owning real estate, if held to apply to real-estate titles acquired by corporations at a time when it was under no legal disabilities.

What shall constitute citizenship in this country is a matter which the Federal government alone can determine.

For the purposes of jurisdiction confessed by law upon the courts of this country, a private corporation is a citizen of the state where it is created, and necessarily a citizen of the United States, and not an alien.

Muller v. Doves, 94 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 207; Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 444, 86 L. ed. 768.

Private corporations are persons within the meaning of the 14th Amendment, and are entitled to its protection the same as natural persons, so far as their property is concerned.

San Mateo County v. Southern P. R. Co. 8 Sawy. 238; Santa Clara R. Tax Case, 9 Sawy. 165.

Expatriation can only be effected in accordance with law; and the Congress of the United States must be the source of that law.

Comitis v. Parkerson, 56 Fed. Rep. 556, 22 L. R. A. 148.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the state, on the relation of the attorney general, to declare void certain conveyances of realty made by defendants Harriette N. MacDonald and D. W. MacDonald to the Hudson Land Company, a corporation, upon the ground that said corporation is an alien, under § 38, art. 2, of the Constitution of the state of Washington. It is conceded that, at the time the property was conveyed, a majority of the stock of the corporation was owned by citizens of Washington, but that thereafter a majority of the stock was transferred to, and is now held by, aliens. One parcel of the realty was conveyed absolutely to the company, while another was leased for forty-nine years. To the relator's complaint setting up these facts a general demurrer was interposed, which was sustained by the lower court. The relator electing to stand on his pleading, judgment was rendered against him, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to this complaint. This court, in the case of State, Atty. Gen., v. Morrison (Wash.) 52 Pac. 228, held that a lease to aliens for ninety-nine years was void, for the reason that it was in contravention of the provisions of the article of the Constitution above referred to, and because parties would not be allowed indirectly to accomplish a result which they are forbidden to do directly, and we think the same reasoning applies to this case. The language of the Constitution is as follows: "The ownership of lands by aliens, other than those who in good faith have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, is prohibited in this state, except where acquired by inheritance, under mortgage or in good faith, in the ordinary course of justice in the collection of debts; and all conveyances of lands hereafter made to any alien directly or in trust for such alien shall be void: provided, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to lands containing valuable deposits of minerals, metals, iron, coal, or fireclay, and the necessary land for mills and machinery to be used in the development thereof and the manufacture of the products therefrom. Every corporation, the majority of the capital stock of which is owned by aliens, shall be considered an alien for the purposes of this prohibition." It seems to us that this language is not susceptible of construction. A plain policy was plainly enunciated by the constitutional convention. That policy was an inhibition of ownership of lands by aliens except as to the character of lands specially mentioned in the proviso, and the constitutional convention, having in mind, no doubt, the attempt to evade this law which is made in this case, out of an abundance of caution inserted the last provision, viz, that "every corporation, the majority of the capital stock of which is owned by aliens, shall be considered an alien for the purposes of this prohibition." We cannot understand what meaning could be attached to this last provision of the act if a corporation, the majority of the capital stock of which is owned by aliens, is allowed to become the owner of lands. It is contended by the appellant that, because a majority of the stock of this corporation was owned by citizens at the time the land was transferred to the corporation, it would work an injury and a hardship upon the corporation, and upon the owners of stock thereof, to hold this transfer void, and that, had it been the intention of the constitutional convention to make such an application of the law as this, language more explicit could, and surely would, have been used. We do not think that language more explicit could have been used. Presumably, the members of the constitutional convention regarded this question as of great importance, and the article doubtless was passed after careful consideration and revision; and the whole article shows that it was the intention of the law that the ownership of lands by aliens should be prohibited, and that it should be prohibited despite of subterfuges which might be resorted to by aliens for the purpose of becoming such owners; and we have already seen the wisdom of the makers of the Constitution in clothing this article in language which is so plain that it is not susceptible of judicial construction. First, attempts have been made in the case just above referred to by aliens to become owners of land through the medium of leases which in effect conferred ownership, and now the Constitution is again sought to be avoided, and benefits obtained under it by indirection which could not be obtained by direct action. We have no doubt that corporations have it within their power to protect themselves from the dire consequences and hardships which are suggested by appellant in his brief by reason of members of a corporation selling stock to aliens in the corporation; but, if they cannot, our laws confer certain benefits on and exemptions to corporations, which are valuable; and if men see fit to enter into corporations for the purpose of doing business, instead of doing it as individuals, and accept the benefits which the law confers upon the corporation, they must also accept the burdens which are incident to a corporate investment. But, outside of all this, when it once becomes the established law that deeds of this character are void, members of corporations will not be quick to obtain such deeds, and the hardships dilated on by the appellant will be more in theory than practice. But, even if it be conceded that these hardships would have to be endured, the evident spirit of the Constitution must be sustained. The broad doctrine is announced that the ownership of lands by aliens is inhibited. The exceptions to that rule are as plainly announced by the Constitution. These transfers not falling within the exceptions, the conveyance must be held to be void. The lease for forty-nine years will be held void, under the doctrine announced in State v. Morrison (Wash.) 52 Pac. 228.

The case will be reversed, with instructions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

Anna Lee CHAMBERS et al.

(93 Va. 138.)

1. Possession by an insured of the policy is, upon demurrer by the insurer to the evidence in a suit upon the policy, conclusive evidence that the premium was paid.
2. That an insured person had taken drinks just before he received an injury will not, if he was not drunk, bring him within the clause of the policy that it shall not "cover any accidental injury which may happen to me while under the influence of intoxicating drinks."

3. Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an accident insurance policy, is not shown by the facts that the insured, without knowing that a train was due, sat on a bag on the railroad track at a highway crossing, and upon being warned of the approach of a train started away, but turned back for the bag, and was struck before he could get away.

I. Construction compared with negligence.

Conditions in accident insurance policies against liability in case of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger are construed most strongly against the insurer, and liberally in favor of the insured. Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 277.

And the terms "negligence" and "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" as used in such a condition are not necessarily or usually synonymous. 40 L. R. A.

Lehman v. Great Eastern Casualty & I. Co. 7 App. Div. 424; Miller v. American Mut. Acci. Ins. Co. 92 Tenn. 187, 20 L. R. A. 765; and see UNITED STATES MUT. ACCI. ASSO. v. HUBBELL.

Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of a condition in an accident policy against liability in such case, means something more than contributory negligence or the want of ordinary care on the part of the assured. Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 94 Iowa. 435, 23 L. R. A. 78.

And mere negligence short of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger will not defeat a recovery upon such a policy. Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 267.

Under a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability in case of injury from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, the assured does not contract for the exercise of reasonable care and caution, or against contributory negli-plaintiffs in an action upon a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cabell & Cabell, for plaintiff in error:

Counsel for appellee ask to be permitted to introduce before this court evidence that is not in the record, for the purpose of raising before this court a question for the first time—a question that was not raised in the trial court, not presented to judge or jury, and nowhere appears in the record. This cannot be done.

This policy was never paid for, and really never delivered. One of the conditions in the policy is: "This policy shall not take effect unless the premium is paid previous to any accident under which claim is made."

So, in Shevlin v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Wis. 180, 36 L. R. A. 52, it was said that authority is not wanting that the exception, where the language is voluntary exposure, etc., is not confined to injuries caused by gross negligence.

In the above case, Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Ins. Co. 161 Mass. 149, infra V., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the condition was against injury caused by voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, while in the case at bar the word "voluntary" does not occur, the use of which contemplated a conscious exposure to danger, or gross negligence.

And Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Again, Kirkland warranted to be true that he was "in a sound condition, mentally and physically."

"He was quite deaf, did not hear well."

Kirkland was sitting in the middle of the railroad track with his back to the way the train came from, complaining of being sick and weak, and carrying on a conversation with a negro woman.

Even to cross such a track has been judicially held to be an obvious danger.

In a recent case decided by the United States circuit court of appeals Judge Simonton says: "The track of a railroad over which frequent trains are passing is a place of danger. A person who goes on it unnecessarily or without valid cause voluntarily incurs a risk for the consequences of which he cannot hold others responsible."

It has been held, however, that the use by the court of the words "gross negligence" in an action upon an insurance policy, in referring to the defense that the insured had unnecessarily exposed himself to danger, though erroneous, is not a ground for reversal where the instructions were full and elaborate as to what would constitute an unnecessary exposure to danger within the meaning of a condition in the policy against liability in case of such exposure. Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. Acci. Asso. 63 Minn. 470.

And in Sawtelle v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 15 Blatchf. 216, which was an action upon an accident insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from exposure to unnecessary danger, hazard, or perilous adventure, it was held that the act of the assured in passing from car to car upon a railroad train while it was at full speed, in the night-time, is negligence as a matter of law, and that negligence and exposure to unnecessary danger are equivalent terms.

Cardwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Greensville county upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, the jury having ascertained the plaintiffs' damages at $2,000, the amount covered by the insurance policy sued on, and the defendant in error moves to dismiss the writ of error as improvidently awarded, upon the ground that the record does not show that there was a motion for a new trial in the court below. This is not an open question in Virginia. It was raised and determined in the case of Norfolk & N. R. Co. v. Dunnaway (decided at the present term), 93 Va. 29, wherein it was held "it was not necessary for a motion for a new trial to be made in the trial court in order to have a judgment on a demurrer to evidence reviewed in the appellate court."

It is also insisted by counsel for defendants in error that, in addition to the rule governing where there is a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, all evidence introduced by the defendant in the court below in support of its defense based upon the ground of a violation of the conditions or restrictive provisions in the policy should not be considered, as this evidence does not first make it appear that the conditions or restrictive provisions in the policy sued on are in the print required by § 3252 of the Code or written with pen and ink in or on the policy. This section provides: "In any action against an insurance company or other insurer, founded on a policy of insurance issued after the 1st day of July, 1878, no failure to perform any condition of the policy, nor violation of any restrictive provision thereof, shall be a valid defense to such action, unless it appears that such condition or restrictive provision is printed in type as large or larger than that commonly known as long primer type, or is written with pen and ink in or on the policy." This presents to this court an entirely new question of great importance, which the record does not show to have been raised in the trial court; and as it has not been fully argued, and as the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed on the merits of the case, it is not necessary to decide it, and we therefore express no opinion on that question.

At the trial the plaintiffs introduced in evidence the policy of insurance sued on, and then proved by parol testimony that the insured, L. A. Kirkland, was struck and killed by a locomotive of the Atlantic & Danville Railroad on the 28d of December, 1891, and in rebuttal examined witnesses to show that the representations in the application for the insurance alleged by defendants to have been false were in fact not false, and that the accident by which the deceased lost his life was not caused by his intoxication, or the result of the use of intoxicants, or from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. The defendant insurance company sought by its testimony to make defense to the action upon the grounds that the insured made false representations in his application for the insurance; second, that the insurance premium on which the

II. Consciousness of danger.

Consciousness of danger is necessary before there can be a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability in case of injury from such exposure. Miller v. American Mut. Acci. Ins. Co. 92 Tenn. 187, 20 L. R. A. 765.

Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability for injury from such exposure, refers only to dangers of a real, substantial character, which the assured recognized, but to which he nevertheless purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the time to assume all the risks of the situation. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mitchell, 47 U. S. App. 260, 78 Fed. Rep. 754, 24 C. C. A. 305; FIDELITY & C. Co. v. CHAMBERS.

And it implies knowledge on the part of a person injured of the existence of the danger. Carpenter v. American Acci. Co. 46 S. C. 541.

thing which one is consciously willing to take the risk of. Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 161 Mass. 149; De Loy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 171 Pa. 1.

To constitute voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of such a condition, the act must be done designedly and not accidentally, and must have been one done in obedience to and regulated by the will of the person who does it, who must have intentionally and consciously assumed the risk of the obvious danger. Lehman v. Great Eastern Casualty & I. Co. 7 App. Div. 424.

In Lehman v. Great Eastern Casualty & I. Co. 7 App. Div. 424, supra, Cornish v. Accident Co. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 453, infra, V., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the language of the condition was "exposure of the insured to obvious risk or injury" the difference depriving that case of any authoritative value; and Williams v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 82 Hun, 269, 133 N. Y. 367, infra, III., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the assured in a spirit of bravado sat down upon a railroad track in front of an approaching engine, which was a conscious, deliberate act.

So, such a condition does not cover involuntary policy was issued had not been paid; and, third, that the insured had sustained the injury in consequence of the violation of certain conditions or restrictive provisions in the policy, or that it was caused by his intoxication, or was the result of the use of intoxicants. By a demurrer to the evidence the party demurring is considered as admitting the truth of his adversary's evidence, and all just inferences which can be drawn therefrom by the jury, and as waiving all of his own evidence which conflicts with that of his adversary, and all inferences from his own evidence (although not in conflict with his adversary's) which do not necessarily result therefrom. Johnson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 9 Va. 171, and authorities cited. The plaintiffs' evidence made out their case, and we will consider the defense made by defendant, subjected to the well-established rule just stated. Was the premium paid? We are of opinion that this defense cannot avail, because of the fact that at the time of the accident the insured had in his possession the policy of insurance, and the possession of it is such evidence of the payment of the premium as, upon a demurrer to evidence, is conclusive upon the court. Beyond this, it was agreed that if Inman, the agent of the insurance company, who issued the policy, and who had been summoned as its witness, had been present, he would have testified that he delivered the policy to Wiley Jones to be delivered to Kirkland when he paid for it, and only then. The defendant not only did not introduce Wiley Jones as a witness, but did not account for his absence.

The representations in the application for the insurance alleged to have been false are: "My habits of life are correct and temperate," and "I am in sound condition mentally and physically." The first, as it appears in full in the application is: "My habits of life are correct and temperate, and I understand that the policy will not cover any accidental injury which may happen to me either while under the influence of intoxicating drinks or in consequence of my having been under the influence thereof." Policies of this character are contracts, to be construed like other contracts, and words of exception contained therein are to be given the construction most favorable to the insured. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. v. Newman, 84 Va. 52; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 286, and notes. The evidence of the defendant, if given its full force and effect, does not show that the insured was drunk at the time of the accident. It does show that he would take a drink, and had taken drinks that morning, but it does not even tend to show that the accident was in consequence of his intoxication, or as the result of drinking, nor that the injuries were received in consequence of "bodily infirmity." In the case of Prader v. National Masonic Acci. Assn. 95 Iowa, 149, the evidence was that the deceased left home sober, with two friends, and they drank from a quart bottle of whisky, of which some was left when they returned; that the deceased then drank two glasses of wine, and soon after was injured by slipping into a hole, and it appeared that those in whose company he was considered him sober. It was held (supreme court of Iowa) that the evidence did not show that the deceased was injured while under the influence of intoxicating liquors. See also Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 82 Va. 949; Standard L. & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Jones, 94 Ala. 434. Plaintiffs' witnesses, who saw deceased but a short while before he was killed, say that he was not drunk, and, although one of the witnesses helped him on the cars, it was not because he was drunk, but because he was sick and weakly. He had spoken to one of the witnesses of going to see a doctor "about his throat or the gripe." W. S. Goodwin testified that the deceased was in his law office but a short while before the accident, and was sober at that time. Even where evidence of intoxication is conflicting, the decision of the lower court must be sustained. Sutherland v. Standard L. & Acci. Ins. Co. 87 Iowa, 505. The only evidence in the record as to "bodily infirmity" consists of the statements by some of the witnesses that he was "quite deaf; didn't hear well." We do not think this question enters seriously into the consideration of this case. The provision in exposure to necessary danger. Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 94 Iowa, 435, 28 L. R. A. 78.

And if the external circumstances would have such a controlling influence upon a man of ordinary prudence and intelligence that he would take a certain course, that course would not be considered voluntary on his part within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability for injuries caused by voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. Duncan v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Assn. 27 Jones & S. 145.

The act of a person cannot be held to have been voluntary within the meaning of such a condition if it was such as a man of ordinary prudence would be induced to do by the circumstances. Duncan v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Assn. 27 Jones & S. 145.

Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability in case of injury therefrom involves the idea of intentionally doing some act which reasonable and ordinary prudence would pronounce dangerous. Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osburn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 267; Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 94 Iowa, —, 28 L. R. A. 78.

There is a clear distinction between a voluntary act and a voluntary exposure to danger, within the meaning of such a condition in an accident insurance policy. Hidden danger may exist, but exposure thereto without knowledge of the danger does not constitute a voluntary exposure to it. Burkhard v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 206.

And the approach to an unknown and unexpected danger does not make the act a voluntary exposure thereto within the meaning of such a condition. The acts may be voluntary, and yet the exposure involuntary. Jones v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 92 Iowa, 662; Burkhard v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 206.

Thus, a passenger on a railroad train does not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability in case of injury from such exposure, where he fell asleep from weariness, and the motion of the cars, and while it was quite dark and he was in a dazed and unconscious condition of mind, and, not knowing or realizing what he was doing, he involuntarily arose from his seat and walked unconsciously to the the policy is that the insurance company shall not be liable for injuries received in consequence of bodily infirmity," and there is not the slightest testimony in the record to show that the injury was so received.

The policy held by the deceased insured him "against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means." That the insured came to his death "through external, violent, and accidental means" is not questioned, and it only remains to be determined whether the evidence brings the case under the exception in the policy which provides that it does not cover injuries caused by "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." The words "voluntary exposure," as used in an accident-insurance policy, imply conscious intentional exposure; something which one is willing to take the risk of. It must appear that the act, in order to come within the exception, was one which reasonable and ordinary prudence would pronounce dangerous, and that the accident was in consequence thereof. It is consequently not every act of negligence which will defeat a recovery under such a provision, and, in general, the question whether the conduct of the insured is such as to preclude a recovery is for the jury under all the circumstances of the case, and where there is a demurrer to evidence, as in this case, for the trial judge. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 307, 308, and cases cited in notes 5, 6, p. 307, and notes 1, 2, p. 308. The only evidence upon this point is that of Fanny Hill (colored), a witness introduced by the defense. She says that she was talking to deceased in the county road where the railroad track crosses it. He was sitting on a bag and on the railroad track, with his back up the railroad. The train came down around the curve, when she hollowed to him, and he started off, but reached to get his bag, and as he reached to get it the engine struck him in the left side of the back. The train was coming so fast around the curve that it was as much as she could do to get out of the way herself. There is not the slightest evidence to show that the deceased knew that a train would be along at or near that time, nor that he had good reason to know it. The fact that he immediately got off the track when apprised that the train was coming negatives the idea of conscious intentional exposure to danger. The most that can be made of this evidence is that the deceased, in thinking that he had time to get his bag off the railroad track, was simply mistaken. In the case of Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 287, the court held that a recovery may be had on a policy of insurance against accidental injuries, or death "effected through external, violent, and accidental means," when the evidence shows that the insured, running rapidly from the postoffice, 50 yards distant, to get the mail for the postmaster from a railroad train, which was fast approaching, and which did not stop at the station, attempted to check his speed on getting near the train, but stumbled, and fell against the steam-chest of the engine, receiving fatal injuries, although the insured was not in the employ of the postmaster, and volunteered to get the mail from the train, and although there were exceptions contained in the policy against "intentional injuries" and "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." Somerville, J., in his opinion, says: "Exceptions of this kind are construed most strongly against the insurer, and liberally in favor of the insured. This is now the settled rule for construing all kinds of insurance policies, rendered necessary, especially in modern times, to circumvent the ingenuity of insurance companies in so framing contracts of this kind as to make the exceptions unfairly devour the whole policy." The fact that a person insured against injury or death by accident was guilty of negligence which contributed to an injury received by him will not prevent a recovery on the policy. Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157. It should be borne in mind that this is not a suit against the railroad company, where the question of contributory negligence would come in. If every negligent or careless act of the insured from which accident results without "conscious intentional exposure" on his part is to be made to serve as a defense to an action on the policy, policies of this character would become of little utility.

Bankers' Acci. Ins. Co.* 96 Iowa, 216.

Actual knowledge of the danger, however, is not always essential to constitute a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injuries caused by such exposure. Reckless and wanton conduct short of actual knowledge of danger might constitute voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger if the unnecessary danger is such as a reasonably prudent man ought to have known. Carpenter v. American Acci. Co. 46 S. C. 541.

And where a man acts so recklessly and carelessly as to show an utter disregard of a known danger, or where the danger is so obvious that a prudent man exercising reasonable foresight would not have done the act, he may be said to have voluntarily exposed himself to danger within the meaning of such a condition. De Loy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 171 Pa. 1.

FRATERNAL ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION of America, Appt.

(6 N. D. 201.)

1. One who has started to hunt prairie chickens with a loaded gun at a season of the year when it is unlawful to kill prairie chickens has not, by such act, committed the offense of attempting to kill prairie chickens.

2. One who hunts for game with a loaded gun cannot be said to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger by such act, within the meaning of the provision in an accident-insurance policy which declares that, for injuries sustained by reason of a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, there can be no recovery.

3. Nor is an attempt to scale a bank with a loaded gun in hand a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of such a provision.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court of Ransom County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy, of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

A plaintiff will in no case be permitted to recover where it is necessary for him to prove his own illegal act, or where an essential element of his cause of action is his own violation of law.

Corliss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, based upon a verdict in his favor directed by the court, the appeal in this case was taken. The object of the action was to recover the amount due under an insurance policy issued by defendant to the plaintiff. Among other provisions, the policy contained one entitling the plaintiff to $1,000 for the loss of a hand through external, violent, and accidental means. The plaintiff lost his left hand by the accidental discharge of a gun he was carrying. Only two defenses are relied on. The facts do not appear to be in controversy.

It is first urged that the plaintiff was injured while violating the laws of this state. The policy declares that it does not cover injuries resulting wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, from violating rules or laws of a corporation. We shall assume, for the purposes of this case, that this language embraces the laws of such a condition in an accident insurance policy, but is an accident for which the contracting parties intended that the association should be liable. National Ben. Asso. v. Jackson, 114 Ill. 533.

Ins. & Invest. Co. v. Martin*, 32 Md. 310.

The question whether he was guilty of a wilful exposure to unnecessary danger or peril within a condition of the policy in such case, is one of fact for the jury. Providence L. Ins. & Invest. Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 310.

So, a drover accompanying his cattle to market and caring for them while in the course of transportation, and doing whatever is customary and what other cattle dealers under like circumstances and conditions would do, does not so voluntarily of this state, and does not relate solely to laws of a corporation, and rules of a corporation, as is contended by counsel for the plaintiff. What law of this state, then, was the plaintiff engaged in the violation of at the time he was injured? He had started out with his loaded gun for the purpose of killing prairie chickens. To have killed them at that season of the year (it being December 12) would have been a violation of chapter 69 of the Laws of 1891. But the plaintiff was not engaged in the killing of anything at the time the accident occurred. He was climbing a bank, and, his foot having slipped, he caught hold of a limb, and was in the act of drawing himself up by means thereof, when in some way the gun was discharged, the contents lodging in his left hand, shattering it so terribly that amputation was necessary. The only possible ground on which it can be claimed that the plaintiff was violating the laws of this state at the time the gun was discharged, and that the injury he sustained resulted from such violation, is that he was guilty of attempting to kill prairie chickens. Under provision of §§ 7693, 7694, Rev. Codes, an attempt to commit a crime is of itself a substantive offense. Section 7693 declares that "an act done with intent to commit a crime, and tending but failing to effect its commission, is an attempt to commit that crime;" and § 7694 provides that "every person who attempts to commit any crime and in such attempt does any act toward the commission of such crime, but fails or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable, when no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempt, as follows," etc. It is too clear for discussion that, at the time the plaintiff was injured, he had not done any act tending to effect the commission of the offense of killing prairie chickens out of season. Intent had ripened into preparation. But the plaintiff had not, in deeds, passed beyond the point of preparation, and entered upon the execution of his criminal project. It is impossible to formulate a rule which will constitute an unerring guide in assigning to cases which occupy the debatable ground their respective places upon one side or the other of the line which separates preparation from legal attempt. The question, must, from its very nature, always remain difficult of solution. The wisest course for tribunals to pursue with respect to it is to deal with each cause as it arises, in the light of a few general principles applicable to such cases. We shall content ourselves with the statement of our conclusion that the plaintiff had not, within the meaning of our law, attempted the killing of prairie chickens, although he had formed the purpose to shoot them, and had made preparations to accomplish such object. The authorities fully sustain our view. Mulligan v. People, 5 Park. Crim. Rep. 103; State v. Clarissa, 11 Ala. 57; Hicks v. Com. 86 Va. 228; Stabler v. Com. 95 Pa. 318, 40 Am. Rep. 658; State v. Butler, 8 Wash. 194, 25 L. R. A. 434; People v. Murray, 14 Cal. 159; 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 760, 762, 764; Reg. v. Cheeseman, 9 Cox, C. C. 108; Reg. v. Taylor, 1 Fost. & F. 511.

The second ground of defense is that the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger. The policy provides that it shall not cover such injuries as result from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. There is no merit in this defense, under the facts of this case. It will hardly be insisted that one who, in the ordinary way, hunts for game, has by such an act exposed himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of such a provision in an insurance policy. Nor can it be said that the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger by essaying to scale the bank, or by attempting to draw himself up the bank with his left hand, while the loaded gun was held in his right hand. We cannot say that this act was one which reasonable men would pronounce dangerous. To go through a dense thicket with the hammer of a gun raised, and the muzzle pointed towards one, would be to voluntarily expose one's self to unnecessary danger. But no reasonably prudent man would have deemed it probable, or even possible, that injury would result from scaling a bluff with a loaded gun in hand. The danger was a hidden danger. No one can be said to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger when no hazard is visible to an ordinarily prudent man. He would justly be chargeable with having voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger as to defeat an action upon an insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from such exposure, as it is his right, if not his duty, to incur all the risk and danger incident to caring for and looking after his cattle in the cars. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Snowden, 12 U. S. App. 704, 58 Fed. Rep. 342, 7 C. C. A. 284.

And a mason who worked upon a swinging scaffold in pointing the walls of an eight-story brick building, the scaffold being suspended from the roof by means of ropes which passed over a projection in the building, and was drawn toward the building so as to bring it into position by guy ropes, one of which broke, throwing him to the street below, did not thereby unnecessarily expose himself to danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure, as it was contemplated by both parties when the policy issued that he would be exposed to the dangers incident to his occupation. Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. Acci. Assn. 53 Minn. 470.

law, voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure, because he called at a saw mill for the purpose of having some lumber cut the requisite length for a cabinet to be used in the bank, and while waiting he sawed off a board twice and then stood by the side of a table in which the saw was moving, watching the workmen, and, while turning or moving around, he stepped upon a block concealed in the saw-dust on the floor, and instinctively threw out his arm to recover his balance, which came in contact with the moving saw which cut off his hand. Hees v. Van Auken, 11 Misc. 422.

And a commercial traveler traveling about his ordinary business, who was frozen to death on a prairie about 8 miles from a place to which he was returning from one of his trips in company with a driver, when his wagon broke down and the weather became suddenly cold and stormy and he was too numb to walk and unable to ride horseback, and so remained while the driver went for assistance, but was frozen to death before his return, himself to unnecessary danger who should essay to leap a wide and deep chasm. But no such charge could be laid at the door of one who, in the night, should unexpectedly walk into an unprotected ditch. The authorities fully sustain our ruling upon this point. *Keene v. Benjamin JOHNSON

v.

LONDON GUARANTEE & ACCIDENT
COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Alleged error in failing to direct a verdict for defendant accident insurance company on the ground that plaintiff had voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger is not available on appeal where no request therefor was made in the trial court.

2. The owner of a farm does not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger, within the provisions of an accident insurance policy, by attempting to drive a bull from a calf pasture into which it has broken, if he does not believe, and has no reason to believe that there is any danger to himself in so doing.

3. One insured as a grocer's secretary and treasurer in an accident insurance company, whose policy provides that if he is injured while engaged in work or duty classified as more hazardous than the occupation for which he is insured he shall recover at the rate fixed for the increased hazard, does not, as matter of law, change his occupation to farming by returning to a farm owned by him less than a week after his employment as such secretary and treasurer ceases.

4. One must act with gross or wanton did not expose himself to obvious or unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability in case of injury from such exposure, where he was sufficiently warmly clothed for the weather as it was when he set out. North West Commercial Travelers' Asso. v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 10 Manitoba L. Rep. 537.

So, it is a question for the jury, in an action upon an accident insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, whether the insured thus exposed himself, where he was a seller of books and newspapers on board a railway train, and was engaged in his business when the policy was taken out, and being nearsighted and wearing glasses, he got off his train after having gone on it and left his coat, and was afterwards injured by getting on the train, which was moving at a slow rate of speed, at a place where he had every reason to suppose that it would stop so that he could have boarded it while it was standing still. *Pacific Mut. negligence to make his act a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the provision in an accident insurance policy.

(November 23, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

Plaintiff took out an accident policy in the defendant company in the year 1892, for the sum of $3,000, with a weekly indemnity of $15, "against bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means." A written application was made, which was a part of the policy. The premium was $4 per $1,000. In his application he represented that he was "engaged in the business or occupation of secretary and treasurer to Hull Bros. Company, grocers," under the classification "select;" and the policy contained the same language. The policy was twice renewed. At the time of the application, and until the time of the accident, he resided on his farm in Monroe, Michigan. As a part of the policy, he agreed "that, if injured while engaged in work or duty classed as more hazardous than my occupation above stated, I shall be entitled to

And whether he assured at the time of receiving an injury was engaged in doing something outside of the occupation covered by his policy, or whether, though in the pursuit of an occupation covered by the policy, he exposed himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of a condition in the policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure, and whether he exhibited due regard for his personal safety, such as an ordinarily prudent man charged with the duty and placed in like circumstances would have done,—are questions of fact for the determination of the jury. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Snowden, 12 U. S. App. 704, 58 Fed. Rep. 342, 7 C. C. A. 264.

But the act of one, after crossing a railroad track and warning others approaching it to look out for the engine, in retracing his steps and going upon the track and squatting or kneeling down and remaining until he was struck by an approaching train, when the whistle was being blown and the bell rung, and the locality was lighted by an electric light, cannot be held not to be a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy recover only such amount as the premium paid by me would purchase at rates fixed for such increased hazard." A part of the business of his farm was raising cattle. He kept a bull. The bull had broken into his calf pasture. On October 29, 1895, while returning from his greenhouse to his dwelling, about 11 o'clock, he saw the bull in this pasture, and went in to drive him out. The cause of the injury is thus stated in his notice to the company: "Where and how did the accident occur?" "The bull had broken through a fence, into a pasture kept on purpose for calves. He undertook to drive him out, when the bull turned suddenly, and tossed him." "What were you doing at the time?" "Walking around; looking about." "State just what happened." "Seeing the bull in the calves' pasture, he undertook to drive him out, when the bull suddenly turned around, and tossed him." Some time before the accident, Hull Bros. had sold out their entire stock and business, and plaintiff had no employment from them except to assist in collecting accounts. At the time he was superintending the building of a greenhouse, and had been home for about a week. He testified that two men "were managing my farm at the time of the accident. It was their business to take care of the stock. Between them they had the entire charge of it. That included the bull. I left everything in charge of the two men. When I was there, I took charge of it as I saw fit." A letter written in his name by his sister-in-law, under date of November 5, 1895, contained the following statement: "I left Detroit about the middle of September. Some weeks before that, I bought a plant of five greenhouses from Mr. C. Hogg, of Van Dyke avenue, Detroit, and came home to add the florist's business to what I already had on the island, and took the management of the farm, fruits, and greenhouses; having two men working the farm and vegetable garden. I have already told you, when I filled out your form, just how I came to meet with the accident, and cannot understand what more you want to know." Under date of November 2, she wrote to defendant the following letter: "I have submitted your letter to Mr. Ben Johnson. He came home after Hull Bros. sold out to Mr. J. L. Hudson, about the middle of September; but, before that time, he bought a greenhouse plant in Detroit, and was working to get it in place, and was still working at it at the time of the accident. Mr. Ben Johnson owns Johnson's island, in the city of Monroe, upon which place he has cattle, and has been raising small fruits for the last five years. He does not wish to hold back any information in regard to the accident. If there should be anything more you wish to know, let me hear from you." Plaintiff introduced testimony showing that the bull had never before shown signs of viciousness, although he testified: "I have heard of the boys going along the river, and teasing the bull, and I presume sometimes the bull had cause to be ugly." In his claim for indemnity, the following question and answer were given:

Q. What was your weekly salary or income at the time you were injured?

A. None; the business in liquidation.

He had a contract for employment with Hull Bros., which did not expire until some time after the injury. He testified: "I received a salary up to a week before the accident. I was not receiving any salary at the time because there was no money. I was not receiving any money for my time." Insurance is classified by defendant as "select, preferred, ordinary, medium, hazardous, and extrahazardous." Under this classification, farming was deemed hazardous, and the annual premium was $15 per $1,000. The plaintiff recovered $260, the full amount claimed.

Messrs. Charles S. McDonald and S. S. Babcock, for plaintiff in error:

The words "voluntary exposure," as used in accident policy, "imply conscious, intentional exposure, something which one is willing to take the risk of."

Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 161 Mass. 151.

In the case at bar the trial judge charged: "In order to make plaintiff's act upon this occasion a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, he must have acted with gross or wanton negligence, or otherwise it was not a vol-against liability in case of injury from such exposure, on the theory that the persons warned by him were intoxicated, and that their condition provoked him to follow them with the intention of interfering in their behalf if threatened with danger, where there was no evidence of inebriation on their part except their testimony that at the close of their day's work they had taken one or more drinks. Williams v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 133 N. Y. 366.

IV. Unexpected results.

Voluntarily placing one's self in a position of exposure to an obvious danger is within a condition in an accident-insurance policy against death or injury happening in consequence of exposure to any obvious or unnecessary danger, where the precise injury happens which there was reason to fear. Tuttle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 134 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 316.

But it must appear that the injury followed the exposure as a consequence thereof. Jones v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 92 Iowa, 652; Burkhard v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 206.

In Jones v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 92 Iowa, 652, supra. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Jones, 80 Ga. 541, and Shaffer v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Ill.) 22 N. E. 589, infra, V., were distinguished upon the ground that in both cases the assured proceeded to do an act voluntarily which was fraught with danger, and the injury resulted therefrom, and was what would have been reasonably expected to follow the act done.

Unusual and unexpected results, not the logical outcome of the exposure, are not to be considered as having been caused by voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of such a condition.

Thus, one who had visited a house of ill-fame and passed out to the street therefrom at about midnight, when he was killed in a controversy arising about the payment for a hack, in which his companion took the principal part, will not be held to have voluntarily exposed himself thereby to unnecessary danger so as to prevent a recovery upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury or death from such exposure. *Jones v. By "vicious propensity" is meant a propensity to do any act that might endanger the safety of the persons and property of others in a given situation.

There is evidence coming from the plaintiff that he had some actual knowledge of the dangerous propensities of this bull, and sufficient to put him upon his guard.

It is the propensity to commit mischief that constitutes the danger, and therefore it is sufficient if the owner has seen or heard enough to convince a man of ordinary prudence of the animal's inclination to commit the class of injuries complained of.

Reynolds v. Hussey, 64 N. H. 64.

As a prudent man he should have sent the dog to drive the animal. He knew that it was the prudent way, and that the dog would do the work, and all danger be avoided, and in law he was bound to take the more prudent course.

Nor does one who while intoxicated accosts a woman in the street, and persists in doing so in the face of remonstrances, whereupon he is knocked down and seriously injured by a man who thinks he has a right to protect her, thereby wilfully expose himself to unnecessary danger or peril within a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure. Mair v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 37 L. T. N. S. 356.

And a passenger upon a railroad train did not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in such a policy against liability for injuries caused by such exposure, where the train stopped on a bridge, because the draw was open and he went to the front platform of the coach and stepped off through a hole in the floor of the bridge, causing his death, where others also got out of the coach, some of them in advance of him, and the bridge, with the exception of such hole, was entirely safe. *Burkhard v. The court erred in its charge to the jury in leaving the question whether or not Mr. Johnson was a farmer at the time of his injury.

Williams v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 133 N. Y. 366; Miller v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 39 Minn. 548.

The instruction as to voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger was correct.

The defense of change of occupation was clearly and intelligently submitted to the jury upon the theory of the defense. The court even thrust the burden upon the plaintiff, instead of the defendant, contrary to the decisions of this court.

Hess v. Preferred Masonic Mut. Acci. Assn. (Mich.) 3 Det. L. N. 906; Emlaw v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 108 Mich. 554.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Counsel urge that the court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff had voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger. The complete answer to this is that counsel preferred no such request at the trial. The case was tried upon the theory that upon this point the question belonged to the jury to decide. This question is therefore not before us.

2. Error is alleged upon the following portion of the instructions: "In order to make against liability in an accident-insurance policy, is one of fact for the jury, under proper instructions from the court. Carpenter v. American Acci. Co. 48 S. C. 541; Fidelity & C. Co. v. Chambers.

And where there is a demurrer to the evidence it is a question for the trial judge. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Chambers.

Thus, whether crossing a railroad track in front of an advancing train is or is not negligence or voluntary exposure to unnecessary risk is a question materially dependent on the circumstances of the case, the distance to be covered, and the speed at which the train was approaching; and where the distance across was only 12 feet there is no error in leaving it to the jury under proper instructions. Traders' & T. Acci. Co. v. Wagley, 45 U. S. App. 39, 74 Fed. Rep. 457, 20 C. C. A. 588.

And the question whether the assured voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition is one of fact for the jury where, in crossing a railroad consisting of three tracks, after he had got upon the first track he was called to by several persons from different directions to look out for the train, and instead of stopping to ascertain where it was he took his act upon this occasion a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, he must have acted with gross or wanton negligence, or, otherwise, it was not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." In this connection the court also charged as follows: "I charge you also that a voluntary exposure means a conscious or intentional exposure. If the insured in this case believed or had good reason to believe that he was endangering his safety by attempting to drive this bull from this inclosure, then I charge you that he cannot recover. If, on the other hand, he did not believe or had any reason to believe that there was any danger to himself in that attempt, then I charge you that it was not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." This charge is sustained by the authorities. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 16 U. S. App. 290, 58 Fed. Rep. 952, 22 L. R. A. 620. That case was taken to the circuit court of appeals and affirmed, all the judges concurring in the opinion. 7 C. C. A. 588. See also 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 492, where will be found a full citation of authorities.

8. Was plaintiff engaged in an occupation more hazardous than that in which he was classified in the policy? The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that plaintiff was in fact engaged in the more hazardous employment; also, that if they found that he was engaged in another occupation in addition to that of secretary and treasurer, and did not disclose that fact to the defendant, he could recover only the lesser sum under the more hazardous risk. These requests were refused, and the jury instructed that if the plaintiff had ceased to belong to the occupation in which he was insured, and had, in fact, become a farmer, he could only recover for the more hazardous occupation. The question is one of fact, to be determined by the court only when there is no dispute as to the evidence, and but one rational conclusion can be drawn therefrom. A man may be engaged in two or more occupations, in which case he can only recover for injury received in the employment for which he is insured. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 387. The provisions of the policy in that case were similar to those in this. Taylor was insured as a blacksmith, employed by a railroad company. In fact, he also acted as a switchman and car coupler, occupations more hazardous than blacksmithing. Held, that recovery for injuries received while acting as a switchman or coupler must be limited to the increased hazard. We think there was no evidence tending to show that plaintiff was a farmer, within the terms of the policy, until his employers, Hull Bros., had ceased to do business. The fact that he lived upon his farm, and carried it on through others, does not make him a "farmer," within the meaning of that term as used in these accident policies. He was at home only from Saturday night to Monday morning, and on Wednesday night, of each week. There is no testimony to show that during that time he was engaged in the actual work of a farmer, so as to incur the more hazardous risks incident to that business. It does not follow that plaintiff's policy lapsed when his regular employment with Hull Bros. ceased, or that he had necessarily become a farmer or engaged in the business of farming by spending his time at his home when the necessity for his being in Detroit had ceased. Stone v. United States Casualty Co. 84 N. J. L. 371. In that case a school teacher, out of employment, had let contracts for the erection of two dwellings for his own use, and, while overlooking one, fell, and was killed. Held, that he had not changed his employment, but was engaged in an individual act, which did not avoid the policy. See also 2 Bacon, Ben. Soc. 491; Hess v. Preferred Masonic Mut. Acci. Asso. (Mich.) 70 N. W. 460, post, 414.

There was testimony tending to show that plaintiff had not changed his occupation. The letters, upon which considerable reliance is placed, were not written by the plaintiff himself, or dictated by him, but were written by his sister-in-law while he was suffering from his injuries. They are explained by him and by her in such a manner that they were properly left to the jury, in connection with the other testimony, to determine their exact meaning. There was sufficient conflict in the evidence to justify the submission of the question to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

And one who has occasion to cross railway tracks in order to reach a point for which he has started, and as he is about to do so observes a train approaching from the south upon the easterly track and waits for it to pass, and then, without taking the precaution to notice a train which is coming toward him from the north upon the track next to him, starts forward and is immediately struck and killed, does not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition. Lehman v. Great Eastern Casualty & L. Co. 7 App. Div. 424.

So, a person found on a dark night between the station platform and the railroad track with his legs crushed by the wheels of a car when the train has but just started cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in such 40 L. And one who was hit by a detached car which had been kicked along the track by an engine the sight of which was cut off by his umbrella while crossing the track at a quick pace at a place where from one to two thousand persons had crossed daily for years, though notice had been posted up by the railroad company to prohibit it, was not thereby voluntarily exposing himself to unnecessary danger, hazard, or perilous adventure, within the meaning of an accident-insurance policy containing a condition against liability in case of injury from such exposure. Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 161 Mass. 149.

In Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 161 Mass. 149, supra, Tuttle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 134 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 216, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the person injured made the railroad track his place for travel, and did so unnecessarily.

1. A bank cashier does not, as matter of law, lose his right to recover under an accident-insurance policy providing that it shall be wholly void as to all accidents occurring while engaged in any professional employment or exposure not rated as a preferred occupation, by sawing off blocks from a board for his own use.
2. An accident-insurance company has the burden of proving, in an action against it upon a policy, that an injury to plaintiff shown to be the result of an accident was within some exception named in the policy.

So, one who while on his way home crossed a railroad trestle bridge which was much frequented by foot passengers, and was reasonably safe for use as a bridge over the creek which it spanned, having a walk and railing on one side, and fell from the bridge and received injuries from which he died, cannot be held, as a matter of law, to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of an accident insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from such exposure. Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 84 Iowa, 435, 28 L. R. A. 78.

And the question whether an attempt to board a street car by the front platform while the car was moving at a very slow rate of speed was a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition in an accident-insurance policy is one for the determination of the jury as a matter of fact. Johanns v. National Acci. Soc. 16 App. Div. 104.

And so is the question whether or not the efforts of an insured person to get on a train moving at a rapid rate was a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Snowden, 12 U. S. App. 704, 58 Fed. Rep. 342, 7 C. C. A. 264.

And the fact that a person who had gone into a train house to become a passenger on a train, and who was afterwards found dead upon the track immediately after the passing of the rear car of a train, was doing a dangerous act in leaving a car while it was in motion is not, in the absence of evidence as to the cause of his fall, conclusive proof that he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of such a condition, and does not sustain the burden of proof thereon resting upon the insurance company, this being a question for the jury and not for the court. Badenfeld v. Massachusetts Mut. Acci. Asso. 154 Mass. 77, 13 L. R. A. 263, 40 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. P. Stewart and Moore & Moore, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff was injured while engaged in operating a buzz saw in violation of his policy of insurance, and therefore cannot recover.

Plaintiff was injured because he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger.

Plaintiff's injury was the result of his own negligence.

The court erroneously charged the jury that the plaintiff was not bound to show that he had complied with the terms of the policy, but the burden was upon the defendant to show that he had not.

A condition precedent is something that must take place before a liability can exist. In other words, the plaintiff must show that he has complied with all the provisions and

So, in Sutherland v. Standard L. & Acci. Ins. Co. 87 Iowa, 505, which was an action upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from unnecessary exposure to danger, it was held that the question whether the fact that the assured was riding on the rear platform of a railroad car showed such want of care as to defeat a recovery is one for the jury, and does not of itself show such want of care as to defeat a recovery.

In Sutherland v. Standard L. & Acci. Ins. Co. 87 Iowa, 505, supra, Bon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 56 Iowa, 667, 41 Am. Rep. 127, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the person injured stood on the steps of the platform.

And in Pratt v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (N. Y.) cited in 7 Am. L. Rev. 595, which was an action upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability for injury caused by wilful exposure or want of due care, it was held that it is for the jury to say whether, if the assured, who was smoking when getting on the train, was passing in the dark from the ladies' car into the smoking car for the purpose of continuing to smoke, he was careless or in the exercise of due care.

So, riding upon the platform of a railway car running from 15 to 30 miles an hour is not, as matter of law, a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mitchell, 47 U. S. App. 260, 78 Fed. Rep. 754, 24 C. C. A. 305.

And for one to attempt to get on a train of cars while it is moving not faster than a man could walk, when by some means he falls under the cars and is killed, though an imprudent act is not a wilful and wanton exposure of himself to an unnecessary danger or peril within the meaning of a condition in an insurance policy against liability thereon in case of injury from such exposure, as his act cannot be justly characterized as wilful or wanton. Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 23, 1 Am. Rep. 157.

And a passenger on a railway train who was overcome by the heat of the car or affected with nausea which impelled him to go out on the platform, where he was in a more dangerous position than he would have been had he remained in the car, and was injured, cannot be said, as matter of law, to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury in case of such exposure. Marx v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 321.

Whether he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such condition is a question for the jury. Marx v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 321.

And one who approached an arriving railroad train at a rapid rate for the purpose of getting the mail bag for the postmaster, making an effort to check his speed as he reached a sloping bank which led down to the side track of the railroad, in doing which he stumbled and came in collision with the engine, whereby he was killed, will not be held to have been guilty of voluntarily exposing himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition, though he was a volunteer, and it was not a part of his duty to get the mail bag. Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 267.

So, one who rides in a bicycle race, and is injured thereby, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger by entering into the race, within the meaning of a condition of an accident-insurance policy against liability for injuries caused by such exposure. Keeffe v. National Acci. Soc. 4 App. Div. 392.

And the question whether a person who goes to work upon a scaffold knows that it is insecure, is one for the jury, in an action upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability for injuries caused by voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. *Wilson v. And the mere act of cleaning a gun not known to be loaded is not voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition, where an accident results from an unknown defect in the gun. Miller v. American Mut. Acci. Ins. Co. 92 Tenn. 187, 20 L. R. A. 765.

And where one knew that a mule was ill-tempered and dangerous and addicted to kicking, and yet stood near her hind feet and slapped her on the hip in a way calculated to provoke her to kick, it is a question for the jury whether or not he exposed himself voluntarily to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident insurance policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure. Carpenter v. American Acci. Co. 46 S. C. 541.

While the general rule would seem to be that the question is one for the jury, as above stated, however, there are many cases which seem to adopt the rule that the neglect of the assured may be so flagrant as to amount to voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger as a matter of law.

Thus, a person acquainted with the locality, who drives a horse and carriage in which he is riding on a dark night into a place where there is a network of railroad tracks, where he is run over by a train of cars and killed, knowingly exposes himself to unnecessary hazard and danger, within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury caused by such exposure. *Neill v. The plaintiff was standing near the saw when he fell, and it is only reasonable to suppose, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he was using every caution commonly exercised by prudent men, and was not exposing himself voluntarily and knowingly to danger.

And, death of the assured through attempting in broad daylight to cross the main line of a railroad in front of an approaching train, by which he was run over and killed at a place where there was no station or proper crossing and no obstruction to prevent a person about to cross from seeing an approaching train, falls within a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for accidents happening by exposure of the insured to obvious risk of injury, in the absence of evidence that he was short sighted or deaf. Cornish v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 453.

So, a workman upon his way to work, whose way is obstructed by a train of freight cars standing across the street, voluntarily exposes himself to unnecessary danger so as to prevent a recovery upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability for injuries caused by such exposure, where, after waiting ten or fifteen minutes, he attempts to cross through the train by climbing upon the drawheads of the cars, when he can go around the end of the train, though less conveniently, and the train is moved, and his foot is crushed by the coming together of the drawheads or bumpers of the two cars between which he attempts to pass. *Bean v. MOORE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover for the loss of a hand which was cut off by coming in contact with a buzz saw. The case was tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

When the plaintiff was insured by the defendant, he was cashier in a bank. His claim is: That he wanted a cabinet for use in the bank, and went to a planing mill to have some boards sawed off with which to make the cabinet. That he told Mr. Bloom, an employee, what he wanted. That the employee started the cut-off saw, and cut off some boards for the shelves, and took them to the band saw, to put more work upon them. That while the employee was doing this, plaintiff saw the ends of the cherry boards on the floor near the cut off saw, and thought he could use them for handles to the cabinet, and requested a fourteen-year-old boy to saw them off for him. The boy started the saw, but did not saw off the blocks as plaintiff expected him to do, and the plaintiff said he thought he could do it himself, and that he did saw them off. That after he had sawed off the blocks,

And walking a mile and a half on a dark night on a 6-foot way or space between two parallel railroad tracks of one of the most crowded railroads in England, with up and down trains constantly passing, where four tracks were afterwards found necessary to accommodate the traffic, amounts to an exposure to obvious and unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury caused by such exposure. Lowell v. Accident Ins. Co. cited in 29 U. C. C. P. 231.

So, it is voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of a condition in an insurance policy against liability in case of such exposure, to attempt to cross a bridge 15 feet high upon ties from 10 to 12 inches apart with no walk or planking of any kind or any railing, on a dark night, where a platform or walk extended the whole length of the bridge on the opposite side with a fence or railing to protect persons from falling off, upon which he might have crossed. Folitts v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Iowa, 435, 28 L. R. A. 78.

And one who in walking along a railroad track steps upon a trestle several feet in length consisting of cross-ties elevated some 6 or 8 feet above the bottom of the bridge and requiring several steps from one cross-tie to another, to pass over it on a dark and rainy night, having his hands filled with packages, knowing that it is dangerous, and who makes a misstep and falls through, seriously injuring himself, voluntarily exposes himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition in an accident insurance policy, where there are other ways to reach his home, though it is his usual route, and many others traveled that way, and he had crossed many times before. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Jones, 80 Ga. 541.

Nor can a recovery be had under an accident

he stood close up to the table, watching the boy, who was about 20 feet away, piling lumber. That he was simply waiting by the side of the table. That he cannot say how long he had been waiting; it may have been one minute, or it may have been five. That there were sawdust and little blocks of wood on the floor. That he stepped on something, and stumbled, and lost his balance, and threw out his arms to save himself from falling, when his wrist came in contact with the saw, and his hand was cut off. He further testified that when he told the proprietor of the mill what he wanted done, he was requested by him to show Mr. Bloom how he wanted the work done, and that he went into the mill for that purpose.

One of the defenses interposed was that the plaintiff cut off his hand purposely. It will not be necessary to discuss that defense, because the jury have found against the defendant upon that proposition. The other defenses are that the injury occurred while the assured was doing what was forbidden by the policy. Its terms were: "The member is required and agrees to use all due diligence for his personal safety and protection;" that the insurance shall not cover "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger;" and also contained the following provision: "Inasmuch as eligibility to membership in this association is confined by its charter to persons whose occupations are comprised within the classification commonly known as 'Preferred Risks' by casualty companies, a copy of which classification is printed upon the back of this certificate, it is therefore agreed that this certificate shall be wholly void as to all accidents occurring to the insured when engaged in any profession, employment, or exposure not herein rated as a preferred occupation." It is the claim of the defendant that the insured "was engaged in a profession, employment, or exposure not rated as a preferred occupation in the policy," and for that reason cannot recover; and that, as a matter of law, the judge should have so determined, and directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, — citing a number of cases in support of that contention, all of which are distinguishable from the case here, except the case of Knapp v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Asso. 53 Hun, 84. This case does sustain the contention of appellant, but it is contrary to the great weight of authority. In Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. § 409, it is said: "A change of occupation means 'an engaging in another employment as a usual business.' It does not apply to temporary employments during leisure hours, to acts done outside of one's usual and ordinary business, or to casual employment in a different business." A provision of a policy limited the liability of the company to a less sum than that named in the policy if the insured should be injured in any occupation or exposure classed as more hazardous than that specified in the policy. It was held the terms "occupation" or "exposure" classed by this company as more hazardous refer to distinct classified occupations or employments, and to bring the case within the provision limiting the liability of the company the assured must be within policy containing a condition against liability in case of death or injury in consequence of exposure to any obvious or unnecessary danger, for the killing of the assured by a railroad train while he was running on the track in front of it in the night to get a train approaching in the other direction on a parallel track. Tuttle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 134 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 316.

And in such a case a claim that his death did not happen in consequence of his exposure to the risk, but from a new force or power which intervened in the way of the engine coming upon him without having sounded a bell or whistle, is not tenable. Tuttle v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 134 Mass. 175, 45 Am. Rep. 316.

And an intelligent man, in the exercise of his own free will and without necessity and with knowledge of the danger, who stands upon the platform of a moving railway car with his hands in his pockets, or upon the steps of the platform of such car while the train is being propelled at a speed of about 25 miles an hour, voluntarily exposes himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability in case of injury from such exposure, where the position is in fact dangerous. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mitchell, 47 U. S. App. 290, 78 Fed. Rep. 754, 24 C. C. A. 306. See also Bon v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 56 Iowa, 664, 41 Am. Rep. 127; Sawtelle v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 15 Blatchf. 218.

So, alighting from a train after it has gone from 150 to 175 feet beyond the station, while the train is running from 1 to 6 miles an hour, whereby the assured is injured, is a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability for injury from such exposure, where he was on the train when it pulled into the station, and could have then got off. Smith v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Asso. 104 Mich. 624.

And jumping from a freight train in rapid motion, on which one is riding without permission, is an exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of such a condition in an accident-insurance policy. Shevlin v. American Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Wis. 180, 36 L. R. A. 62.

And in Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 34 Conn. 574, which was an action upon an accident insurance policy containing a condition against liability for injury caused by unnecessary exposure to danger or peril, among other things it was held that where the insured was injured internally while jumping in great haste from a railroad car at a station and running a considerable distance, which action was not necessary to his safety, but was voluntarily undertaken to effect an important object requiring haste, the injury was not caused by accidental means within the meaning of the policy.

So, one who goes to work upon a scaffold which is insecure, knowing it to be so, exposes himself to unnecessary danger so as to prevent a recovery upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability for injuries caused by such exposure, where he is injured by the falling of such scaffold. Wilson v. Northwestern Mut. Acci. Asso. 53 Minn. 470.

And an insured person who, to escape the police who are seeking admittance to the room in which he is, attempts to let himself down from the window to the sidewalk, about 15 feet below, with a piece of seldedge about 6 inches wide torn from bed ticking cloth, which breaks and lets him fall, causing his death, voluntarily exposes himself to unnecessary danger so as to defeat a recovery upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury or death from such exposure. Shaffer v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 61 Ill. App. 112.

And a person engaged in seining for fish in a one of such classes,—that is, engaged in one of the more hazardous occupations. Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. § 412. A case involving the same principles which should control the disposition of this case is Stone v. United States Casualty Co. 34 N. J. L. 371, in which the court said: "The injuries excluded from the compensation of the policy are described as those that are 'received in any employment, or by any exposure, either more hazardous in itself or classified by the company as more hazardous.' These terms, literally rendered, required that the insured, to come within their effect, must, at the time of the injury, be in an employment more dangerous than his own. The language has respect to the employments, and not to individual acts. It is true that a certain degree of ambiguity is introduced by the expression 'other exposure,' but, looking at the body of the policy, we find these terms used in the sense of the risks arising from a business or occupation. By adhering to the literal signification of the terms employed, these indorsements, prefixed to the several classes of employments, lose all force as independent stipulations, and serve the simple purpose of graduating such employments for service to that provision of the policy which prohibits the assured from passing, at his own option, from one business to another. Understood in this view, they are properly a part of the classification, but if they are to be received as containing new terms of the contract, they are entirely out of place. If the company intended to say to the assured that if he did any act which did not strictly belong to his occupation, but was embraced more properly in some other business, and if thereby any harm to him accidentally resulted, that in such event he could claim nothing under his policy, it was easy for them to do so in plain language. Such a stipulation would obviously be one of a most important character, and we would expect to find it in the body of the instrument. A qualification of the agreement so restrictive of the rights of the party insured river which was very swift and full of sudden step-offs or holes and of swirls or eddies, who suddenly came to one of the step-offs or holes, and to a swirl or eddy, and, stepping into the hole where the water was very deep and being unable to swim, was drowned, thereby voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of an accident-insurance policy containing such a condition; and an answer in an action upon such a policy stating such facts makes a prima facie defense. Conboy v. Railway Officials & E. Acci. Asso. (Ind. App.) 43 N. E. 1017.

But an answer in an action on the policy in such case which falls to allege that the deceased knew of the dangers and voluntarily exposed himself thereto, is insufficient on demurrer. Conboy v. Railway Officials & E. Acci. Asso. 17 Ind. App. 62, Reversing 43 N. E. 1017, supra.

VI. Proof of, as a defense.

A condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability thereon in case of injury caused by voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, not inserted in the body of the policy but indorsed thereon, is not a condition precedent; it is a separate proviso qualifying the general words in the policy, and if it is such as to defeat an action on the policy, it is a matter of defense. Cronkrite v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 75 Wis. 116.

So, letters of the executive committee of an accident insurance company, and of the secretary, addressed to the beneficiary of an insured person who was killed, stating that his claim must be rejected on the ground that the testimony establishes that the deceased voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger which was the cause of his death, does not operate as a waiver of all other defenses, or as an estoppel against setting up contributory negligence or other violation of the essential conditions of the policy. Traders' & T. Acci. Co. v. Wagley, 45 U. S. App. 39, 74 Fed. Rep. 457, 20 C. C. A. 588.

And the fact that the assured was in an enfeebled physical condition may be taken into account in determining whether he was making an imprudent, wanton, and reckless exposure of himself within the meaning of a condition in an accident-insurance policy against liability in case of such exposure. Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 16 U. S. App. 290, 58 Fed. Rep. 945, 22 L. R. A. 620, 7 C. C. A. 588.

So, the burden of proof to establish voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger in an action upon 40 L. R. A.

an accident policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from such cause rests with the defendant. Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Iowa, 435, 28 L. R. A. 78; Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572; Anthony v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 162 Mass. 354, 26 L. R. A. 406; Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Asso. 161 Mass. 149; Wright v. Sun Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 U. C. C. P. 221.

And where the plaintiff in an action upon an accident insurance policy proves a prima facie claim within the policy, it rests with the defendant to show that the deceased voluntarily exposes himself to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a condition in the policy against liability for injury from such exposure, to show it as a defense. Neill v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 7 Ont. App. Rep. 573, 31 U. C. C. P. 394.

And the evidence of it should be clear and convincing. Wright v. Sun Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 U. C. C. P. 221.

And where a person is found dead in a cattle guard on a railroad, having been run over by a passing train, the cattle guard being at the side of a street and near the end of the railroad station platform which extends to and adjoined the street, death will not be deemed to be due to suicide or an exposure to obvious and unnecessary danger in an accident-insurance case, where there is no express evidence as to how he got into the cattle guard. Wright v. Sun Mut. L. Ins. Co. 29 U. C. C. P. 221.

But the presumption that the assured did not voluntarily put his life in jeopardy because of the known instinct which prompts everyone to preserve life, arising in an action upon an accident-insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, is overcome by the presumption, aided by the finding of the jury, that the assured was in his right mind and capable of controlling his action. Follis v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 94 Iowa, 435, 28 L. R. A. 78.

So, refusal of the court to charge, in an action upon an accident insurance policy conditioned against liability in case of injury from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, that if plaintiff's injuries happened in consequence of such exposure the verdict must be for the defendant, though correct in law in the abstract, is not reversible error, where the court charged that if the injuries were unintentional and did not happen in consequence of voluntary exposure the plaintiff could recover, otherwise not. Hess v. Van Auken, 11 Misc. 422.

ought not to be admitted unless the terms of this indorsement will bear no other rational interpretation. If the terms used are imperfect or ambiguous it is the fault of the defendants. It is their contract, and the construction of it must be most strongly against them." And it was held the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The case of Union Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Frohard, 134 Ill. 228, 10 L. R. A. 388, is an instructive case. The opinion states: "The principal contention of appellant is that the deceased was killed while engaged temporarily in an act or occupation classed as more hazardous than the one in which he was accepted, and that appellee is therefore entitled to recover only the amount provided for such hazardous risk and occupation. The contention of appellee is that there was no change of occupation within the meaning of the by-laws and certificate of insurance. The deceased was a hardware merchant. He did not follow the occupation of hunter for hire or profit. He was killed while engaged in the act of hunting as a recreation, and it does not appear that he had hunted with a gun on any occasion since the issuance of the policy, other than that upon which the accident occurred.

The language of . . . [the policy] is, 'Any member receiving an injury while engaged, temporarily or otherwise, in an occupation more hazardous than the one in which he was engaged when insured,' etc. 'Occupation' is defined by lexicographers to mean 'that which occupies or engages the time or attention; the principal business of one's life; vocation; employment; calling; trade.' The classification of hazards in . . . [the] by-laws is made upon the basis of occupations. Merchants and those following other vocations are placed in division 'A.' grain measurers and others in division 'B.' . . . The by-laws in question must receive a reasonable construction. It would be unreasonable and absurd to hold that the merchant who at one time measured a few bushels of grain, at another hung a few rolls of wall paper upon his own premises, at another drove a team of horses in a carriage or wagon, and at still another rowed a skiff for exercise or recreation became, within the true intent and meaning of these by-laws, at these several times a grain measurer, a paper hanger, a teamster, and a boatman, respectively. The word 'occupation,' as found in these by-laws, must be held to have reference to the vocation, profession, trade, or calling which the assured is engaged in for hire or for profit, and not as precluding him from the performance of acts and duties which are simply incidents connected with the daily life of men in any or all occupations. . . . It is urged, however, that the contract of insurance contains the words, 'in any act or occupation,' instead of the mere words, 'in another occupation,' found in the by-laws, and that the words, 'while engaged, temporarily or otherwise, in an act,' cannot be ignored, but that they have a definite and clear meaning, and must be given legal force and effect. It is to be noted that the words used in the contract are words selected and used by the corporation itself, and are therefore to be interpreted most strongly against it, or that, at all events, they are to be construed according to their common and literal meaning, in favor of the insured. . . . We have already seen that the classification of hazards made in the by-laws is predicated only upon occupations. There is not in the by-laws or in the record any classification of hazards in respect to acts, —in other words, there is no act which is classified as more hazardous or less hazardous than another, and no act which is classed as more hazardous than the occupation designated in the certificate of insurance issued to the deceased. The case, then, does not stand otherwise than it would if the word 'act' were not found in the contract." See North American L. & Acci. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 48, 8 Am. Rep. 212; Tucker v. Mut. Ben. Life Ins. Co. 50 Hun, 50. Upon the feature of the case just discussed, the court, correctly as we think, charged the jury as follows: "It is provided in the conditions printed in the policy or certificate of membership, among other things, 'Said policy shall be wholly void as to all accidents occurring when engaged in any profession, employment, or exposure not rated in the policy as a preferred occupation;' and it is claimed by the defendant that plaintiff was so engaged at the time he lost his hand. It is claimed by the plaintiff, however, that he was not using the saw at all for any purpose at the time he lost his hand, and had not been for some time prior thereto. The burden of proof to show that the plaintiff was using the saw at the time he lost his hand is upon the defendant, and if you find that the defendant has failed to prove its contention in this regard by a preponderance of evidence, then you will have no further occasion to consider this branch of the case. In considering the question as to whether the plaintiff was engaged in any employment, profession, or exposure not rated in the policy as a preferred occupation at the time he lost his hand, I charge you that engaging in an occupation on the part of the person insured against injury by accident does not mean a casual engaging such as most men do, or may do, or may resort to during the intervals of time when their usual employment does not engage them, but rather to engaging in such employment as a usual business; and, even though you find that the plaintiff incidentally engaged in sawing off blocks from boards at the time he lost his hand, you would not for that reason be required to find that he was injured while engaged in a profession, occupation, or exposure not rated in the policy as a preferred occupation. The language of this condition of the policy must meet with a reasonable construction at your hands. If the plaintiff was actually engaged in sawing blocks at the time he lost his hand, it will then be a question of fact for you to determine whether this act was one that pertained incidentally to his regular occupation, or whether it pertained to that more hazardous occupation not classed as preferred. With the burden of proof on this issue upon the defendant, and in determining this question you can and should take into consideration whether under the evidence the plaintiff was engaged, if you find he was engaged, at the time of the injury, in sawing blocks for his own use, or whether he was engaged in sawing blocks for someone else; and if you find from the evidence and circumstances surrounding the case, as shown to you here in the evidence, that the sawing off of these blocks was for his own use, and if you find that the plaintiff, sawing them off at the time he lost his hand, was incident to his ordinary occupation, you will be at liberty still to find for the plaintiff. Nearly every man, whatever his occupation in the ordinary affairs of life, occasionally does an act or thing in connection with his ordinary avocation which might also pertain to some other occupation. For instance, the man insured in this company as a bank cashier might, while engaged in chopping his own firewood, accidentally cut his foot with an ax, and still it would not necessarily follow that he had changed his occupation from a bank cashier to a woodchopper. This chopping his own wood could be an incident to his occupation as a bank cashier, although it might also be an incident to the occupation of woodchopping. The same rule would hold in regard to sawing off blocks from a board. A man insured as a bank cashier might, for his own use, desire or engage in sawing off blocks from a board, and still it would not necessarily follow that for that reason he had changed his occupation, or was engaged in an act pertaining to a profession, occupation, or exposure not classed in this policy as a preferred occupation. As I stated above, this is a question of fact for you to decide from all the evidence that has been introduced in the case. Of course, if you do not find from the evidence that the plaintiff was engaged in the act of sawing when he lost his hand, you will have no occasion to inquire further on this branch of the case. It is claimed by the plaintiff that he had quit sawing a few minutes before the accident. If you find from the evidence that this was the case, then it would be entirely immaterial whether some time before the accident he had been engaged in an act of sawing. That question becomes material only in case you find that he was actually engaged in operating the saw at the time he lost his hand." We think the case in principle is like the case of John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 34 Mich. 45.

This brings us to a consideration of the question whether, when the assured has shown the injury to be the result of an accident, the burden is then upon the defendant to show, by way of defense, that the accident was within the exceptions named in the certificate of insurance. We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572. In this case the court cited with approval from Piedmont & A. Life Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 92 U. S. 377, 23 L. ed. 610, as follows: "In an action upon a policy which contains many provisos and conditions, there is a practical wisdom, which courts have recognized, in compelling the insurance company to allege and prove the want of compliance with any particular proviso or condition on which it relies." Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. p. 707, and cases there cited. See John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 34 Mich. 44. It is urged that plaintiff cannot recover, because he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, and his injury was the result of his own negligence. In relation to this defense, the judge charged the jury, after calling their attention to the provisions contained in the certificate of insurance: "A member of this company must not be negligent; and if he receives injuries through his own carelessness or negligence, or rather contributory negligence, he could not recover under this policy because he agrees to use all due diligence for his personal safety and protection. In other words, he must be ordinarily diligent in trying to protect himself. He cannot be negligent, and run into danger, and then charge the company, if he does it deliberately. Negligence, in its legal sense, is no more or less than a failure to observe fully that degree of care, precaution, and diligence which the circumstances justly demand whereby an injury is occasioned. It means the doing of something which a person of ordinary care, prudence, and discretion would not do under the particular circumstances whereby an injury is occasioned. If you find in this case that there was negligence in such a degree as I have mentioned, negligence on the part of the plaintiff as I shall hereafter instruct you, he could not recover. If an injury occurred within either of the exceptions I have read to you, there could be no recovery, because the terms of the policy exclude such injuries. For, if the person is injured under this policy while voluntarily exposing himself to unnecessary danger, it would not be accidental. A condition of the certificate is to the effect that insurance under said policy or certificate shall not extend to or cover accidental injuries caused by the insured voluntarily exposing himself to unnecessary danger; and the defendant claims, under this condition and provision, the plaintiff cannot recover in this case. In order for the defendant to successfully defend under this condition, it must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff did voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger at the time of the loss of his hand. I charge you, as a matter of law, that he did not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger by going into Beckley & Austin's planing mill. The mere going into the planing mill could not be such an exposure; and whether, while in there, he exposed himself voluntarily to unnecessary danger is a question of fact for you to determine, and the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the plaintiff did so expose himself. Upon this question I charge you that the plaintiff had a right to go into the planing mill; and if, while in there, he conducted himself as a man of ordinary prudence and caution would conduct himself under like circumstances, then he cannot be said to have voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger; and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show that the plaintiff, while in the planing mill, did not conduct himself as a man of ordinary prudence and caution would or should conduct himself. It is claimed in this case by the defendant that the plaintiff purposely and intentionally sawed off his hand. If he intentionally and purposely sawed off his hand, of course he cannot recover in this case. This is, however, entirely a question of fact for you to determine; and I charge you also that on this proposition, the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the plaintiff did intentionally and purposely saw off his hand. It is for you to say whether, under the evidence in this case, the defendant has proved that question by a preponderance of the evidence. I also instruct you on the part of the defense: The plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of evidence that the injuries for which he seeks to recover were received from external, violent, and accidental means within the provision and outside of the exceptions of the policy upon which this suit is brought. He must satisfy you that he did not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger, and also that he was not injured while doing or performing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation classed by the defendant association as more hazardous an occupation than the occupation under which the contract sued upon was issued, plaintiff having been insured as cashier of the First National Bank. If the plaintiff fails to prove either one of these elements, it will be your duty to render a verdict for the defendant. If the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, your verdict must be for the defendant. By the words "doing or performing" anything pertaining to an occupation classed by the defendant association as more hazardous than the occupation under which the contract sued upon was issued, is meant any act naturally belonging to or done by a man engaged in that occupation. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to be engaged in the actual act of sawing. For the purposes of this case, any act naturally done by a man who acts as a sawyer, whether of preparation for the act of sawing or done after the act of sawing, is an act pertaining to the occupation of a sawyer. Again, if the injury to the plaintiff resulted in whole or in part from his own negligence, then he cannot recover. Again, if the plaintiff stood leaning against the table, and his foot slipped, so as to throw him or his arm upon the table, causing this injury, he was guilty of negligence, and cannot recover. The plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the injuries for which he seeks to recover were received from external, violent, and accidental means, within the provisions and outside of the exceptions of the policy upon which this suit is brought. That, you understand, would be the law governing this particular contract. This injury, if at all, must be external, it must be violent, and it must be by accident; and the plaintiff is bound to show that. If the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, of course your verdict must be for the defendant." He also charged the jury: "Now, gentlemen, one very important question that arises for your consideration in this case is, Was the injury received by Mr. Hess because he voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger? If you shall find in the affirmative of this proposition, that ends this case, and your verdict should be for the defendant, 'No cause for action.' And this question is for you to determine under all the evidence in the case. If you so find upon the affirmative of that proposition, then the defendant should prevail. Was this act of Mr. Hess a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger? To make him guilty of a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, 40 L. R. A.

he must intentionally have done some act which a reasonable, ordinary, and prudent person would pronounce dangerous. The undisputed evidence shows that he went into this planing mill on a matter of business between himself and the proprietor. The evidence also shows that other persons were at the time in the mill, and there is some evidence that it was not an unusual thing for persons having business there to go into that mill, and transact business with the proprietors or their servants, as the case might be. Now, it is true that Mr. Hess voluntarily went into this planing mill, but there is a clean distinction between a voluntary act and a voluntary exposure to danger. The approach to an unknown or unexpected danger does not make the act voluntary exposure thereto. The result of the act does not necessarily determine the motives which prompted the action. The act may be voluntary, yet the exposure may be involuntary. As I said before, these are matters for you to determine under all the circumstances surrounding this case, and in the light of the evidence as you find it."

So far as the question of the negligence of the plaintiff is involved, the charge was quite as favorable for the defendant as it was entitled to have it made. See Niblack Mut. Ben. Soc. pp. 704-707; Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572; Tucker v. Mutual Ben. Life Co. 50 Hun, 50; Providence L. Ins. & I. Co. v. Martin, 32 Md. 310; Fidelity & C. Co. v. Chambers, 93 Va. 138, 40 L. R. A. 432; Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Assn. 161 Mass. 149; Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Ostorn, 90 Ala. 201, 13 L. R. A. 267; Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157; Hess v. Van Auken, 11 Misc. 422; Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 18 U. S. App. 290, 58 Fed. Rep. 945, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620; May, Ins. § 580. It is urged that this charge is inconsistent with itself. So far as this criticism is well taken, it grows out of the fact that the circuit judge gave some of the requests to charge on the part of the defendants which were more favorable to it than the law would justify. So far as there was error in the charge as given, it was in the defendant's favor and it cannot complain. The error assigned in relation to the admission of testimony, we do not think it necessary to discuss, as we are satisfied it is not well taken.

Judgment is affirmed.

Long, Ch. J., and Montgomery and Hooker, JJ., concur.

Grant, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in that part of my Brother Moore's opinion wherein he approves the following charge of the court: "In considering the question as to whether the plaintiff was engaged in any employment, profession, or exposure not rated in the policy as a preferred occupation at the time he lost his hand, I charge you that engaging in an occupation on the part of the person insured against injury by accident does not mean a casual engaging such as most men do, or may resort to during the intervals of time when their usual employment does not engage them, but rather to engaging in such employment as a usual business; and, even though you find that the plaintiff incidentally engaged in sawing off blocks from boards at the time he lost his hand, you would not, for that reason, be required to find that he was injured while engaged in a profession, occupation, or exposure not rated in the policy as a preferred occupation. The language of this condition of the policy must meet with a reasonable construction at your hands. If the plaintiff was actually engaged in sawing blocks at the time he lost his hand, it will then be a question of fact for you to determine whether this act was one that pertained incidentally to his regular occupation, or whether it pertained to that more hazardous occupation not classed as preferred. With the burden of proof on this issue upon the defendant, and in determining this question you can and should take into consideration whether, under the evidence, the plaintiff was engaged, if you find he was engaged at the time of the injury in sawing blocks for his own use, or whether he was engaged in sawing blocks for someone else; and if you find from the evidence and circumstances surrounding the case, as shown to you here in the evidence that the sawing off of these blocks was for his own use, and if you find that the plaintiff, sawing them off at the time he lost his hand, was incident to his ordinary occupation, you will be at liberty still to find for the plaintiff. Nearly every man, whatever his occupation in the ordinary affairs of life, occasionally does an act or thing in connection with his ordinary avocation which might also pertain to some other occupation. For instance, the man insured in this company as a bank cashier might, while engaged in chopping his own firewood, accidentally cut his foot with an ax, and still it would not necessarily follow that he had changed his occupation from a bank cashier to a woodchopper. This chopping his own wood could be an incident to his occupation as a bank cashier, although it might also be an incident to the occupation of woodchopping. The same rule would hold in regard to sawing off blocks from a board. A man insured as a bank cashier might, for his own use, desire or engage in sawing off blocks from a board, and still it would not necessarily follow that for that reason he had changed his occupation, or was engaged in an act pertaining to a profession, occupation, or exposure not classed in this policy as a preferred occupation." The policy of insurance prohibited plaintiff from engaging "in any profession, employment, or exposure not herein rated as a preferred occupation."

I recognize the rule that such a policy is not avoided when the insured engages in those acts which are common to those engaged in the occupations referred to, or, in other words, are common to mankind. As the learned circuit judge said, the plaintiff might chop his own firewood, he might saw off blocks from a board with a wood or hand saw, but it is different when he goes into a dangerous place and assumes to run a dangerous machine with which he is unfamiliar. Plaintiff might, without avoiding his policy, go out in his row boat; but if he should deliberately undertake to shoot a dangerous rapid he would voluntarily expose himself in a manner not authorized by his policy. A man may enter his own manufactory, or that of another, to observe the engine or other machinery, without avoiding such a policy; but if he should undertake to manage the engine, either for pleasure or business, he would then become "engaged in an exposure" prohibited. Fishing, hunting, boating, woodchopping, and many other like acts which men usually do are not prohibited by these policies; but the rule cannot be extended to include every danger and risk to which the insured may see fit to expose himself. This case is parallel to Knapp v. Preferred Mut. Acci. Asso. 53 Hun, 84, wherein the plaintiff was attempting to operate a buzz saw. The court said: "The work of operating a buzz saw is proverbially dangerous, and is probably not less so when engaged in for amusement than when practised as a business or occupation." It appears to me contrary to reason to hold that an insured may, for amusement or temporary utility, expose himself to a risk far more dangerous to him than to one who is engaged in the business. The court should have instructed the jury that if this injury occurred while he was using the saw he could not recover. Counsel cites the case of This Plaintiff v. Van Auken, 11 Misc. 422,—another case growing out of this same accident. This point, however, was not involved in that case. The contrary request was preferred in that case, and refused. The ruling was sustained upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which to base it. That is not this case. There was evidence from which the jury might have found that plaintiff was injured while using the saw. For this error I think the case should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

UNITED STATES MUTUAL ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION of New York, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Keith M. HUBBELL.

(56 Ohio St. 516.)

1. Death caused by accidental drowning is death "through external, violent, and accidental means," within the meaning of the stipulation of an accident policy which gives indemnity against death by such means.

2. The term "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," in an accident policy does not embrace every exposure of the assured that might have been avoided by the exercise of due care on his part. It relates to dangers of a substantial character, of which the assured at the time had knowledge, and to which he purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the time to assume all the risks.

3. And where a traveling salesman, who holds an accident policy issued to him as such salesman, is confronted, while in pursuit of his business, with possible danger because of a slough in a public road on his regular line of travel, over which he has passed twice a year for thirteen years, and makes inquiry of other men living in the vicinity as to the existence of danger at the time, and receives opinions, some expressing fears of danger, and others to the contrary, and acting on his own judgment, formed from such opinions and from his previous knowledge, and from appearances at the time, in good faith concludes that there is no danger to his life in crossing, and attempts to cross, and is accidentally drowned, such attempt is not a "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," within the meaning of the policy.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Superior Court of Cincinnati, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

The action of the plaintiff below (defendant in error here), commenced in the superior court of Cincinnati, was upon two policies of accident insurance, for $5,000 each, issued by the association on the life of her husband, Wakeman Hubbell, whose death was alleged to have been caused by accidental drowning. The answer set up that a condition of each of the policies was that the "contract shall not extend to or cover voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," and "that the said Wakeman Hubbell met his death solely in consequence of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, on or about the 28th day of December, 1892, while attempting to cross a slough caused by backwater from the Tombigbee river, near Vienna, in the state of Alabama; that the said Wakeman Hubbell well knew the dangerous condition of said slough, and was warned of said danger by others, but persisted, notwithstanding such warnings and known danger, in an effort to make such crossing, and in such effort lost his life by drowning. That this defendant denies that such drowning was accidental, or due to any cause whatever other than such voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." The reply denied the new matter. In the charge to the jury, the judge, after stating the issues, at request of plaintiff, gave the following instructions: "(1) It is not disputed that the policies set forth in the petition were duly issued, and were in force at the date of the death of Mr. Hubbell. If, therefore, you find that he died by drowning at the time and place named in the petition, and that his death was accidental, and that the plaintiff was his wife, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the insurance, unless you should find that Mr. Hubbell voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger. (2) If the jury find that Mr. Hubbell was familiar with the ford at and before the date on which he lost his life, and that he judged from the appearance of the slough and the landmarks thereabout, and from such information as he had, that there was no danger to his life in crossing, and, in the exercise of his judgment, in good faith, though erroneous, undertook to cross, and lost his life thereby, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover. (3) Even if the jury should find that Mr. Hubbell had been warned by some person or persons that the ford was dangerous, he would not be bound by such warning, but was entitled to act upon the opinion of others, and upon his own knowledge and experience of the ford, if you find that he had such knowledge and experience." And at the request of defendant, the following: "(1) If the jury find that Mr. Hubbell, being aware of the danger to his life, attempted to cross the ford, it cannot be said that it was a necessity that he should cross at that time; and if, therefore, he voluntarily exposed himself to a known danger, the danger was, within the meaning of the policy, unnecessary. (2) If the jury find that there was another road to Vienna, and it was not necessary for Mr. Hubbell to cross the slough to reach Vienna, then it was unnecessary for him to expose himself to the danger of fording it. (3) The jury must find from the evidence that Wakeman Hubbell was accidentally drowned, or the plaintiff cannot recover. (4) The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show affirmatively that Wakeman Hubbell was accidentally drowned as alleged in the complaint, and, without such affirmative proof, plaintiff cannot recover. (5) The words 'voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger' mean an exposure willingly undertaken of a hazard which necessity does not require."

Exception was entered by defendant to each of the propositions given for plaintiff. A verdict for plaintiff having been returned, and judgment thereon rendered, which was affirmed by the circuit court, the association prosecutes error here to obtain a reversal of those judgments.

The court should have held, as a matter of law, in this case, that the provision of the policies exempting the company from liability for voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger had been violated, and should have granted defendant's motion to instruct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

This case is not to be determined by any of the general rules of law relating to negligence, but solely by a consideration of the express language of the contract.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence shows that the deceased was 40 L. R. A.

about sixty years of age, a traveling salesman by occupation, and at the time of the occurrence in good health, and in full possession of his mental faculties. He was drowned while crossing at a public ford through a slough caused by backwater from the Tombigbee river, near Vienna, in the state of Alabama, on the afternoon of December 27, 1892. The ford was a part of the state road lying between a cross roads settlement known as "Buntins" and Vienna, the places being about 9 miles apart. There was no other public road connecting the two points, although there was a byway through plantations around by a place called the "Lee Place," some 3¼ miles further, which way also led over a slough caused by like backwater, the condition of which was not then known. Hubbell had traveled the state road twice a year for thirteen years, and was more or less acquainted with the ford where the occurrence took place. He had stayed near Buntins the night of the 26th, and left that place about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 27th, in a buggy drawn by two horses hired of a liveryman near there, and driven by a colored man named Emmitt Cavett. It was understood in the neighborhood that a colored boy, having in charge some mules, a few days before, had to go around by the Lee place because the water at the ford was up so that fording was thought to be dangerous, and this information was conveyed to Hubbell, but the water at the ford was subject to rapid changes, and might be high at one time, and easily fordable in a few hours after. Hubbell made inquiries of a number of persons living in the vicinity of Buntins as to its condition. The evidence tends to show that opinions were expressed—some favorable and others unfavorable—with respect to the presence of danger there; but no one claimed to have knowledge, and the exact condition of the ford that afternoon was not known. There had been a little rain thereabouts within the few days past, but not much, and the roads were fairly good. It had rained above. Vienna was on Hubbell's regular route and was to be his next stopping place. He had upon his person some $700 or $800 in money collected within the two or three days previous. On the way to the ford, and a short distance from Buntins, the driver turned off the state road, intending to drive around by the Lee place. Hubbell stopped him, and a conference ensued, in which the driver said to Hubbell that one Wilder had told him that they could not go the direct road, because, he said, he had sent a boy over there, and he could not cross, and that they would have to go by the Lee place. Wilder was one of those of whom Hubbell had inquired, and who mentioned the circumstance of the boy with the mules, which was two days before. By direction of Hubbell, the driver against his own inclination, turned back, and they continued on the public road. The driver's objection, expressed later, was not that he feared bodily danger, but it was cold, and he feared getting wet. They presently reached the slough. The road dipped into the water. They stopped. It was 30 to 35 feet to the opposite slope. There was no current. Hubbell said to the driver that the water was not more than 3 or 4 feet deep, according to old signs setting out there, and that he always noticed them. "That's no water there to stop us, at all. You've been kicking all along about the slough being so bad, and I've been traveling here about thirteen or fourteen years. I never found this slough in as fine a fix as it is now, in all my traveling here, and you acknowledge yourself you never saw it in such good fix,—no water nor mud on the sides of the road,—and that is the reason I wanted to come this road instead of the road around. Public roads are always kept up. I have traveled here when the roads were three times as bad, and also have crossed this slough, and more water there than seems to be there now." They entered the water, and again stopped. Hubbell's valise was on the floor of the buggy, behind the seat. The driver asked if he had anything he didn't want to get wet. Hubbell replied: "Yes; I don't want my valise to get wet. Go ahead and get it, though I don't think the water will reach that high." The driver then got the valise and put it on the seat. They started across. Giving the words of the driver: "We made a few steps, when the horses commenced swimming. The water then struck us in the face, and he jumped and caught the lines. It seemed that he wanted to turn around. This pulled the horses out of the road when he pulled the lines, and I caught hold of the lines to try and get back in the road, and I was going on all right, and would have kept on all right if the buggy had not struck a stake driven into the ground. Then the buggy hung. [This stake was not seen by him nor was its presence known to him until the buggy struck it.] He asked me what I would do now. I told him I was going to cut the horses loose. Mr. Hubbell said: 'Let the horses alone, and save me and yourself. I will pay for the horses. I have paid for one pair, and I will pay for these. Save me. Can't you swim?' I told him, 'Yes.' He said, 'You swim out, and take me out on your back, for I can't swim a lick.' I told him, 'We were directed to come this way, and after I got here I would have turned around, but you said there was no danger, which I did not think there was myself, any further than just me getting wet.' 'I wish I had have let you turn around when you wanted to, but you heard Mr. Whitten say to me to keep right in the middle of the road. Don't you think noways hard of me, Emmitt. Do all you can to get me out of here.' I said I could not swim with him on my back. 'Well, what in the world am I going to do, Emmitt? 'I am freezing.' I said: 'Oh, no, you are not freezing; you are just a little cold. You have on better clothes than I have, and I lack a heap from freezing.' He then had hold of me, when we were talking. He said: 'I am afraid for you to leave me.' I said: 'How am I to get you out? I can't swim with you on my back.' He then asked: 'What am I going to do? How am I to get out?' He said: 'You must not leave me here at all.' I asked him: 'Then what are we going to do, just stay here and drown? We will freeze or drown unless I go off and get a boat. He then turned me loose, and told me to go and get a boat just as quick as I could. I left him then, and started to hunt for a boat. I stepped into the water and tried to swim, and I failed to swim myself. He was talking to me the whole time: 'Emmitt, you are drowning, and what will I do?' This he repeated time and again, and finally, at last, I got to the shore. He says: 'Emmitt, go ahead, old boy. Mr. Eiland told me you are all right, and I believe you are; and also Mrs. Dillard.' I was now at the shore, and used every effort to get a boat. Cavett's effort to get a boat in time proved unavailing. When help reached the scene, Hubbell was found out of the buggy, drowned.

This extended statement of the circumstances surrounding the case has been given because it seems to us that the facts, when fully stated, have the effect to much simplify the question of law involved. The construction of the clause "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" has not heretofore been presented to this court, although the question has been the subject of numerous adjudications in other jurisdictions. A citation of the authorities pro and con will be found in the full briefs of counsel, which, with the able discussion of the legal propositions there so fully given, permits a disposal of the case with more brevity than might otherwise be fitting. The policy covered, with the exception before stated, and others not important to be recited, death "through external, violent, and accidental means." It will not be doubted that the definition of "death by accidental means" given by the trial judge to the jury, viz., "Any event which takes place without the foresight or expectation of the person acted upon or affected by the event," was a proper definition, and there is no reasonable question that the facts proved warrant the conclusion by the triors that the assured came to his death by accidental means. And it is now settled by uniform adjudications that, although the drowning is the result of the action of water internally, yet the water is external, and that accidental death by drowning is produced "through external, violent, and accidental means," within the import of an accident policy. It being thus sufficiently shown by the evidence of plaintiff that the assured came to his death within the general terms of the policy, the burden rested upon the company to prove that a recovery was defeated by reason of the exception pleaded, viz., that death was the result of "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." It is clearly not enough, in such case, to show that the deceased was negligent. "Negligence," in its usual legal signification, has no place in measuring the liability of a company under an ordinary accident insurance policy, for its presence would overturn the primary theory of the contract. Accidents are the result, very largely, of the failure to observe due care; and yet the contract is intended as a remuneration in case of accident, and it is to procure the obligation of the company to pay this remuneration that the assured pays the premium. As stated by Allen, J., in Keene v. New England Mut. Acci. Assn. 161 Mass. 149, "By taking a policy of insurance against accidents, one naturally understands that he is to be indemnified against accidents resulting in whole or in part from his own inadvertence." A literal construction of the words "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" might embrace any exposure not actually required by the circumstances, or enforced by the superior will of others, as well as every danger attending such exposure that might have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care. But it must be borne in mind that language of exceptions in such policies, limiting the liability of the company, are to be construed favorably to the insured, and doubts and ambiguities resolved against the insurer. The words of the exception are not, therefore, to be literally interpreted. We think reason as well as the clear weight of authority leads to the conclusion that the words of the exception should be held to relate to dangers of a substantial character which the assured realized. The voluntary exposure requires an exercise of the will. The party must intentionally and consciously assume the risk. This necessarily involves knowledge that the danger exists, and that the risk will follow an attempt to brave it. The act done may be voluntary, but it cannot involve "voluntary exposure" unless the exposure is understood. Before the party can voluntarily expose himself to danger, he must know of its existence. See Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mitchell, 47 U. S. App. 260, 24 C. C. A. 305, 78 Fed. Rep. 754.

We are not called upon to pass on the weight of the evidence, but some features may with propriety be adverted to, and its general legal effect indicated. The policy describes Mr. Hubbell as engaged in the occupation of traveling salesman, and the contract was intended to cover risks incurred in the pursuit of that business. He was pursuing this line of business, and was on one of the usual routes of travel, when he met his death. In the line of duty to his employer, it was important that he make Vienna without unreasonable delay, and, unless the way involve substantial risks, it was his duty to reach that point that day. In this sense, it was necessary for him to make the trip then. He had not gone out of his way to seek perils, nor for any ulterior or outside purpose, but was on a public highway, and the only one leading to his destination. It is a significant circumstance, also, that no one whom he heard speak on the subject indicated that the road itself was at all out of repair. The water on it was still—not running—water, and hence it was not natural to anticipate any washing or impairment of the road. The presence of the backwater over it was the only source of probable danger to be considered. Fords are common in many sections of the country, especially in the newer portions. To refuse to cross them is to refuse to travel. There is no evidence in the record that the road itself was out of order, and it was the belief of the prudent driver, even, that, had the team been kept in the road, a safe crossing would have been made. If the crossing of the ford at that time was dangerous, and Hubbell was conscious of the danger and consciously assumed the risk, that was a voluntary exposure to it, and would prevent a recovery. But the attempt to cross because it was a ford was not necessarily and per se a dangerous act, and plaintiff showed a right to recover unless the circumstances were such as disclosed to Hubbell that the attempt to cross would be dangerous. This does not imply that he might recklessly, and in a foolhardy way, rush into probable danger, even though he was at the time pursuing his legitimate calling. But where different men, having substantially equal means of judging, would differ in opinion as to the safety of an act, it cannot be said to be foolhardy. The attempt to cross under the conditions which surrounded Hubbell would be largely a matter of temperament. A very timid person would be likely to shrink and refuse; a courageous one would be likely to go ahead. The former would see troops of lions in the way; the latter would think the way clear. That Hubbell thought the way free from substantial danger, his conduct abundantly attests. His panicky grasping of the lines when imminence of peril dawned upon him is not to be counted against him. Even under the rule of contributory negligence, his actions in the face of great peril, though unwise, would not condemn him. It is a recognized rule that where one is confronted with a sudden emergency the failure on his part to exercise the best judgment possible does not establish lack of care. We think that Hubbell's previous acquaintance with this ford and the landmarks thereabouts, and the information received from others at the time, justified him in exercising his own judgment; and if he did so in good faith, and in the belief that there was no danger to his life in crossing, however erroneously he judged, his act in attempting to cross was not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. Nor was the warning of others more than a circumstance to be considered. Such warning was but the expression of an opinion, and he had received opinions to the contrary. It was a part of the circumstances. It did not of itself forbid the exercise of personal judgment. The question, therefore, of whether the attempted crossing was or not a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, was for the jury, and not, as now contended by plaintiff in error, solely a question of law to be determined by the court. Indeed, counsel at the trial seem to have regarded it as a question for the jury, as is indicated by their first request to charge.

We find no error in the charge given at the request of plaintiff below. The record shows, as against the objections of plaintiff in error, that not only substantial but technical justice was done by the judgments of the superior and circuit courts, and they should not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Wallace P. COOK et al., Respts.,
v.

MINNEAPOLIS, ST. PAUL, & SAULT
STE. MARIE RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

*1. A fire started by defendant's negligence, after spreading one mile and a quarter to the northeast, near plaintiffs' property, met a fire having no responsible origin, coming from the northwest. After the union, fire swept on from the northwest to and into plaintiffs' property, causing its destruction. Either fire, if the other had not existed, would have reached the property and caused its destruction at the same time. Held:

(a) That the rule of liability in case of joint wrongdoers does not apply.

(b) That the independent fire from the northwest became a superseding cause, so that the destruction of the property could not, with reasonable certainty, be attributed in whole or in part to the fire having a responsible origin; that the chain of responsible causation was so broken by the fire from the northwest that the negligent fire, if it reached the property at all, was a remote, and not the proximate, cause of the loss.

2. After the fire swept everything of a combustible character clean, on both sides of defendant's right of way, plaintiffs' horses, that were running at large, went upon the railway track and were killed by a passing train without negligence on the part of the trainmen. The right of way had never been fenced as required by law. Held:

(a) That the rule of absolute liability, under the statute requiring railway companies to fence their tracks, applies only where the loss is produced, in whole or in part, by reason of the failure to fence.

(b) That in the circumstances stated the chain of causation reaching from the failure to fence was broken by the fire that would unquestionably have destroyed the fence if it had existed, so that the failure to fence cannot be said to have contributed to the entry of the horses upon the railway track.

3. The rules require the printing of a case by the appellant, and one brief on each side, on appeal to this court; they also permit a reply on each side. Costs as of right, for printing, are limited to such as are reasonably necessary or permitted under the rules.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marinette County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injuries caused by fire alleged to have been negligently set out by defendant, and for horses killed by it. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

The complaint sets forth four causes of action at law:

(1) For compensation for the destruction by a fire on the 20th day of May, 1893, of a lumber camp, several buildings, the camp equipment for a large number of men, some lumber, and a quantity of posts, poles, ties, slabs, and other personal property at Corliss, Wisconsin, of the alleged value of $58,820.79, upon the ground that a fire was started at a point on defendant's right of way about a mile and a quarter southwest of such property by the escape of cinders from one of defendant's engines to dry, combustible material negligently left on its right of way, which fire spread to such property and did the mischief complained of.

NOTE.—For liability for fires which spread to the property of others, see Brown v. Brooks (Wis.) 21 L. R. A. 255, and note; also Day v. H. C. Akeley 40 L. R. A.

(2) To recover for the loss of two horses of the value of $500, killed May 20, 1893, by one of defendant's engines on its right of way, where such horses strayed because defendant failed to fence such right of way as required by law.

(3) To recover compensation for the loss of one horse of the alleged value of $225, killed by one of defendant's engines on its right of way, on the 18th day of March, 1892; where it strayed because defendant failed to fence such right of way as required by law.

(4) To recover compensation for the loss of a cow of the alleged value of $50, killed the 27th day of August, 1893, by one of defendant's engines on its right of way, where it strayed because defendant failed to fence such right of way as required by law.

The judgment prayed for was $60,825, with costs.

The answer put in issue the origin of the fire alleged to have destroyed the property mentioned in the first cause of action, the value of such property, and also all other disputed matters covered by the verdict, hereinafter mentioned. On the trial facts were admitted entitling plaintiff to recover on the third and fourth causes of action, and there was no controversy upon the evidence but that the horses mentioned in the second cause of action were killed by one of defendant's engines as alleged, and that defendant failed to comply with the laws of this state in respect to fencing its right of way. The circumstances leading up to the entry of the horses upon the right of way were that, because of danger of the destruction of the stables where the horses were located on the 20th day of May, 1893, they were turned loose and driven toward a place of safety away from the defendant's track; that later in the day and after the fire had swept over the country up to the right of way, the horses returned to the vicinity of their stables and in doing so went upon the defendant's track and were killed by a passing engine, which was going very slowly on account of existing conditions in regard to smoke and recent burning.

As to the origin of the fire which destroyed the plaintiffs' property, there was evidence tending to show that, about 9 o'clock on the morning of the 20th of May, 1893, a fire was started in some way by a passing engine, in combustible material on the defendant's right of way near Boom Hill, a mile and quarter southwest of Corliss, where plaintiff's property was located; that the wind at that time was blowing from the south and southwest; that the fire spread for a time in a northerly and northeasterly direction, carried by the wind blowing from the south and southwest; that towards noon the wind changed to the west; that between twelve and one o'clock the wind changed so as to blow from a northwesterly direction, and increased to a gale; that at the time the fire was spreading north from Boom Hill as stated, there was a fire some distance northwest of plaintiff's property, which, as the wind changed to the west and northwest and increased to a gale, was carried southeasterly and easterly to the vicinity of such property, so as to meet the line of fire from the southwest before that reached said property; thereafter and about 1 o'clock, carried by the strong gale of wind aforesaid, fire swept down from the west and northwest, to and into said property, and caused the destruction complained of.

The court instructed the jury in substance, among other things, that if they found that the fire set by the defendant's engine was attributable to its negligence, and was the sole cause of the destruction of plaintiff's property, they were entitled to recover the entire damage they thereby sustained; that if the jury found that the negligence of the defendant contributed to produce the fire which caused the damage, and that there were other fires which also contributed to the loss, and they could figure out what amount of such damage resulted from the fire originated from such negligence, they might do so.

The jury rendered a special verdict in substance as follows:

- (1) The defendant's engine No. 403 set fire on its right of way at a place called Boom Hill, on the morning of May 20, 1898.
 - (2) The fire spread to plaintiff's cedar yard and camp at Corliss, and set fire to the same.
 - (3) There was another fire which came from the northwest at the same time and was driven into the plaintiff's yard and camps and set fire to the same.
 - (4) The fire which came from the northwest united with the fire set by defendant's engine before reaching the cedar yard.
 - (5) Defendant's engine was properly constructed and equipped to prevent the escape of sparks and cinders, and it was in good condition and properly managed.
 - (6) Defendant was guilty of negligence on account of the condition of its right of way where the fire started, which caused, or contributed to, the starting of the fire.
 - (7) There was a want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, which caused the fire to start on its right of way.
 - (8) Such want of ordinary care consisted in not keeping the right of way reasonably clear of combustible material.
 - (9) Plaintiff's damage, caused by the fire started by defendant's negligence, we assess at 50 per cent of their claim, less the insurance, amounting to $26,182 93.
- Defendant's counsel made several motions to correct the verdict and for judgment thereon; also a motion for judgment on the verdict and the evidence, dismissing the complaint as to the first cause of action, also as to the second cause of action; also a motion, in effect, for such judgment in its favor as the court might decide it was entitled to on the verdict; also for an order setting aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence and for other reasons, and granting a new trial. All of such motions were denied and due exceptions to the denials taken. Plaintiff's counsel moved on the verdict for such judgment as the court might decide they were entitled to. On such motion the court construed the verdict of the jury as apportioning the fire loss equally between the fire originated by the defendant and the fire that came from the northwest, which was of unknown origin, upon the theory that as the fires united and entered the yard together, only half of the loss was attributable to the negligence of the defendant. As a matter of law the court held that as defendant's negligence in starting the Boom Hill fire contributed to produce the loss, it was responsible for the entire damage, measured by the reasonable value of the property destroyed, and legal interest thereon from the date of the fire. Thereupon judgment was ordered for the entire value of the property destroyed, less the insurance received, such value on the verdict, under the charge, being computed by the court at $55,865.87, and the insurance $1,750. Judgment was also ordered for the value of the two horses mentioned in the second cause of action as found by the jury, with interest from the time they were killed, and for the undisputed value of the horse and cow mentioned in the third and fourth causes of action, with interest from the time they were killed, amounting in all to the sum of $59,584.86. Due exception was taken to the order. Judgment was entered in accordance with such order, from which this appeal was taken.

Messrs. Alfred H. Bright and Greene, Vroman, Fairchild, North, & Parker for appellant.

Messrs. Webster & Classon, for respondents:

An injury, caused by negligence, can only be recovered for when the facts are such that it can be inferred from them that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligent act, and might or ought to have been foreseen under all the circumstances. This inference is for the jury or the court, according to the case made.* If the facts presented have so uncertain a tendency as to leave the mind in doubt as to what should be inferred in respect to these particulars, the court can make no deductions; they must be made by the jury; but when the facts, found or undisputed, are of such a nature that clear conclusions can be drawn from them, it is no objection to the verdict that the jurors themselves have not drawn such conclusions and stated them as facts, for they may and should, in such cases, be made by the court.

Maitland v. Gilbert Paper Co. (Wis.) 73 N. W. 1124; Deisenrieter v. Kraus-Merkel Malt-ing Co. (Wis.) 72 N. W. 875; Atkinson v. Goodrich Tranap. Co. 60 Wis. 141, 50 Am. Rep. 352; Morrison v. Madison (Wis.) 71 N. W. 882.

It was unnecessary for the plaintiffs to put in proof as to or ask the court to submit questions to the jurors to have them determine the likelihood of the wind to blow, change its course and velocity, and spread fire over such a surface.

Donovan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 98 Wis. 373; Marrin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 79 Wis. 140, 11 L. R. A. 506.

Negligence of defendant in respect of its right of way at the point where its engine set the fire, being found, if it further appears by findings supported by sufficient evidence or by undisputed evidence, always equivalent to a special finding (Murphy v. Weil, 89 Wis. 150; Menominee River Sash & Door Co. v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 91 Wis. 447), (1) that the season was a dry one, (2) that the fire so set spread through the agency of the wind, a distance of 140 rods, in an unbroken course over the intervening ground—which presupposes the presence there of material to feed upon—to the barns and grain stacks of an adjoining owner,—such owner being guilty of no negligence,—all of the requirements of the doctrine of “proximate cause,” so far as facts are concerned, are satisfied; nothing remains but to make the proper inferences.

Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69; Austin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Wis. 496; Deiserrieter v. Kraus-Merkel Malting Co. (Wis) 72 N. W. 735.

It was for the court to infer that the injury done to the plaintiffs by defendant's negligence was the natural and probable consequence of such negligence, and might or ought to have been foreseen under the circumstances.

The verdict establishes that the northwest fire, and the fire due to defendant's negligence, joined, entered, and together destroyed the plaintiffs' yard and camps. Defendant's liability is the same as though the fire due to its negligence was the sole cause of the destruction of the property, whether the northwest fire was tortious or not, the reason of the rule that makes the tortfeasor, in such a case, liable, as though his wrongful act caused the entire damage being that the damages cannot be apportioned and the innocent loser shall not, because he cannot apportion them, be deprived of his remedy and the wrongdoer go free.

No wrongdoer ought to be allowed to apportion his own wrong; and as a loss has actually happened while his own wrongful act was in force and operation, he ought not to be permitted to set up as a defense that there was a more immediate cause of the loss. To entitle such a party to exemption, he must show, not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The foregoing brief statement is believed to present clearly the only questions necessary to be considered in determining this appeal. Numerous questions were suggested and errors assigned and exhaustively and ably discussed in the numerous briefs of eminent counsel who represent the parties in this court, most of which questions and alleged errors, in what is deemed to be an orderly consideration of the cause, are not necessarily reached in arriving at a final conclusion as to the rights of the parties. That will appear from what follows, and is the reason why such questions have not been considered or decided. No further proceedings in this case will involve them, and they are not of such a character that a decision of them would be important to trial courts in the future. This is said as to the greater part of the field covered by the case and briefs of counsel, not by way of criticism, for it is reasonable and commendable that, at least where so large a sum of money as the judgment here calls for is involved, all questions deemed by counsel in any way liable to affect the final result in any view of the case be suggested to the court; yet, where no trial follows the result here, the questions necessary to a determination of the appeal are all that it is profitable to discuss, unless others are of special importance as future guides.

The controlling question on the record, as we view it, is, What was the proper judgment on the first cause of action according to the undisputed facts and the facts found by the jury? The respondents stand on the findings of the jury as verities, and must prevail, if at all, on the case as thus determined. On the various motions made by the parties the court was called upon, if the verdict stood the test of the motion to set it aside as contrary to the evidence and for other reasons, to order judgment for appellant or respondents, according to the determination reached on the questions of law which it presented. Such questions were determined in respondents' favor. The principles they involved will clearly appear to be of far-reaching importance by a brief reference to the facts.

The jury found that the southwest fire, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, and to have originated about one mile and a quarter southwest of the property destroyed, did not reach such property so as to affect it as an independent agency; that another fire came from the northwest, and so united with the other that the identity of both as independent agencies was lost before any fire reached such property; that when the northwest fire reached the line of the southwest fire, so there was in fact but one fire, it swept on into the yard, and set plaintiff's property on fire and destroyed it. While the jury found that both fires caused the burning, as they said that but one fire entered the yard and that swept into it from the northwest, the direction from which the independent fire of unknown origin came, it is hard to perceive how the fact can be that the southwest fire, as an efficient agent, ever reached the scene of the destruction. But, looking at the verdict in the most favorable view for the respondents, and giving it the most favorable construction it will reasonably bear, it is to the effect that the damage was done solely by one fire; that such fire was made up of two independent fires which united before the property was reached, one for which defendant was responsible, and the other having no known responsible origin, so that if the responsible agent had not existed at all, the loss would have been the same in all respects, as to time, manner, and extent. We are strongly persuaded from the evidence, that the finding of the jury that the southwest fire, as an efficient agent, reached the plaintiff's property, either by union with the northwest fire or otherwise, is contrary to undisputed facts and all reasonable probabilities; but that is one of the questions not necessary to decide, if, taking the verdict as it stands, defendant is not liable.

That we correctly construe the verdict of the jury cannot be reasonably questioned. The trial judge, in a very elaborate opinion, delivered in disposing of the motion for judgment, gave it the same construction. He said: "Each fire reached the yard only as part of one common fire, and either in the absence of the other would have reached and fired the yard the same as the joint fire did. In that sense both reached the yard at the same time, although they united some distance away from it. Under the law governing the case it is immaterial how far away they united." And again: "We reach the conclusion that neither was the proximate cause of the injury, because the event would have occurred without either cause,—the other cause existed,—each was concededly a cause sufficient to produce the injury. The injury was produced by the concurrent action of both, but neither was the proximate cause, because the other, without it, would have produced the same result." The logic of the learned circuit judge, as to the proximate cause, would hardly bear the test of careful analysis. It may be to take his language literally would not convey the real meaning intended. Where two causes concur in producing a certain result, either of which would produce the same result regardless of the other, it is not an accurate statement of the situation to say that neither is the proximate cause of such result, using the term as we apprehend the learned judge did, as descriptive of the antecedent or producing cause and not in the strict legal sense of a cause referable to human agency on a line of responsible causation. In the mere physical sense of producing antecedent, it is more proper to say that, in the circumstances suggested, neither fire was the sole proximate cause of the loss.

From what has preceded it is apparent that the legal question presented to the trial court and decided in plaintiff's favor, in granting their motion for judgment and denying that of the defendant, is the following: Where two independent efficient causes unite and produce an injury to another, one of which is traceable to a responsible person whose negligence set it in motion, under such circumstances that he is chargeable with knowledge that it might cause an injury to another as a natural and probable result of his conduct, and the other cause is not traceable to any known responsible agent, each of which causes, however, without the concurrence of the other would produce the same injury, that is, so that the injury would happen at the same time and to the same extent regardless of the responsible agency, does a cause of action against such agency accrue to the injured person for his loss? It is believed that the solution of that question is governed by principles as old as the common law,—principles so long and firmly established, and universally recognized by all text-writers and courts, that were it not for the learned discussion of the subject by the trial court, leading up to the conclusion which eventuated in the judgment appealed from, and the later learned discussion by counsel in this court to support the conclusion thus reached, the decision here would be supported by a mere statement of the law without extended discussion or citation of authorities; but such circumstances seem to furnish excuse, at least, for a somewhat different course.

It seems to have been conceded on the trial below, at one stage of the proceedings, that unless the alleged negligent fire was the sole cause of the loss complained of, there could be no recovery therefor. Later, in the submission of the case to the jury, it appears to have been uncertain in the judicial mind, whether, if the defendant was liable at all, the liability extended to the entire loss, or only to a portion of it, on the theory that there might be an apportionment of the loss between the concurring causes. But it was finally determined that the person charged, known to have negligently originated one of the causes, was, as a matter of law, liable for the entire loss, though it would have happened just the same from the other efficient cause of unknown origin. To support that theory numerous cases are cited to the effect that when two or more concurring causes produce a loss, each having a responsible source, there is a joint and several liability for the entire loss. That is a doctrine too familiar to require more than to be stated. When the facts are such as to invoke its application, it extends to where each of the concurring causes contributes to produce the result and is necessary to it, and where each is sufficient of itself to produce the result, and would, in the given case, have that effect regardless of the other, and whether the concurrence of the causes be intentional or accidental. In Hayley v. Jump River Lumber Co. 81 Wis. 412, a person, on one theory of the case, was injured by negligence of a coemployee in loading a car, concurring with negligence of the defendant in leaving an obstruction in dangerous proximity to its track. Under such circumstances the court said that each was liable for the injury. In the same line is Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 60 Wis. 141, 50 Am. Rep. 352, where negligence of a mill owner in allowing shavings and sawdust to accumulate between his mill and a dock, concurred with negligence of the defendant in allowing sparks to be emitted from the smokestack of its boat, whereby a fire was set which spread to plaintiff's property and destroyed it. The court held the defendant liable, and Mr. Justice Taylor, who wrote the opinion, cited in support of it, among numerous authorities, the elementary rule laid down in Wharton on Negligence at § 144, in substance as follows: The fact that one responsible person contributes, either before the interposition of another or concurrently with such interposition, in producing the danger, is no defense as to either. If A negligently leaves certain articles in a particular place, and B negligently meddles with them, supposing B's negligence to be made out and he is a responsible party under the limitation expressed, he cannot set up A's prior negligence as a defense. Another example is Johnson v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 48 Minn 433, where a weak telephone pole was negligently left in place by the company. For a limited time an adjoining lotowner allowed the company to reinforce the ability of the pole to stand by guying it to his building with a wire. After a reasonable time had elapsed in which to replace the defective pole with a suitable one, the property owner cut the guy wire and the result was that the pole fell and injured the plaintiff. On one theory of the case the property owner and the telephone company were both negligent and without the concurring negligence the injury would not have happened. Under these circumstances the court said that each was liable for the whole loss. On another branch of the rule mentioned, as an example of numerous authorities that might be cited, is Gould v. Schermer, 101 Iowa, 582, where, on one theory of the case, defendant's negligence concurred with some other cause, not attributable to any responsible human agency, to produce the injury, and the court said, in effect, that the defendant's wrong, concurring with the other cause, and both operating proximately at the same time in producing the injury, makes the wrongdoer liable therefor. That was on the theory that the accident would not have occurred but for the negligent act. On another branch of the rule stated may be cited Slater v. Mersereau, 64 N. Y. 138, where there were two efficient proximate causes, each traceable to the negligence of a responsible party, either of which would have caused the entire injury regardless of the existence of the other, and the court, by Miller, J., said in substance: It is no defense for a person against whom negligence which causes damages is established, to prove that without fault on his part the same damage would have resulted from the negligent act of the other, but each is responsible for the entire damage. Further citation of authority along this line is deemed unnecessary. It will be easily observed that they refer, first, to cases where there was a concurrence of responsible human agencies, both of which were essential to the result; second, to cases where there was a concurrence of responsible human agencies, either of which would have effected the result regardless of the other; third, to cases where there was a concurrence of a responsible human agency and some other cause, and the former was an efficient and contributing cause and essential to the result. All the numerous cases cited by respondents' counsel, and those cited by the learned circuit judge, fall within one or the other of the situations mentioned, as, for example, McClellan v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 58 Minn. 104, much relied on to support the judgment, where the recovery was solely on the ground that, though there was proof of two fires, the finding of the jury was that the fire negligently originated by defendant was the one that reached the plaintiff's property and the sole cause of its destruction. In discussing an assignment of error on the charge given by the trial court, the judge who delivered the opinion said: "If two fires have been set, the origin of one or both of which can be traced to the negligence of a party or parties, either or both of these parties can be held responsible for resulting damages in case the fires mingle." That language was wholly unnecessary to a decision of the case, as no such situation was presented, and unless read in the light of well-understood legal principles and the circumstances which were evidently in the judicial mind, it would be very liable to mislead. In the view that the judge was speaking of the existence and concurrence of two fires, both attributable to the negligence of responsible agencies, so as to bring the case within the rule of joint wrongdoers, the language ceases to have any significance in support of the theory upon which this judgment was rendered and must stand, if at all. That the rule of joint tortfeasors was what the court referred to is plain from what was subsequently said by way of illustration, to the effect that, where the injury is the result of two concurrent causes, one party is not exempt from full liability although another is equally culpable. To say that the learned court intended to extend that rule to cases where the act of the wrongdoer concurs with some unknown cause not attributable to any responsible human agency, and causes damage, thereby rendering the legal consequences to the wrongdoer, the same as in the case of joint wrongdoers, whether this act was essential to the result or not would be a conclusion not warranted by a careful reading of the whole opinion, and inconsistent with the settled rule of law on the subject, recognized by that court and all others, as we shall see later.

What has been said above applies to Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700, 27 L. ed. 266; Stone v. Dickinson, 5 Allen, 29, 81 Am. Dec. 727, 7 Allen, 26; Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 46 Wis. 497, and the numerous other cases cited by respondents. All are cases of joint tortfeasors, or cases where the injury would not have happened but for the negligence complained of. They do not touch the real question we are called upon to decide. What is the situation of the wrongdoer where the injury would have taken place, necessarily, from another cause, at the same time and to the same extent, regardless of his conduct? That is the question presented. The discussion thus far has proceeded on a line merely to clearly bring out and recognize the well-known principles of law for which respondents contend and which ruled the trial court, and show their inapplicability to the facts found by the jury.

The law of negligence is laid on reasonable lines the same as any other branch of jurisprudence. The theory upon which compensation goes to an injured person from another whose negligence proximately caused the injury, is not that of punishment for the wrong, but that, in justice to such person, compensation is due for the damages caused to him by such negligence, so far as the same can be reasonably ascertained. Where the wrong of one person concurs with that of another under such circumstances that the injury would not result without the concurrence, it is reasonable to hold each liable for the entire loss, because the same would not have occurred if the negligence of either were absent. Notwithstanding the concurrence of the two causes, each, in a sense, under such circumstances, is the proximate cause of the loss, because there was responsible human causation back of it, without which the injury would not have happened. Again, where two causes, each attributable to the negligence of a responsible person, concur in producing an injury to another, either of which causes would produce it regardless of the other, it is reasonable to say there is a joint and several liability, because, whether the concurrence be intentional, actual or constructive, each wrongdoer, in effect, adopts the conduct of the coactor, and for the further reason that it is impossible to apportion the damage or to say that either perpetrated any distinct injury that can be separated from the whole. The whole loss must necessarily be considered and treated as an entirety. But where a cause set in motion by negligence, reaches to the result complained of in a line of responsible causation, and another cause, having no responsible origin, reaches it at the same time, so that what then takes place would happen as the effect of either cause, entirely regardless of the other, then the consequence cannot be said, with any degree of certainty, to relate to negligence as its antecedent; requisite intelligent causation necessary to legal liability is wanting, leaving no ground, in reason or in law, for it to rest upon. To further illustrate: If an injury accrues to a person from inability to control his team, where that is more than momentary, concurring with a defect in the highway, and the injury would not otherwise happen, the mere concurrence of negligence of the municipality responsible for the defect will not render the corporation liable, because the condition of the team is deemed to be the real producing cause. Jackson v. Bellevue, 80 Wis. 250; Houfe v. Fulton, 29 Wis. 296, 9 Am. Rep. 568; Schillinger v. Verona, 88 Wis. 317; Loberg v. Amherst, 87 Wis. 634; McFarlane v. Sullivan (decided at this term, and not yet officially reported) (Wis.) 74 N. W. 559; Scannal v. Cambridge, 163 Mass. 91; Babson v. Rockport, 101 Mass. 98; Palmer v. Andover, 2 Cush. 600. Applying the same doctrine in Campbell v. Stillwater, 32 Minn. 308, 50 Am. Rep. 567, the court held that where several acts or conditions of things concur, one of them a wrongful act or omission of some person, under such circumstances that such person might reasonably have anticipated such an injury as the natural and probable result of his act or omission, he is liable, provided the injury would not have occurred without it. The general rule, so recognized and applied by that court, was stated by the judge who wrote the opinion, thus: In cases of tort, the rule as to the proximate cause is, that where several acts or conditions of things produce an injury, if one is the wrongful act or omission of the defendant and it would not have occurred without his act, and he might reasonably have anticipated the result as the natural consequence of such act, that is the proximate cause of the result. That is quite inconsistent with the construction of the opinion of the same court in McClellan v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 58 Minn. 104, confidently pressed upon our attention, but accords with the construction which we have given to it and which was clearly what the court intended, though, as before indicated, language was used that might lead to a different conclusion unless viewed in the light of settled legal principles. It may safely be said that the rule stated in McClellan v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. applies in all cases where negligence of a party concurs with some other cause not traceable to a responsible source. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 441, and notes; 2 Thomp. Neg. 1085; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 33; Whitaker's Smith, Neg. § 44; Ring v. Cohoes, 77 N. Y. 83, 38 Am. Rep. 574; Ayres v. Hammondsport, 130 N. Y. 665; Ilfrey v. Sabine & E. T. R. Co. 76 Tex. 63; Union Street R. Co. v. Stone, 54 Kan. 83; Carterville v. Cook, 129 Ill. 152, 4 L. R. A. 721.

The logical deduction from the foregoing is that where an injury accrues to a person; by the concurrence of two causes, one traceable to another person under such circumstances as to render him liable as a wrongdoer, and the other not traceable to any responsible origin, but is of such efficient or superior force that it would produce the injury regardless of the responsible cause, there is no legal liability. No damage in such circumstances can be traced, with reasonable certainty, to the wrongdoing as a producing cause. The one traceable to the wrongdoer is superseded by the other cause or condition, which takes the place of it and becomes, in a physical sense, the proximate antecedent of what follows.

From the foregoing the conclusion is easily reached that the defendant in this case is not liable for the fire loss from the facts found by the jury. Its negligence, even if operating up to about the instant the fire entered the plaintiff's property, was there superseded by the independent northwest fire. Whether it can be said that after the two fires became one, the element attributable to the defendant continued, though its identity was lost in the combination and it was superseded by the fire that swept down upon the property from the northwest, it cannot be said that the result which followed would not have occurred but for such responsible element. On the contrary, it stands as a verity in the case that it would have occurred just the same, regardless of the negligent fire. It is proper to say that the learned counsel for the plaintiffs tried the case and asked its submission to the jury with a very clear conception of the legal principles governing it, in perfect accord with the conclusion which we have reached. They did not seek or expect to recover upon any other theory than that the destruction of plaintiffs' property was caused by the southwest fire, and that it would not otherwise have occurred at that time. One of the counsel said, in substance, during a colloquy between him and the court, when the questions for submission to the jury were being settled: We must stand or fall on the theory that the southwest fire spread to plaintiffs' property and destroyed it, and that no fire came from the northwest and reached the property; that if the whole loss can as well be attributed to the northwest fire as to the southwest fire, no assessment of damages can be made against the defendant. The whole difficulty arose when, after the verdict was rendered, the doctrine of the liability of joint wrongdoers, or of a wrongdoer when his act, concurring with some other cause or condition having no responsible origin, produces an injury which would not otherwise occur, was applied to the verdict unmindful, apparently, that such verdict did not present facts warranting such application, but on the contrary presented facts which brought the case within a different rule in the law of negligence.

There is left the claim for the two horses, killed on the day of the fire, by straying upon the right of way and being run down by one of defendant's engines. It is not claimed that there was any negligence of the employees in charge of the train that killed the horses. The right of recovery is based solely upon the fact that defendant failed to perform its duty in respect to fencing the right of way. The statute on the subject (Rev. Stat. § 1810) requires railroad corporations to fence their tracks, and provides that until such duty is performed, every such corporation, and every railroad corporation owning any such road, shall be liable for all damage done to cattle, horses, or other domestic animals, occasioned in any manner, in whole or in part, by the want of such fence. If the horses, therefore, entered upon the right of way because of the failure of the defendant to comply with the statute, then the rule of absolute liability attached. Quackenbush v. Wisconsin & M. R. Co. 62 Wis. 411. There is no finding on the question of whether the entry of the horses on the right of way is attributable in whole or in part to the failure to fence it. It must be conceded that, had there been a fence, it would necessarily have been destroyed by the fire that occurred two or three hours before the horses were killed. The evidence all points that way. They were turned out of their stable and left to run at large to preserve them from the fire that destroyed substantially everything of a combustible character on both sides of the railway track in the vicinity of the place where they entered upon the right of way.

The statute is in derogation of the common law. It is a penal statute. The validity of it rests wholly upon the police powers of the government and it should be construed with reasonable strictness so as not to go beyond its plain letter and spirit. That is a general rule of construction applicable to all statutes of its class. Stone v. Lannon, 6 Wis. 497; Coleman v. Hart, 37 Wis. 180; State v. Huck, 29 Wis. 202; Crumbly v. Bardon, 70 Wis. 385. Looking at the language in the light of such rule, it must be held that the circumstances of the horses going upon the track must have some causal connection with the failure to fence, not the mere nonexistence of a fence at the time of the entry, or there is no liability because of the failure to fence. If the failure to fence did not reach to such entry because of the intervention of some other cause or condition, the statutory rule of absolute liability does not apply. That has been held in cases where horses were abandoned under such circumstances that it was certain they would go upon the right of way where they would be liable to be killed. Cornoin v. New York & E. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 42; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Roade, 33 Kan. 640; Welty v. Indianapolis & V. R. Co. 105 Ind. 55. In such circumstances it was held that the owner of the horses consented to their destruction: that his conduct was not mere contributory negligence, which would not be a defense under the statute, but was the sole proximate cause. That the law-makers intended that the failure to fence should be at least a contributing cause to the entry of domestic animals upon the railway right of way in order to make the rule of absolute liability applicable, is quite clear, not only from their language, but from its being followed by a provision to the effect that in case of a failure to maintain a fence after once constructed, the liability for the killing of domestic animals shall not extend to losses accruing in part from contributory negligence of the persons claiming compensation therefor, or losses accruing from defects in the fence existing without negligence on the part of the railway corporation. Here there was a superseding overpowering cause that intervened between the failure of duty to fence and the entry of the horses upon the right of way, which took the place of the defendant's negligence, so that it cannot reasonably be said that such negligence, either in whole or in part, produced the loss complained of. In following the chain of causation from the death of the horses back, we find it tied at the antecedent end to the condition created by the fire. Over that we cannot pass to reach the neglect to fence, which, under the circumstances, became a remote cause. Our duty ends when we trace the chain back to what must stand as the real producing cause, causa proxima, et non remota spectatur. The rule clearly applies that if, between an injury and prior negligence, which might have produced it had the effect reached that far, there were a superseding cause, though not traceable to a responsible source, which, without the operation of the negligence contributing, produced the result complained of, the wrongdoer is not liable.

It follows necessarily from the preceding, that the trial court erred in holding that the defendant was liable for the loss of the two horses killed on the day of the fire. There was no contest as to the right to recover $360.94 under the third and fourth causes of action. Judgment in plaintiff's favor should have been limited to that, and costs taxed according to law. The judgment should have been otherwise in favor of the defendant. There is a statement in the motion papers indicating that there was an offer of judgment in the case made September 21, 1894. We are unable to find anything in the record indicating the nature of that offer, so as to determine how it legally affects the question of costs in the lower court; therefore no directions in regard to it can be made. The question of costs will therefore be left for such court to determine when the case again reaches it.

A careful examination of the printed case and briefs satisfies us that a strict compliance with the rules calls for much less printing than they contain. The case consists of 547 pages, much of which could have been omitted entirely, and the balance have been much condensed. There are four briefs, including a reply, consisting in the aggregate of a little less than 200 pages. The rules require but one brief, and permit, in addition, a reply. Where there are several counsel on the same side and they deem the interests of their client to require a division of labor, and separate briefs to be filed, that is permissible; but the fact remains that only one brief on a side is called for by the rules, though disbursements for others, permitted in proper cases, may be allowed. The allowance ordinarily, as a matter of right, however, goes only for one brief on a side and the permitted reply, as it is only necessary printing that is taxable against the losing party. Paine v. Trumbull, 33 Wis. 164. It is considered that 300 pages would have covered all printing that was reasonably necessary on this appeal, on the part of the appellant; therefore disbursements in this court on that account must be limited to that amount of printing.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $360.94, and in favor of the defendant as to the first and second causes of action in the complaint, costs in the lower court to be taxed and allowed according to law; costs for printing on this appeal to be taxed as indicated in the opinion.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

City of WAVERLY

v.

S. H. PAGE et al., Appts.

(.....Iowa.....)

The owner of a city lot will not be permitted to fill up a natural depression which has carried off the surface water from a large section of the city, although it is not technically a watercourse, if the city has undertaken to keep the outlet open, and its obstruction would be followed by serious injury to the city and the people interested in the territory drained.

(April 9, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Bremer County enjoining defendants from obstructing an alleged watercourse. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Injunctions by municipalities against nuisances in waters and watercourses.

I. In general.

II. Pollution and other matters affecting health.

Upon the question of municipal control over nuisances affecting waters and watercourses as highways in general, see note to Hagerstown v. Witmer (Md.) 89 L. R. A. 649, 681.

As to the general power of municipalities over nuisances in waters and watercourses in matters of health, safety, and personal comfort, see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 306, 324.

As to nuisances by the obstruction of navigation, and the jurisdiction of equity thereon, see note to South Carolina S. B. Co. v. South Carolina R. Co. (S. C.) 4 L. R. A. 209.

The main case, WAVERLY v. PAGE, was decided under § 726 of McClain's Code of Iowa, which gives the city council power over "all public highways, bridges, streets, alleys, public squares, and commons within the city," and to "cause the same to be kept open, and in repair, and free from nuisances." It was shown that the defendant's acts would dam up the water so as to cause an overflow of the city streets to the great injury of the numerous inhabitants. In this respect it would seem that the defendant's actions would constitute a nuisance restrainable in equity by injunction.

I. In general.

Without attempting to exhaust the authorities upon the question it may be stated that as a general rule obstructions to navigation are public nuisances, remedied at common law by indictment, or in equity by an information filed by the attorney general. Allen v. Monmouth County Chosen Freeholders, 13 N. J. Eq. 68, 73.

In a case where the commissioners at the instance of the attorney general sought to restrain the building of a dam across a river so as to obstruct the same, it was said that structures that interfere with the common right of navigation are a nuisance at common law, and the legislature has a right to make reasonable restraints for the protection of the public, and enforce them by reasonable penalties. Atty. Gen. v. Woods, 108 Mass. 436, 11 Am. Rep. 380.

So, in Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 12 Pet. 91, 9 L. ed. 1012, wherein equitable relief by way of injunction at the instance of the city was denied upon the ground of want of authority in the town, it was held that the Potomac river was a

Mr. G. W. Ruddick, for appellants:

The power of the city to divert surface water from its usual course and take it through streets and alleys is much greater than in case of watercourses.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 1038-1048.

The city by proper and reasonable grading of streets and alleys can generally with but moderate cost conduct surface water that comes into its limits to the natural outlet for it, so as to protect the public interest and private rights alike from injury. The case at bar is one especially strong, calling for the exercise of its powers as to surface water, by the city.

No legal right of any kind can be claimed jure natura in the flow of surface water; so that neither its retention, diversion, or repulsion is an actionable injury.

Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 656, 9 Am. Rep. 475.

It would be highly unreasonable and mis-navigable stream, or part of the jus publicum, and any obstruction to its navigation would, upon the most established principles, be a public nuisance.

If the rights of the plaintiff are doubtful, equity will not grant an injunction before the case is settled at law, although where the right is clear and the injury irreparable, it will grant the relief sought before the right is established at law. Atty. Gen. v. Hunter, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 12. In this case injunction was sought by the attorney general upon the relation of the citizens of Raleigh to restrain the defendant from so using his mill dam as to be injurious to the health of the town, and the injunction was made perpetual, although the defendant was prosecuted for the same offense. The facts showed that there had been a mistrial, and the indictment was still pending.

So, the extension of a wharf so as to occupy 3 feet out of a breadth of about 60 feet of a river valuable for navigation purposes, and the throwing of tiles into the bed of the same, is an obstruction thereof, and a nuisance restrainable by the municipal authorities under the powers vested in them by statute. Atty. Gen. v. Terry, L. R. 9 Ch. 423, 30 L. T. N. S. 215, 22 Week. Rep. 336.

In People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 138, 56 Am. Rep. 80, wherein it was sought to restrain a nuisance dangerous to habitation and the cultivation of land in cities, towns, and villages, and impairing navigation, it is stated that the remedy to prevent the erection of a purpresture and nuisance in a bay or navigable river is by injunction at the suit of the people by their attorney general, for the reason that the people of the state are interested in the question, and have the right to use all bays and navigable rivers within the state, and the attorney general may therefore maintain an action in the name of the people to prevent the obstruction of a public highway, which all the people have a right to travel, because all of them have an interest in such highway.

So, the fact that a power exists to compel the removal of an obstruction in a navigable stream after it has been created, does not prevent an application to the court to prohibit the erection of such obstruction before it is completed. People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 232, 233. In this case action was brought in the name of the people to restrain the defendant from erecting a pier in New York harbor, so as to obstruct or interfere with the use and enjoyment thereof for the purposes of commerce and navigation, thereby creating an encroachment and a nuisance, but it does not show chievous to attach the legal qualities of watercourses to ravines and hollows thus serving as conduits for mere occasional accumulations of surface water; and especially would it be so within the limits of large towns, cities, and villages, where the population is dense and the quantity of land owned or occupied by each individual or family very small. In such cases the universal understanding and practice are that owners of lots may fill them up or change their natural surface to suit their own tastes or convenience, and so as to obstruct or repel the surface water coming from the lots of others, without liability for injury.

Bentz v. Armstrong, 8 Watts & S. 40. 42 Am. Dec. 265; Livingston v. McDonald, 21 Iowa, 171, 89 Am. Dec. 568; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 37 Am. Rep. 241.

Suppose the plaintiff constructed ditches along the streets and alleys north of defendant's lots, so as to carry this surface water to the river along those streets. Could the defendants enjoin such diversion of the water from their lots? That will hardly be claimed to be the law. If this is a watercourse, then defendants have property right in the flow of the water that cannot be taken away.

In the case at bar, nearly all of the indications of a watercourse are lacking.

Howard v. Ingersoll, 13 How. 427, 14 L. ed. 209; Hinkle v. Avery, 88 Iowa, 52; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 314, 37 Am. Rep. 241. See Bowlsby v. Speer, 31 N. J. L. 351; Barnes v. Sabron, 10 Nev. 217; Parks v. Newburyport, 10 Gray, 28; Dickinson v. Worcester, 7 Allen, 19; Bates v. Smith, 100 Mass. 181; Borchgrentius v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 96 Wis. 448.

Messrs. A. M. Potter and Gibson & Dawson, for appellee:

A well-defined and natural course, through which surface water flows, is a watercourse.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 946, and note; that it was at the instance of the city of New York, although the defendant sought to justify his acts under authority derived from the city authorities.

In case of a grant or license to erect a dam, pier, dock, or wharf, or other obstruction in a navigable stream, the erection cannot be held a nuisance, without proof of the fact that the public damage and injury resulting from the obstruction greatly exceed the public benefits of the erection, and perhaps not even upon proof of an entire destruction of the jus publicum; but any obstruction placed in a public highway without right, a navigable river standing upon the same footing, will be a nuisance, and the courts will not inquire whether the advantage arising from the act complained of will compensate for all the injury and inconvenience which the public will suffer from it. People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 266, 287.

In that case the court upheld the general rule that, among other remedies for nuisances in the obstruction of public navigation, courts of equity will grant an injunction to prevent a threatened or attempted obstruction.

Equity has jurisdiction to restrain any purpresture, or unauthorized appropriation of the public property to private uses, which may amount to a public nuisance, or may injuriously affect or endanger the public interests; and where public officers, intrusted with the protection of such public interests, acting under the sanction of their official oaths, believe the intended encroachment will prove injurious to the navigation of canals, private persons should not be permitted to interfere with the waters or embankments of the canals contrary to law, upon a mere opinion, although under the sanction of an oath, that the intended trespass upon the public rights would not be an injury to the public. Atty. Gen. v. Cohoes Co. 6 Paige, 133, 135, 29 Am. Dec. 755. In this case the suit was brought upon information sworn to by the canal superintendent in the town or city intrusted with the protection of the public interest therein.

As showing the extent of the jurisdiction of the court in this kind of nuisance, it was said in People v. St. Louis, 10 Ill. 351, 374, 375, 48 Am. Dec. 339, wherein the people sought to restrain the obstruction of the Mississippi river as a public nuisance, that the chancellor has no discretion to refuse the injunction, but was bound to grant it, as a nuisance could never be abated, and the public rights to that channel could never afterwards be enjoyed, as the nuisance there threatened was of a permanent character, and the court acting upon the principle that any act of the character indicated in that action, by which the public might be put to great expense and exposed to much injury, was re-strainable by injunction. While the above case does not expressly decide the question of municipal power in such cases, yet it cites and relies upon cases wherein the courts have upheld the power of a municipality to abate nuisances.

Yet a wharf is not of itself necessarily such a nuisance that equity will enjoin its erection, and it does not import, per se, irreparable mischief. Laughlin v. Lamasco City, 6 Ind. 223, 227, wherein the court refused the city relief as the wharf was not a nuisance per se, and damages would afford just compensation.

So, the injury to flow from a wharf does not readily appear, at least it is not of that permanent injurious character contemplated by the authorities, and may, in many cases, be compensated by damages which will check its continuance in an injurious form. Laughlin v. Lamasco City, 6 Ind. 223, 227.

In Fresno v. Fresno Canal Irrig. Co. 98 Cal. 179, 184, the city brought action to obtain a decree abating as a nuisance the defendant's ditch or canal which ran through certain parts of the city. The court held that, if the nuisance consisted merely in the manner and form in which the canal was conducted and managed, it was a nuisance which could be remedied without a total destruction of the property, and that therefore the company should be enjoined from conducting the canal in such a manner as to make it a nuisance, but that a total destruction of the property could not be decreed.

In Atty. Gen. v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 133 Mass. 361, 363, the defendant had sunk wells for the purpose of obtaining a supply of water, and its acts in so doing were ultra vires and illegal, and not only impaired the rights of the public in the use of one of the great ponds of the commonwealth, which belonged to the public for the purpose of fishing and boating, but also created a nuisance by lowering the pond and exposing upon its shores slime, mud, and offensive vegetation, very detrimental to the public health, and the court restrained such action. In this case the court looked upon the information filed by the attorney general as the appropriate remedy, although it does not appear that the same was taken on behalf of the city, yet the public health of the same was affected by the nuisance.

Mass. Stat. 1866, chap. 149, creates a board of harbor commissioners, and confers upon them the general care and supervision of the harbors and tide waters, and the flats and lands flowed by such waters. By § 5 all erections and works made without authority from the legislature, or in any manner not sanctioned by the commissioners, when

Where surface water habitually flows off over a fixed and determinate course having reasonable limits as to width so as to be uniformly discharged at a definite point, though without having worn out a channel having definite and well-marked banks, the line of flow is a watercourse.

Lambert v. Alcorn, 144 Ill. 313, 21 L. R. A. 611.

Where surface water has a fixed and certain course as a swale, though it may be narrow or broad, its flow cannot be interrupted to the injury of an adjoining proprietor.

Wharton v. Stevens, 84 Iowa, 107, 15 L. R. A. 630.

Where a stream flowing between well-defined banks reaches level ground and spreads itself out over a wide space without cutting their direction is required, within tide waters flowing into or through any harbor, are considered public nuisances, and liable to indictment as such. Power is also given to the commissioners to order suits on behalf of the commonwealth to prevent, or stop, by injunction or otherwise, any such erection or other nuisance in such waters, and the attorney general and district attorney are directed to commence such suits.

In Atty. Gen. v. Woods, 108 Mass. 436, information was filed at the instance of the harbor commissioners to restrain the building of a dam across a river, and it was contended by the defendant that no remedy in equity existed, as there was a full, adequate, and complete remedy at law, and that the injunction should not therefore issue unless it appeared that irreparable injury was to be prevented. The court held that the statute gave special remedies, and designated the cases to which they should be applied, and that the remedy by injunction was cumulative, and the purpose of the statute was not only to punish all encroachments upon that portion of the public domain, but also to furnish means for their prevention and removal, and therefore the obstruction in the navigation of the river by means of the dam, being such as to create a nuisance of a serious character within the tidal waters, the court directed the injunction.

So, relief was granted in Thompson v. Paterson & H. R. Co., 9 N. J. Eq. 526, on behalf of certain named parties and other inhabitants of a township, and it was contended that the position in which the defendants intended to erect the piers and draw of a proposed permanent railroad bridge on a line of increasing travel was not one which would do the least possible injury to navigation. The evidence showed that the defendant's draws were to be placed in an unusual and unnatural position, and that witnesses, who were best able to form an opinion, had testified as to the effect of such proposed erection. The court granted a temporary injunction restraining the defendants from erecting such piers and draws in the proposed position, until such time as the proper position for their erection could be determined.

Where the affidavit showed that the deposits of mash impeded the free use of the river for purposes of navigation by diminishing the depth of the water so that vessels of a size that were accustomed to navigate that portion of the river could no longer do so, and a continuance of such deposit diminished the depth of the water and also the size of the vessels capable of navigating, so much so that in time not even a row boat could navigate it,—it was held that such a deposit made without authority was a public nuisance restrainable by—

The rule of either the common law or the civil law does not control in this state as to surface water.

Willitts v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 88 Iowa, 284, 21 L. R. A. 608; Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 283, 72 Am. Dec. 895; Lambert v. Alcorn, 144 Ill. 313, 21 L. R. A. 611.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is a city of the second class, organized and existing under the laws of this state. It includes territory on both sides of the Cedar river, and is intersected from east to west by an important street, known as "Bre-junction at the instance of the municipal authorities. New York v. Baumberger, 7 Robt. 219, 220.

And where a pier in course of erection extended far outside of the bulk-head line as established, and at its southeasterly corner and on a line with the end of the pier an arm was constructed and extended some distance for greater convenience in securing boats running to and from the landing, and this pier subsequently became the property of a railroad company, and later the defendant company acquired a title to more land covered by the original grant and commenced the erection of a pier immediately adjoining the pier of the railroad company without leaving any intervening water space, and extended the same far beyond into the waters of the bay and outside of the bulk-head line established by N. Y. act 1857, and at the end of such structure, and outside of the bulk-head line and the line of the original grant, they erected a club house which was connected with the pier proper by a trestle bridge, which structure was nearly completed,—it was held that an action was properly brought to enjoin the completion of the structure, and compel its removal, as such erection was a clear violation of the act of 1857, which prohibited the erection of piers without leaving an intervening space of 100 feet. People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. 68 N. Y. 71, 80, Affirming, 7 Hun, 106. In this case, as in People v. Vanderbilt, 38 Barb. 236, 237, the attorney general sued in the name of the people.

In New York v. Cunard S. S. Co. 61 Hun, 346, action was brought by the city to secure the removal of a shed erected upon piles and used as a warehouse for goods shipped upon steamers upon the side of a new pier extending some distance from a certain street into the Hudson river, with one end upon a new bulk-head line forming a westerly line of the street, 250 feet west of the easterly line of the street, the shed extending 50 feet westerly from the bulk-head along the pier, and in a northerly direction about 90 feet, occupying one half of a certain space between certain piers. The right to maintain the shed was derived under the resolution of the dock department of the city of New York. The court upheld the action of the municipal authorities, restrained the maintenance of such shed, and ordered it to be removed, the resolution of the dock commissioners giving no power to erect the shed, which was unauthorized and contrary to the New York Laws of 1871, chap. 574, § 6.

So, in Dayton v. Roberts, 1 Ohio Dec. 386, the court granted an injunction at the instance of the corporate authorities to prevent the making of a fill in a certain river, thereby injuring levees owned mer Avenue." Through the central portion of that part of the territory west of the river extends a watercourse known as "Dry Run." It crosses Bremer avenue near, and east of, Aspen street, which extends from north to south, intersecting the avenue. The run has two branches, which drain about 1,500 acres of land, and unite within the city limits at a considerable distance northwest of the crossing at the avenue. Penn street is parallel to, and about 140 rods north of, it; and between the two, extending from east to west, are five other streets. The run crosses Penn street, and the distance from that crossing along the run to the river into which it empties is 366 rods, and the fall is about 24 feet. The general course of the run from Penn street to the river, although irregular, is southward near Aspen street to the avenue; thence in a southeasterly direction to the river. From Penn street southward for a distance of 43 rods the watercourse is discernible, but does not have well-defined banks. The banks are more prominent further south, and from a point 42 rods north of the avenue to the avenue are reasonably well defined, although not sufficiently abrupt to prevent the cultivation of the ground by ordinary methods, and the running of a mowing machine over it. One half of the bed of the run from the avenue to Penn street has been cultivated, and the larger part of that which has not been cultivated is covered with sod. The banks south of the avenue are well defined, and gradually increase in height towards the river. The watercourse for a distance of 50 rods from the river is from 8 to 10 rods wide, and its banks are from 10 to 15 feet in height. The defendants own several lots at the intersection of the avenue and Aspen street, which are bounded on the south by the avenue, and on the west by Aspen street, and over which the watercourse extends. The lots are 110 feet wide from the east to west, and 132 feet long; and the defendants have commenced to raise their surface about 2½ feet, in order to erect thereon a dwelling house, and, if permitted to do so, will fill the watercourse. The effect of that would be to dam by such corporation, and interfering with the natural flow of water in the stream.

Again, in Frankford v. Lennig, 2 Phila. 408, 408, 409, an injunction was granted, at the instance of the borough authorities, to enjoin the defendants from erecting a wharf encroaching upon the channel of a certain creek as a nuisance, although the defendants had a license from the port wardens, as the wharf in question extended into the bed of the river below low-water mark, and was clearly a purpresture, an encroachment, and intrusion on the soil belonging to the state; or an effort to appropriate to defendant's individual advantage a benefit common to the entire community, which, as a nuisance, the wardens had no power to license.

And in Havenswood v. Fleming, 22 W. Va. 52, 46 Am. Rep. 435, an injunction was granted, at the instance of the city authorities, enjoining the defendant from erecting a wharf opposite to his lot without the consent of the corporate authorities, as the only remedy which would give full and adequate relief in such case.

Where the bill seeking to restrain the construction of a runway as a public nuisance shows a prima facie case, not only of the right of the city to bring the suit, but also for granting the relief sought, a demurrer to such bill should be overruled, and the defendant should answer the bill distinctly averring what he proposes to do, especially when the averment is accompanied by a general charge or statement that the driving of the piles in the bed of the river, and the construction of the runway, will not only cause a diversion of the river from its natural course, but will throw it off its natural location from along the river bank to the proposed runway, and create in front of the city's wharf a deposit of mud and sediment sufficient to render it impossible for boats and vessels engaged in navigation to approach or land at such wharf, as such allegation is sufficiently certain, though a general statement of the essential ultimate facts upon which the complainant city rests its right; and in such a case it is not necessary to aver all the minute circumstances which may be proved in support of such general statement. St. Louis v. Knapp Co. 104 U. S. 658, 660, 28 L. ed. 883.

In the following cases, however, the court refused the relief sought:

Where the city authorities sought to restrain the use of property for any other purpose than a wharf, by the erection of buildings extending into a navigable stream, upon the ground that the space so covered might be needed in the construction, operation, and maintenance of a bridge, that without such space it would become necessary, in order to afford proper means of communication, to impede and interfere with the navigation of the river, it was held that, as there was no specific prayer that the encroachment upon the street might be abated as a nuisance, or any argument showing that, under the general prayer, such abatement might be decreed, the court dismissed the bill and refused to consider that question. Chicago v. Reed, 27 Ill. App. 482, 485, 493.

So, where a wharf encroached in some measure upon the public thoroughfare and river, although it was not very probable that it would interfere with or incommode the public, but such wharf was not a nuisance in itself, or likely to become so, and the injuries feared as impending were according to the affidavits in support more fanciful than real, it was held to be a case in which equity would refuse to act without an adjudication at law. Laughlin v. Lamasco City, 6 Ind. 228, 227.

In Atty. Gen. v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 3 N. J. Eq. 136, information was filed by the attorney general, at the relation of certain named parties, for and on behalf of themselves and the rest of the property owners in the town, to compel the abatement of the erection of a railroad bridge across a river as a public nuisance. The court denied the injunction, upon the ground that the relator's proper course was to proceed by indictment at common law, as the fact whether it was a nuisance or not was proper to be tried by a jury whether the proceedings were in that court or elsewhere, the court of law being a more appropriate tribunal for all matters of that character.

So, the court refused an injunction in State, Board of Health, v. Bergen County Chosen Freeholders, 46 N. J. Eq. 173, upon the ground that the nuisance was not sufficiently shown to be a public, as distinguished from a private, one, the mere fact that such nuisance had a tendency in that direction not being sufficient to justify the court in granting such relief. In this case the nuisance complained of was the use of the river as a sewer, thereby rendering its water foul, noxious, and hazardous to public health.

Again, relief was refused in People v. Horton, 64 N. Y. 610, affirming 5 Hun, 518, where the injunction was sought at the instance of the state to restrain the defendants floating an elevator upon the ship canal for the purpose of transferring grain from water which, if unobstructed, would flow over the bed of the run, and turn it onto lots and streets in the vicinity; and, if the street and other lots were so graded as to prevent that effect, a dam would be formed, which in times of high water would cause the overflow of a large portion of the city north of the avenue, to the great injury of the numerous inhabitants of that territory.

The plaintiff contends that Dry run is a watercourse, of which it has control, and which it has controlled for many years; that the watercourse should have been kept open, for the purpose of draining the territory through which it extends; and that, should it be obstructed permanently, great and irreparable injury would result to the city, as well as to its inhabitants. The defendants admit that there is a slight depression in that part of the city designated as "Dry Run," but deny that it ever had any defined channel or banks as a watercourse, or that any water ever flows through it, excepting the surface water from unusual rainfalls, or other extraordinary causes, and that in such cases the flow is for but a few hours at a time; and they insist that they have a right to fill the depression in their lots in the manner described. They contend that the water which would flow north of the avenue could readily be turned along the streets and alleys eastward into the river, and that it is the right and the duty of the plaintiff to make provision for disposing of water from the territory specified in that manner. There is not a constant flow of water through the watercourse in question. On the contrary, it is dry, except in case of melting snow or of unusually heavy rainfall; and on such occasions water flows into it but a few days at a time. It sometimes happens that when an exceptionally large quantity of water has fallen the watercourse is not sufficiently large to carry off to the river the water as fast as it accumulates, and that lots and streets in its vicinity are overflowed. The plaintiff has for many years assumed control of the run. It has provided artificial channels at some places and has erected numerous bridges over it, at vessels upon the lakes to the canal boats. In this case, however, it does not appear that the municipalities in any way participated in the proceedings.

Again, a mill dam, which, if a nuisance at all, has become so by the gradual growth of a city around it, will not be abated in equity at the instance of the public authorities as a nuisance, where the fact that it is a nuisance has not been established at law. New Castle v. Raney, 180 Pa. 546, 561, 6 L. R. A. 737.

In that case the city sought by bill to enjoin and restrain and abate as a nuisance the defendant's dam across a certain creek within the limits of the city which had been in existence for over fifty years, and had been used for milling and manufacturing purposes, but the dam in question was not proved to be a nuisance per se. The court refused the relief as, if it was a nuisance at all, it had become so only by the gradual growth of the city around it, and by the emptying of the cesspools into it.

In Scranton City v. Scranton Steel Co. 154 Pa. 171, the city filed a bill in equity to restrain encroachments on, and to remove material deposited in, the channel of the river, thereby partially filling up the channel, greatly narrowing it, causing the water, even in the case of an ordinary rise of the river, to back up and overflow its banks and flood the streets of the city, thereby greatly damaging and injuring public and private property, and endangering the safety of the people residing near the river for a considerable distance above the works. It was alleged that if such encroachments were allowed, the channel would not be sufficient to carry off the water naturally flowing therein, and great and irreparable injury would be done to public and private property. The court refused the injunction as the evidence that the filling in done by the defendant caused injury to the streets was very slight and unsatisfactory, the preponderance of testimony showing that, instead of tending to throw the water upon the streets, it tended to keep it off, and that the real damage was caused, with a reasonable degree of certainty, by the erection of piers by a railroad company.

In Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 12 Pet. 91, 99, 9 L. ed. 1012, 1015, a bill was filed on behalf of the city and the citizens at large, to restrain the defendants from constructing an aqueduct over the Potomac river within the corporate limits immediately above and west of the principal public and private wharves of the town. It was alleged that the river was a public navigable highway, the free use of which was secured to the people residing on its borders, or interested in its navigation; that the town derived its chief support and prosperity from the trade of the river, and that large sums of money had been expended at the wharf of the town, deepening the water, etc.; that the defendants had constructed a massive stone pier, and were about to construct others; that by the use of clay and earth thrown in to close up certain dams, used by the defendant in the construction of the piers, the harbor was injured and the depth of the water diminished, and serious future injury was apprehended from the causes. The court denied the relief upon the ground that it was not shown that the city had any power or authority given to them by their charter to take care of, protect, and vindicate the rights of the citizens of the town in the enjoyment of their property, or in removing or preventing any annoyance to it, and that such power did not attach to them in their corporate character, upon any principle of the law in relation to corporations, and that the complainants must show that they were the owners of property liable to be affected by the nuisance, and so affected as to suffer special damage, that the right to proceed in equity as a corporate authority, vested in them by reason of their duty to take care and protect the interests of the citizens, was not of itself sufficient, and the difficulty was not overcome by associating with them the citizens as persons on whose behalf they sued, and, that the nuisance being of a public character, the ordinary and regular proceeding was by way of indictment or information at law or by proceedings in equity by an information filed in the name of the attorney general.

By the English public health act, passed in the reign of Henry VIII., the corporation of the city of Exeter were empowered to remove obstructions to the navigation of the river, paying compensation to the owners of the soil where the obstructions were situated. It was held that such act did not confer the conservancy of the river on the corporation, neither did it entitle the corporation to file a bill in equity to restrain the erection of a pier in a river, nor did it confer any right or privilege on the corporation within the meaning of § 41 of the general pier and harbor act of 1861, so as to prevent the erection of a pier in the river without their consent being obtained. Exeter v. Earl Devon, L. R. 10 Eq. 232, 18 Week. Rep. 879.

a great expense. In the avenue south of the lots of the defendant are two foot bridges and one wagon bridge. A walled channel has been made, which commences at the avenue, and extends southward. It is 16 feet wide, and 4 feet deep, and is of about sufficient capacity to carry off the water which flows from north of the avenue in times of ordinary high water.

There are authorities which hold that depressions in the surface of the earth, through which water flows only in times of high water, are not watercourses, within the meaning of the law which forbids the obstruction of watercourses, and within the rule of such authorities, Dry run, north of Bremer avenue, is not a watercourse, and any proprietor might lawfully obstruct the flow of water therein over his premises. See Hoyt v. Hudson, 27 Wis. 656, 9 Am. Rep. 473; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 37 Am. Rep. 241.

II. Pollution and other matters affecting health.

In North Point Consol. Irrig. Co. v. Utah & S. L. Canal Co. (Utah) 52 Pac. 188, an injunction was granted to restrain defendants from discharging befouled water into a certain canal. The Compiled Laws of the territory, § 4566, Laws of 1888, made the fouling of the waters of a canal, from which a number of persons, more than three, obtained water for irrigation, culinary, and other domestic purposes, a public nuisance, as the fouling of such water made it unfit for use.

In Brookline v. Mackintosh, 133 Mass. 215, the city sought an injunction to restrain defendant from corrupting and polluting the waters of a river from which plaintiff took water for the domestic purposes of its inhabitants, but the court refused to enjoin the defendant's business, as it was not shown that the alleged pollution made any perceptible difference in the water, and no trace of poison was found in it.

Where a pond, and the waters of a stream running into it, were taken by the city for purposes of supplying its inhabitants with pure water, and the city sought by petition to restrain the pollution of such stream under the Massachusetts Statutes of 1884, chap. 154, it was held that the fact that the city had, by means of a dike, prevented the waters of the stream from running into and polluting the waters of the pond, was no defense. The court therefore granted the injunction as the city had the right to be protected against the necessity of maintaining works for the preservation of the purity of the water from such a cause, the fact that the city had been bound to resort to, and was able by means of, special works to prevent the natural result of the defendant's act being no justification for the continuance of such illegal fouling. Martin v. Gleason, 139 Mass. 183, 190.

In Atty. Gen. v. Hunter, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 12, the excavations from the defendant's pond and mill dam had rendered the inhabitants unhealthy, and the bill filed at the instance of the citizens prayed a perpetual injunction. The court granted the relief sought as the rights infringed were of a character not in the least doubtful, the health and comfort of the relations themselves and others for whom they acted being injured by the nuisance.

So, in Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 20 N. J. Eq. 415, 417, 40 L. R. A.

The appellant also cites the cases of Cedar Falls v. Hansen (Iowa) 73 N. W. 585, and Knostman & P. Furniture Co. v. Davenport 99 Iowa, 589, in support of the same doctrine. In the former of these two cases it appeared that the defendant owned three lots, in which there was a depression which furnished an outlet for surface water from a pond. The pond was filled, but surface water at times flowed from the same territory through the depression. The city improved the street near the lots, and in so doing made a ditch along one side of two of the lots, and turned it onto the third lot, so that water from the ditch passed into the depression on that lot. The defendant had placed a house over the depression, and was about to fill the lot to the level of the street, and thus make a permanent obstacle to the flow of water in the depression; and we held that he had the right to do so. That conclusion was based upon the rule that a city wherein the attorney general joined with the inhabitants in restraining a trade or business as a public nuisance, the court enjoined the defendants from permitting the blood of the boys slaughtered upon the premises to flow into, and pollute the waters of, a creek as a nuisance detrimental to health.

The injunction granted in the above case was made perpetual as the defendants avowed their intention to permit the blood to be discharged into a stream, thereby necessarily polluting the waters thereof, and rendering them unfit for use. Atty. Gen. v. Steward, 21 N. J. Eq. 340.

In Atty. Gen. v. Blount, 10 N. C. (4 Hawks) 384, 15 Am. Dec. 526, an injunction was sought to restrain defendant from erecting a mill and dam on a stream in the vicinity of the town, upon the ground that, if such act were permitted, great and irreparable mischief would ensue, as the noxious vapors arising from the pond would materially affect the salubrity of the town. The court held that as it was shown that, not merely interference with the inhabitants to a moral certainty existed, but that if the work was suffered to proceed the health of the community would be put in jeopardy, the relief would be granted, as in such a case it was bound in duty to interpose, the climate being such that a collection of stagnant water would render the inhabitants unhealthy. The injunction was therefore made perpetual.

But in Baltimore v. Warren Mfg. Co. 59 Md. 96, 108, the court refused an injunction, at the instance of the public authorities, to restrain the defendants from polluting a certain river, which was the source of supply for water to the city for drinking and other purposes, where the allegations were not sufficiently definite without evidence in support, the facts not showing how such water became impregnated, and to what extent.

In the above case it is stated that, if the defendants, being upper riparian proprietors, and as such entitled to the ordinary use of the water including the right to apply it in a reasonable way to the purposes of trade and manufacture, by using the water of the stream in an unreasonable manner, had defiled the same in such manner and to such an extent as to operate as an actual invasion of the rights of the complainants, the latter were clearly entitled to redress by action at law, and, in case the nuisance was continued, to summary relief by injunction.

As to the municipal control over nuisances relating to health caused by the fouling and pollution of waters and watercourses, see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305. E. W.

may bring its streets to grade; that by doing so, it may turn surface water from its natural course, and owners of lots below grade cannot complain, because of their right to protect themselves by bringing their lots to grade. The fact was also mentioned that the city had changed the course through which water naturally flowed over two of the lots of the defendant. It was said, in effect, that, in view of the power of the city to make the changes it did without liability, the defendant should be permitted to bring his lot to grade, even though by so doing he obstructed the natural waterway. In the Davenport Case the plaintiff sought to hold the city liable for alleged negligence in failing to provide adequate means for carrying off surface water. What was said in the two cases respecting the right of a lotowner to bring his lot to grade must be considered with the facts to which the statements made were applied. The characteristics of the depression considered in the Cedar Falls Case were somewhat like those of that part of Dry run north of Bremer avenue; but, so far as we are advised, the course which the city had pursued towards it, and the effect of obstructing it, were wholly unlike the course pursued by the city, and the effect to be apprehended from the proposed obstruction, in this case. The plaintiff had for many years followed the plan of keeping Dry run open for the discharge of surface water which should be gathered from the territory it drained north of Bremer avenue. An outlet for that water was a great and pressing necessity, and to maintain such an outlet the plaintiff made substantial and expensive improvements, of a permanent character, to keep open the natural outlet. What it did in that respect was authorized in § 3 of chapter 89 of the Acts of the 19th General Assembly, which gave to cities the power "to deepen, widen, cover, wall, alter, or change the channel of watercourses within their corporate limits," and by § 527 of the Code of 1873, which provided that "the city council shall have the care, supervision, and control of all public highways, bridges, streets, alleys, public squares, and commons within the city, and shall cause the same to be kept open and in repair. . . ." In the case of Wharton v. Stevens, 84 Iowa, 107, 15 L. R. A. 680, the proprietor of a farm claimed the right to obstruct the flow of surface water from an adjoining farm through a natural depression in the surface of the land; but we held that the right did not exist, and, in speaking of surface water, said, "When such water flows, by a well-defined and natural course, upon lower lands, that flow cannot be interfered with by either the upper or lower proprietor. But when such water has no defined course, but spreads out over the land without a well defined course, it may be turned by the landowner in any direction. But where surface water has a fixed and certain course, as a swale, though it may be narrow or broad, its flow cannot be interrupted, to the injury of an adjoining proprietor." See also Willits v. Chicago, B. & N. W. Ry. Co., 88 Iowa, 281, 21 L. R. A. 608; Earl v. De Hart, 12 N. J. Eq. 283, 72 Am. Dec. 395; Lambert v. Alcorn, 144 Ill. 313, 21 L. R. A. 611.

The rule announced in the case of Wharton v. Stevens is applicable in this case. The obstruction of Dry run in the manner proposed by the defendants is unauthorized, and would be followed by consequences too serious to the plaintiff and the people interested in the territory drained by the run to be permitted.

The decree of the District Court appears to be right, and it is affirmed.

Mr. L. H. Chalmers for appellant.

Mr. Joseph Campbell, for appellees:

When the term "ratify" is used in connection with a contract, it is only applicable to a contract made by a party acting, or assuming to act, for another. There must be some relation, actual or assumed, of principal and agent.

Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 542; Puget Sound Lumber Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 237; Mitchell v. Minnesota Fire Assn., 48 Minn. 278.

Before it can be contended that a principal has ratified the unauthorized act of his agent, it must be shown that he was made acquainted with all the material facts.

The principal is under no obligation to accept the assumed agent's act. The law imposes on him no duties to make inquiries about it.

Appellees' names were forged to the note. Even if they did promise to pay the note they are not bound, and appellant cannot recover.

Greenhood, Pub. Pol. p. 210; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. p. 364.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover against the defendants, E. B. Kirkland, R. F. Kirkland, and George E. Loring, upon a promissory note. The defendant E. B. Kirkland made default, and the defendants R. F. Kirkland and George E. Loring answered under oath, denying the execution of the note. The cause was tried without a jury, and the findings of the court were that the defendants R. F. Kirkland and George E. Loring did not sign the note; that the placing of their names thereon was not done by their authority, knowledge, or consent, but that their names were forged thereto. The court further found that the oral promises of R. F. Kirkland and George E. Loring to pay said note were made under the misapprehension that they had originally signed said note; that at the times when said promises were made said note was not exhibited to either of them by the plaintiff, and that they were made without knowledge of the material facts in relation to said note; that said promises were made without any consideration whatever, and after the maturity of the note; that by reason of said promises the plaintiff was in no way affected or injured, or induced to change his relations regarding said note; and that, as a conclusion of law, neither of said answering defendants were liable for the payment thereof. Judgment was entered accordingly in their favor. From the judgment and the order overruling his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

Under the pleadings and findings of the court below, it may be assumed that the names of R. F. Kirkland and George E. Loring, appearing upon said note, were forgeries, as there is abundant evidence, we think, to support this conclusion. But it is claimed by the appellant that the two defendants, by their acts subsequent to the forgery, if forgery it was, are estopped from denying the genuineness of their signatures, and that they are liable as having adopted the forgery. The evidence in the case shows that the defendants E. B. Kirkland and R. F. Kirkland were brothers, and that the defendant George E. Loring was their acquaintance and associate of eighteen or twenty years; that R. F. Kirkland and Loring had each previously been jointly obligated with E. B. Kirkland; that on May 1, 1891, the latter was indebted to the appellant in the sum of $800 on a certain former note given by him, upon which Loring was liable as surety; that appellant delivered to E. B. Kirkland a new note, in blank, for the renewal of the former obligation, and on the following day the latter returned the new note to the appellant, with his own and the names of George E. Loring and R. F. Kirkland signed thereto, and this is the note which was sued on. The appellant claimed to have had various conversations with R. F. Kirkland and Loring about the note, and that they had promised to pay it, but he did not testify that he had ever exhibited the instrument to either of them. The defendant R. F. Kirkland admitted in his testimony that he had on several occasions promised to pay the note, but claimed that he had done so under the mistaken assumption that he had really signed it. It plainly appears, too, that whatever promises were made by either R. F. Kirkland or Loring were made after the maturity of the note, and without any consideration. It is not shown that the appellant was in any way prejudiced by them, or that they induced him to do, or omit to do, anything whatever to his disadvantage, or that his status by reason thereof was in any respect changed. Under these circumstances, no foundation for an estoppel exists. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 359; Workman v. Wright, 33 Ohio St. 405, 31 Am. Rep. 546; Moore v. Robinson, 62 Ala. 537; Crossan v. May, 68 Ind. 242. If it be contended that, without regard to the principle of estoppel, the defendants are liable as having adopted the forgery, the authorities cited by appellant will not sustain his contention, under the facts in this case, as a short review of the former will readily disclose. In Woodruff v. Munroe, 33 Md. 147, it was held: "If, in an action against an indorser of a promissory note by the bona fide holders thereof, it be shown that the indorsement was not genuine, and the defendant did not ratify or sanction it prior to the maturity of the note, and its transfer to plaintiffs, he is not liable. But if he adopted the note prior to its maturity, and by such adoption assisted in its negotiation, he would be estopped from setting up the forgery in a suit by a bona fide holder. But any admissions by the defendant made subsequently to the maturity of the note would not be evidence that he had authorized the indorsement of his name thereon." Casco Bank v. Keene, 53 Me. 103, is a case where, on account of the defendant's admission of the genuineness of the signature, the bank refrained from proceeding against the person from whom it received the note, and the court held the defendant thereby estopped from denying his signature. In Greenfield Bank v. Crafts, 4 Allen, 447, the court was considering the case of a party acting with full knowledge of the manner in which the note was signed, and the want of authority on the part of the actor to sign his name, but who understandingly and unequivocally adopted the signature, and assumed the note as his own. Dow v. Spenny, 29 Mo. 390, went on the proposition that the lower court erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff must prove that the signatures of the defendants on the note were their genuine signatures. In Crout v. De Wolf, 1 R. I. 393, the third clause of the syllabus is, "Where the person, whose signature is forged, promises the forger to pay the note, this amounts to ratification of the signature, and binds him." But an examination of the case shows that evidence was offered to prove that the plaintiff had bought the paper in consequence of what the defendant said to him, and the court charged that if, before purchasing the note, plaintiff asked defendant if he should buy, and was told he might, defendant could not excuse himself on the ground of forgery. So that the case may be put upon the ground of estoppel. In Shisler v. Vandike [92 Pa. 447], 37 Am. Rep. 704, it was held that a promise, by one whose indorsement on a note is forged, to pay the same, is void as against public policy. This is the entire line of authorities cited by counsel for appellant, and it will be seen that, in so far as they are applicable to the case at bar, they support, rather than impugn, the holding of the lower court. There are numerous authorities which hold that a forgery cannot be ratified. Brooke v. Hook is an English case [L. R. 6 Exch. 89], reprinted in 3 Alb. L. J. 255. This was a case where the defendant's name was forged, and he had given a written memorandum that he would be responsible for the bill. Chief Baron Kelly places his opinion upon the grounds (1) that the defendant's agreement to treat the note as his own was in consideration that plaintiff would not prosecute the forger; and (2) that there was no ratification as to the act done, the signature to the note being illegal and void, and, though a voidable act may be ratified, it is otherwise when the act is originally, and in its inception, void. The opinion fully recognizes the proposition that when acts or admissions alter the condition of the holder of the paper the party is estopped, but it is necessary that such a case be made. In McHugh v. Schuykill County, 67 Pa. 391, 5 Am. Rep. 445, the defense to a bond was forgery. The court below charged that if the obligor subsequently approved and acquiesced in the forgery, or ratified it, the bond was binding on him. It was held that, there being no new consideration, the instruction was error; also, that a contract infected with fraud was void, not voidable, and confirmation, without a new consideration, was nudum pactum. This proposition is recognized in 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1852: "When no principle of estoppel applies, and when, through mistake, a party states that his signature is genuine, and afterward discovering his error speedily corrects it,—that is to say, before the holder has changed his relations to the paper or anyone has dealt with it upon the faith of his admissions, we know of no principle of law which prevents the forgery from being pleaded." Upon the principles laid down in these authorities, we cannot see how any mere promises to pay a forged note can lay the foundation for liability of the appellees, when there appear no circumstances to create an estoppel, and the promises were made after maturity, without consideration, and without full knowledge of the material facts in relation to said note.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Mr. J. H. Harrod for appellee.

Bunn, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for malicious prosecution by Albert Walker, the appellee, against the street car company of Little Rock. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Walker was a passenger on one of defendant's cars, known as the "West Ninth car," running from the west, on Ninth street, to the junction of the several car lines at the crossing of Ninth and Main streets, having paid his fare. When his car arrived at the junction, and was stopped, as usual, on the east track on Main street, and just north of Ninth street, plaintiff alighted from the same; and he took his seat at the nearby corner of the sidewalk to await the arrival of the Fifteenth street car, coming from the south along the east track on Main, and going to the Union Depot. While at this corner plaintiff was engaged in conversation with a woman, subsequently a witness in the case; and the Fifteenth street car came up, and stopped the usual distance—15 or 20 feet—in rear of the Ninth street car on the same track as aforesaid. Then the Ninth street car moved off down Main street, and in the usual interval of time the Fifteenth street car followed. The plaintiff neglected to board the latter as he intended, until, as he testifies, it had started and was moving off slightly; as his companion testifies, until the car had gone 15 or 20 feet; and as the conductor on the car testifies, after it had gone half way to Eighth street. Elsewhere plaintiff also stated that he boarded the Fifteenth street car at Ninth and Main, and that then the transfer man said, "Transfer one." When the conductor passed through the car, collecting fares, he accosted plaintiff, sitting in the rear end, and demanded his fare, which he refused to pay, saying that he was a "transfer;" meaning that he was entitled to be transferred, having come to the junction as a paid passenger from West Ninth, and that he was entitled to continue to his destination without paying additional fare. There arose a controversy between him and the conductor, who contended that he had not gotten on the car before it left the junction, and that, therefore, he had not been transferred. The conductor, being a new man in the business, consulted with the motorman, who was an experienced man, as to what to do in the premises and was informed that the rule was to put the passenger off if he refused to pay his fare; and this in fact seems to have been the rule. So at Fourth street the conductor called to his aid Rainwater, a policeman, and directed him to put Walker off, as he testified, but, as the policeman testified, directed him to arrest him and take him off. The policeman arrested plaintiff accordingly, and, on arriving at Markham street, took him to the office of the police judge at the city hall, which is near by; and on the following day the plaintiff was tried, on a charge preferred by the policeman, for violating a city ordinance which made it a misdemeanor for any person to ride on a street car without paying his fare. And the conductor and the transfer agent, whose post was at the junction aforesaid, were summoned and testified; and the plaintiff was discharged, and then brought this suit against the street-car company for malicious prosecution, as stated.

The proof of the rules of the defendant company is very indefinite and unsatisfactory, but we gather this much from the testimony: That transfers of passengers from the cars of one line to another were allowed to be made only at the junction named; that a passenger alighting from an incoming car remained in the vicinity until the arrival of the car to which he asked to be transferred, and, having been within the view of the transfer agent from the time he alighted from the other car, on his boarding the latter car the transfer agent signalled or called to the conductor thereon that one was transferred, or whatever the number might be, and the conductor in this way was directed to demand no additional fares from these transferred passengers. Whether it was allowable for a passenger to board his second car after it had been put in motion, the witnesses do not inform us, except inferentially. From one of the questions put to the transfer agent and answered by him, one would infer that when a passenger alighted from an incoming car the transfer agent called out, "Transfer the party." Such a direction would be nonsensical, until the car to which he wished to be transferred should arrive, and we presume that is what was meant. However this may be, we will assume, for the sake of the argument, at least, that the police judgment was based upon a proper construction of the testimony, and that the plaintiff was entitled to ride on the Fifteenth street car to his destination without paying the additional fare, and that his ejection from the car was wrongful, and that his subsequent prosecution was also wrongful; and even, for the sake of the argument, we will say that the arrest and prosecution were at the instance of the conductor, and that from his conduct in relation thereto malice may be inferred. This brings us squarely to the only strictly legal proposition in this case, and that is, Was the defendant company liable for the acts of its employee, the conductor, in this regard? The defendant's contention is, in effect, that it is not liable unless there is proof of its express authority to its employee to arrest and prosecute delinquent passengers for violation of the law on the subject. In determining what may be regarded as express authority, we may include, for the purposes of this discussion, not only authority given in express words, but such authority as necessarily follows by implication from the express language conferring the authority. Central R. Co. v. Brewer, 73 Md. 394, 27 L. R. A. 63, was a case wherein "a person, on entering a street railway car, deposited in the fare box a coin resembling a five cent piece or nickel, and shortly thereafter was informed by the driver that he had dropped a lead nickel into the box [pointing it out to him], and was requested to redeem it, and he refused to do so, and he [after leaving the car] was subsequently arrested and held to bail at the instance of officers of the railway company on the charge of passing counterfeit money." Upon the evidence the United States Commissioner before whom the preliminary trial was had discharged him, and he then brought the suit for malicious prosecution and false arrest. The trial court having given four several instructions at the instance of the plaintiff, the defendant asked the following instruction, which was not covered by any of those given, and the same was refused, to wit: "(2) That there is no evidence in the case legally sufficient to prove that any of the officers or agents of the defendant corporation was authorized by the company to have the arrest made which is complained of in the declaration or that the company subsequently adopted and ratified the acts of said officers or agents, and the verdict must be for the defendant." After disposing of the various other questions involved, the supreme court of Maryland held that the company was not liable for the acts of the superintendent in causing the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiff: there being shown no express authority from the company to him to do so, nor ratification by it afterwards, as was assumed in the instruction asked and refused. To the same effect are Carter v. Howe Mach. Co. 51 Md. 290, 34 Am. Rep. 311; Presley v. Mobile & G. R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 199; Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 381, 100 Am. Dec. 448; 1 Biddle, Ins. § 118; and the following English cases, to wit: Eastern Counties R. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch. 314; Roe v. Birkenhead, L. & C. Junction R. Co. 7 Exch. 36; Poulton v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 534; Edwards v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. 445; and Allen v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 65,—all cited in appellant's brief. There is in the case at bar no proof of an express authority from the company to the street-car conductor to prosecute a passenger for refusing to pay his fare. Moreover, there is no connection whatever between his authority to put a delinquent passenger off his car (given expressly under the rules of the company), and thus prevent a further imposition on the part of the passenger, and the authority to arrest him and prosecute him for a violation of the criminal laws in attempting to ride on the car without paying his fare. Nor can the limited authority of a car conductor from the company to put a delinquent passenger off be enlarged by his calling to his aid a policeman, whose general powers as such are to make arrests and prosecute for violation of the municipal law. Nothing else being said, in such a case the policeman is called in to aid the conductor in the execution of the conductor's powers, and not those belonging to his office generally. Of course, the conductor could have independently, and on his own responsibility, caused the arrest to be made, and could have prosecuted; but could he do so as conductor of the street car?—is the question here, and the authorities cited are to the effect that he could not do so, and bind his company, without express authority being shown. As a matter of fact, the conductor, in this instance, in all probability, never intended to do more than act upon the advice of the experienced motorman (that is, put the plaintiff off the car), and never had the idea of prosecution, maliciously or otherwise; and all the play between himself and the policeman as to their use and understanding of the words "put off" and "arrest" amounts to nothing more than an illustration of the fact that we give meaning to words according to the lingo of our several callings, and as habit and association have determined. But we express no fixed opinion as to the facts. The plaintiff's counsel cite many authorities which they contend are in contradiction to the doctrines of the Maryland and other decisions cited. But, after a careful examination of all of them, we find no real conflict between the principles they announce and the principles of the cases cited by appellant. The difference is always between the state of facts or the state of pleadings. In concluding their argument and citation of authorities, they say that "every phase of the question, and every principle invoked in this case, has been passed upon by the court of appeals of New York, and decided against the contention of appellant's counsel," in the case of Lynch v. Metropolitan Rlev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 77, 43 Am. Rep. 141. In that case Lynch purchased a ticket for a passage upon defendant's railway, and entered one of its cars. Before reaching his destination he lost his ticket, and when, after getting off at the end of his journey on the train, he attempted to pass through the gate of the inclosure of the depot, he was stopped by the gate keeper, and informed that he could not pass out until he showed his ticket or paid his fare, which appears to have been the rule of the company. He explained the purchase and subsequent loss of his ticket to the gate keeper, and insisted on passing out, but was pushed back by the gate keeper, who then sent for a police officer, and directed him to arrest the plaintiff, which he then and there did, and took him to the police station, where the gate keeper lodged a complaint against him, and he was locked up overnight; and on the hearing the next morning the gate keeper appeared in the prosecution, but the plaintiff was discharged. Defendant [the railway company] had given orders to its gate keepers not to let passengers out until they either paid their fares or showed tickets." In an action for false imprisonment by the plaintiff against the company, the court held "that the detention was unlawful, that defendant [the railway company] was responsible for the acts of the gate keeper, and that plaintiff [Lynch] was entitled to recover." There was no doubt in that case but that the detention was not only unauthorized by any law, but was in violation of all law; and the first proposition, that the imprisonment was false, followed as a matter of course. The court had found that the gate keeper did exactly what the company had expressly ordered him to do under such circumstances, and, of course, could but hold that the company was liable. The gate keeper was simply acting in the plain line of his authority and duty to his master, and that made the latter liable. The circumstance of the prosecution seems not to have been commented upon, except as an incident of the false imprisonment, probably given only as a part of the whole transaction. Whether the gate keeper had express authority to prosecute or not is not shown in evidence, and that fact was not necessary to a judicial determination of the case, as it was one of false imprisonment, and not of malicious prosecution. The most that could have been made of the defense by the company was a plea of ultra vires, which is no defense in such cases. There is error in the second instruction given on part of the plaintiff, in which it is assumed, in effect, that the authority to arrest and prosecute for the criminal offense grows out of the authority to put off the cars for refusing to pay fare, there being want of proof of express authority to prosecute.

Reversed and remanded.

Wood, J., dissents, holding that, in order to maintain a suit of this kind against the corporation, it is not necessary to show that its agent, who instigated the malicious prosecution, or at whose instance it was brought about, had any express authority from the corporation to do the act complained of, but that such authority may be and will be implied if the agent in doing the act is acting within the scope of his real or apparent authority.

v.

Silas BURNAP et al., Respts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. An easement of light or air does not pass by implication on a conveyance of a building with windows looking out over vacant lots the title to which remains in the grantor, although the enjoyment and value of the building will be greatly impaired by erecting a structure in close proximity to it on the vacant lots.

2. An architect supervising the construction of a building and giving notice of an intention to build may be joined with the owner of the premises as a defendant in a suit for an injunction against the building.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Diego County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from cutting off the light and air from plaintiff's window. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. A. C. Mouser and Haines & Ward, for appellant:

The following provisions of the Civil Code relate to the subject:

§ 801. "The following land burdens, or servitudes upon land, may be attached to other land as incidents or appurtenances, and are then called easements. . . . The right of receiving air, light, or heat from or over, or discharging the same upon or over, land."

§ 802. "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way, or watercourse, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another."

§ 1084. "The transfer of a thing transfers also all its incidents, unless expressly excepted; but the transfer of an incident to a thing does not transfer the thing itself."

§ 1104. "A transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use the other real property of the person whose estate is transferred, in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred, for the benefit thereof, at the time when the transfer was agreed upon or completed."

§ 1107. "Every grant of an estate in real property is conclusive against the grantor, also against everyone subsequently claiming under him, except a purchaser or encumbrancer who in good faith and for a valuable consideration acquires a title or lien by an instrument that is first duly recorded."

The transfer of the property created in favor thereof easements to use the other adjoining real property of Hanbury in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by Hanbury, who transferred his estate in the Tremont property at the time such transfer of the Tremont was made.

An easement uncertain in its extent and duration, without any written or record evidence of its existence, fettering estates and laying an embargo upon the hand of improvement which carries the trowel and the plane, and, as applied to a subsequent purchaser, against the spirit of our recording acts, and not demanded by any consideration of public policy—surely should not be held to exist by mere implication.

There is no necessity for such an easement as claimed by appellant. The plans of the building show broad halls, and 50 feet of front and rear exposed for light and air.

Chipman, C., filed the following opinion: Action for an injunction. The defendant Burnap had judgment, from which plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll, including bill of exceptions presenting motion to strike out certain allegations in the amended complaint, and the ruling of the court thereon. But two questions are involved: (1) That the court erred in sustaining the demurrer made on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendant; and (2) that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer as to that portion of the amended complaint relating to light and air, and for like reasons the court erred in striking from the amended complaint "all matters relating to light and air." The motion to strike out having been granted, the result was to leave the complaint shorn of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It appeared from the complaint: That in 1887 one Hanbury owned certain lots and parts of lots in the city of San Diego, fronting 145 feet on Third street and 100 feet on D. street. He built a lodging house on the north 50 feet of the tract in 1881, fronting on Third street, and running back 90 feet. The lower story was finished for stores, and above this story, and in each of the three upper stories, windows opened out upon the vacant lots, admitting light and air to the south part of the building, which were alleged to be necessary for the use of, and to render habitable, this part of the house. That Hanbury used the house in this condition until May 2, 1890, when he sold it, and the land on which it rested, to plaintiff's testator. That Hanbury retained ownership of the remaining lots until September 18, 1892, when he sold them to the Savings Bank of San Diego county, and on January 20, 1896, the bank sold the lots to defendant Burnap. That on May 9, 1896, Burnap began the erection of a three-story building on his lots, and close to and against plaintiff's building, so as to entirely close up and darken the said windows in her building, and shut off all light and air. That these windows had been used as formerly, and up to the time of defendant's purchase. It was alleged that the proposed building would destroy one third the value of plaintiff's property, and render the south part of the house uninhabitable and unfit for use, and cause irreparable damage.

1. The principal contention of appellant is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and granting the motion, because from the facts pleaded it clearly appeared that there were appurtenant to the premises, as a dominant estate, easements of light and air through the door and windows in the south wall, over the land adjoining it on the south, as the servient estate. It is claimed that under the provisions of §§ 862, 801, 1084, 1104, and 1107 of the Civil Code, and the decisions of this court, the complaint showed the existence of such easements of light and air, with which defendants threatened to interfere. The conveyance from Hanbury to Kennedy was a grant deed. Appellant disclaims any right by prescription or by user, and so denies the authority of Western Granite & M. Co. v. Knickerbocker, 103 Cal. 111, where it was said: "The doctrine that a proprietor of land may by user acquire an easement over adjoining land for the passage of light and air does not prevail in this country." The claim broadly made is that the easement of light and air passes by implied grant under our statute. It would seem to us that the reasons for supporting a right by prescription are even stronger than can be advanced in support of an implied grant. The questions are closely allied, and are often found discussed together, and as depending on like reasons. But three states of the American Union retain the common law upon this subject, to wit, Illinois, New Jersey, and Louisiana. The first American case,—Story v. Odin (1815) 12 Mass. 157, 7 Am. Dec. 46,—which has been so often referred to as authority for the prescriptive right, was long ago overruled in that state. As recently as 1874, in Keats v. Hugo, 115 Mass. 204, 15 Am. Rep. 80, the cases were re-examined, and the doctrine very ably considered, by Gray, Ch. J.; and he there shows that even in Story v. Odin the right by prescription was not necessarily involved. This case in 115 Mass. is valuable, however, for its discussion of the precise question now before us. It was there said: "The reasons upon which it has been held that no grant of a right to air and light can be implied from any length of continuous enjoyment are equally strong against implying a grant of such a right from the mere conveyance of a house with windows overlooking the land of the grantor. To imply the grant of such a right in either case, without express words, would greatly embarrass the improvement of estates, and, by reason of the very indefinite character of the right asserted, promote litigation. The simplest rule, and that best suited to a country like ours, in which changes are taking place in the ownership and the use of lands, is that no right of this character can be acquired without express grant of an interest in, or covenant relating to, the lands over which the right is claimed." The leading case in New York state is Parker v. Foote, 19 Wend. 309. Bronson, J., in the opinion for the court, said: "There is, I think, no principle upon which the modern English doctrine on the subject of light can be supported. It is an anomaly in the law. It may do well enough in England, . . . but it cannot be applied in the growing cities and villages of this country, without working the most mischievous consequences." In Morrison v. Marquardt, 24 Iowa, 85, 92 Am. Dec. 444, Dillon, J., presents the subject in a still different light, reaching the same result. He said: "Surely such an easement uncertain in its extent and duration, without any written or record evidence of its existence, fettering estates, and laying an embargo upon the hand of improvement, which carries the trowel and the plane, and, as applied to a subsequent purchaser, against the spirit of our recording acts, and not demanded by any consideration of public policy,—surely such an easement should not be held to exist by mere implication." The question will be found more or less fully treated in Keiper v. Klein, 51 Ind. 316; also in Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 138, 2 Am. Rep. 379; Rennysen's Appeal, 44 Pa. 147, 39 Am. Rep. 777. We have no hesitation in adopting the prevailing rule in this country, and are content with the reasons upon which it rests. Nor do we think there is anything in our statutes restraining us from so holding.

Appellant insists that our Code provisions as to easements are "substantially the same . . . as . . . the common law," and therefore "must be construed as continuations thereof." Civil Code, § 5. Counsel presents with much force and ability the proposition that § 1104, Id., has converted what at common law were implied easements of light and air by severance of estate into statutory easements by such severance; and he urges that the rejection of this easement created by prescription does not necessarily justify the judicial repeal of the statutory easement created by severance. The provisions of § 1104, so much relied upon by appellant as creating by severance the very easement in question, we do not think have the effect claimed. The easement created is in favor of the land transferred, and is the right to use other real property of the transferor "in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred." If the easement claimed was the right to use a ditch or pipe through which water was conveyed to the property sold, and on which it was used as beneficial and necessary, there would be no difficulty in holding that the property retained by the transferor was "obviously and permanently used by him . . . at the time when the transfer . . . was completed." There would exist such relationship of the two properties—the part sold and the part retained—as to justify what was said in Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135, that "when the owner of lands divides his property into two parts, granting away one of them, he is taken by implication to include in his grant all such easements in the remaining part as are necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the part which he grants, in the form which it assumes at the time he transfers it." Where a town or city lot has a frontage on a street and on an alley in the rear, by means of which light and air may be obtained, and a building is erected thereon, we cannot say, as matter of law, that windows on the side overlooking another lot are necessary to the beneficial use or reasonable enjoyment of the building; nor can we say that, if the owner of two lots so constructs his house on one of them as to obtain light and air in part through windows overlooking the vacant lot, he thereby makes such "obvious" and "permanent" use of these openings and of the lot as to be held by implication to transfer an easement over the vacant lot when he sells the lot built upon. Indeed, it cannot be said there was any use made of the vacant land, as in the case of a way or a pipe as a conduit for water to the granted premises; nor would it be reasonable to presume that by the mere use of openings to admit light and air the transferor of the property intended that the use of these openings made by him was to be permanent, and to imply a grant to the use of his land retained by him for such permanent use. The statute was not, in our opinion, intended to create any such right by severance of the estate. That light and air may be the subject of an easement cannot be doubted. The statute says so plainly. § 801. That light and air may also become appurtenant to land is equally clear. Ibid., and § 662. And we must concede that the transfer of a thing transfers all its incidents, unless expressly excepted. § 1084. And we must also concede (for the statute says so) that the transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use the other real property of the grantor in the manner such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred. § 1104. All this is true, but it always remains to be determined in a given case whether an easement in fact exists, or may be presumed. Section 662, it is true, says that a thing is deemed appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, but the "thing" referred to must have a legal, recognized existence. Not every "thing" is deemed to be appurtenant, even when by semblance of right used with the land for its benefit. The use of light and air through the windows overlooking defendant's lots was by right, in the sense that it did not harm the owner or his property; but it would not follow necessarily that this air or light is to be deemed appurtenant to plaintiff's land, or that the enjoyment was by strict right. Mr. Washburn says: While "many of the rules in reference to easements of ways apply to those of light and air, . . . it must be obvious that in the original acquisition of the right a different rule must prevail." 2 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 361. And it was held in Mullen v. Stricker, 19 Ohio St. 138, 2 Am. Rep. 379: "Where the owner of two adjacent lots conveys one of them, no grant or reservation of an easement for light and air will be implied merely from the nature or use of the structure upon the lots at or prior to the time of the conveyance." Nor do we think that § 5 of the Civil Code, relied upon, restrains us from following the generally accepted doctrine in this country. Where our Code provisions are substantially the same as the common law, they are to be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments. Ibid. It is a part of the common law itself, however, that the colonists took with them only such parts thereof as were adapted to their new conditions and surroundings. 1 Hambl. (original page) 107, and notes of editor, p. 280. See cases cited in 2 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 282. The common law referred to in our statute is such only as conforms to our institutions and form of government, and is applicable to the habits and conditions of society. Ibid.; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 52.

Before we should feel bound to hold that light and air are easements as they were regarded in England, to be governed in their acquisition, enjoyment, and disposition under common-law rules, we should require it clearly to appear that our statute is substantially the same in all these respects as the common law. But the statute does no more than to declare that they may be the subject of an easement. We think our court is left free to say that, while an easement of light or air such as is here claimed may be created, no such easement will be held to pass by implication. Conceding, therefore, that plaintiff enjoyed what would be an easement at common law in England, and that by the transfer of title to the land there would have been an implied grant of this easement in that country, we are still of the opinion that no such easement was created under our law, nor did any such easement pass by implied grant. When Hanbury sold, without any grant of the passage for air and light over his retained lots, the privilege ceased; and he could have immediately built upon the vacant lots, as his successors in estate now propose to and may do.

2. Sanderson, one of the defendants, was the owner's architect, and it was alleged that he was personally supervising the work, and gave the notices of intention to build. He was but the servant and employee, as were the workmen on the building, and had no interest in the suit. The general prayer of the bill would have reached him, without being made a party. We think, however, while not a necessary party defendant, it was competent for plaintiff to make him one, and his remedy to relieve himself was not by demurrer. At the same time, we do not see that the ruling of the court was such injury as to warrant us in remanding the case, especially as the action cannot be maintained against any defendant. The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: Britt, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Town of BRISTOL, Appt.,
c.

NEW ENGLAND RAILROAD COMPANY.

(70 Conn. 305.)

1. A map of a proposed abutment in a highway to support an overhead railroad is sufficient if it contains such reference to monuments in the vicinity of its site that a competent surveyor can ascertain the points at which to set stakes.
2. An order of the railroad commission directing the separation of a grade crossing sufficiently describes the abutments to be erected in the highway if it refers to a map upon which they are delineated.
3. The board of railroad commissioners, one of whom is required by law to be a civil engineer, will be presumed to have made no order for the construction of a public work which cannot be precisely executed.
4. Land covered by a highway may be occupied by the railroad commissioners for the construction of a bridge to separate a grade crossing if necessary to abate a nuisance.
5. A town cannot enjoin the erection of abutments in one of its highways in pursuance of an order by the railroad commission to separate a grade crossing; but if it regards its rights encroached upon it must appeal from the order.

6. A sufficient appropriation of a portion of a highway for the abutment of a bridge for the separation of a grade crossing is made by an order of the railroad commissioners directing it to be made and referring to a map showing the abutment in the highway without formally condemning or discontinuing the portion of the highway covered.

7. An order by the state railroad commission requiring the separation of a grade crossing, which refers to a plan of the work showing abutments in the highway, is a defense to a suit by the municipality to enjoin the railroad company from placing the abutments in the highway.

8. A railroad company defending a suit to enjoin it from placing abutments in a highway on the ground that it is acting under order of the state railroad commission has the burden of proving the existence of the order and of the identity of the structure which it has threatened to build with that designated in the order.

9. A judgment will not be reversed for failure to sustain a demurrer for reasons not specified therein.

railroad commission for the separation of a grade crossing does not preclude the placing of other abutments in the street by reference to a map showing them so located.

(January 21, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Hartford County in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin the erection of an abutment in a public highway. Affirmed.

The state railroad commission passed an order for the separation of a grade crossing in the town of Bristol. The defendant railroad company was attempting to comply with the order when this bill was filed to enjoin it from doing so on the ground that it would result in an unlawful encroachment on the highway.

The material part of the order is as follows:

"We, being of opinion that the financial condition of the said New York & New England Railroad Company will warrant such order, and that public safety requires the same, do hereby order such crossing removed, and do determine and order that the following alterations, changes, and removals be made and done, to wit: That the method of crossing be altered so that said highway, instead of crossing said tracks at grade, as at present, be carried under said tracks, and, for that purpose, that the location of the said crossing be changed by the removal of said tracks from their present location to a point about 80 feet southerly therefrom; the same being carried over said highway on a double track iron bridge, with not less than 12 feet clear head room, with stone abutments located upon the street lines upon each side, and with supporting columns upon the latter lines of the street (said street being excavated so much as may be necessary to give said head room), with approaches not exceeding 9 feet in a hundred on the north side of said crossing, and level upon the south side, and not exceeding 5 feet in a hundred on North Main street, and 4 feet in a hundred on Prospect street; said alterations and changes being also delineated and shown on two maps on file in this office, one marked: 'N. Y. & N. E. R. R. Proposed Undercrossing of Main street, Bristol, Conn. Scale 50 feet to one inch. Chief Engineer's Office. Boston, February 10th, 1891. L. B. Bidwell, Chief Engineer.' And the other marked: 'Proposed Change of Main Street Crossing, Bristol, Conn. Scale, 40 feet to one inch. Boston, February 10th, 1891. L. B. Bidwell, Chief Engineer.' All of said alterations, changes, and removals to be made and done by said railroad company, and the expense thereof, including the damages to any person whose land is taken, and the special damages which the owner of any land adjoining the public highways shall sustain by reason of any change in the grade of such highways in consequence of any change, alteration, or removal above ordered, to be paid by said railroad company: George M. Woodruff, W. H. Hayward, Wm. O. Seymour, Railroad Commissioners."

sufficient, and the demurrer to it should have been sustained.

Hotchkiss v. Plunkett, 60 Conn. 230; Usher v. Waddingham, 62 Conn. 412; Stephen, Pl. 9th Am. ed. 200.

The act regulates the procedure, and provides for a full statement of the scope of the action proposed.

If the railroad commissioners proceed on their own initiative, they "shall proceed in all respects as to method of procedure and assessment of expense as if the said directors had voluntarily applied therefor."

Acts of 1889, chap. 220, § 1; New York & N. E. R. Co.'s Appeal, 62 Conn. 527.

That is, they must, in their preliminary order, define the scope of the action proposed to be taken, and notify the parties in interest thereof.

The railroad commissioners defined the subject-matter of the action to be "the removal of the grade crossing of their road and the highway known as Main street," the question to be heard "as to what alterations, changes, or removals, if any, shall be made at said crossing, and by whom done," and they cited in as land-owners to be affected "the owners of the land adjoining said crossing, and adjoining that portion of said highway to be changed in grade."

Only one highway, Main street, is thought of as to be affected; North Main street is nowhere mentioned, no alteration of it is proposed, and no notice is given to the owners of land adjoining it.

The only reference to any other street than Main street is purely incidental; is not made with any reference to the bridge or its abutments, but for the purpose only of determining the grade of the approaches.

Is it possible to construe this order as ordering the taking for railroad purposes of a large section of a highway, when such taking is nowhere mentioned, nor such highway mentioned except with reference to its grade?

There is no denial that the abutment is within North Main street, nor that it is correctly described in the complaint; but an allegation that the abutment so described will be "in exact accordance with the said order . . . and with said maps."

The assertion or the denial of a legal conclusion, without showing the facts which support or forbid such conclusion, means nothing. A demurrer to such a pleading must always be sustained.

Woodruff v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 59 Conn. 63.

The plaintiff could not reply to this by merely reiterating the allegations of the complaint; the only allegation which the plaintiff could deny is that the encroachment described is in accordance with said order and maps.

The issue raised hereby would be merely as to what the order and maps authorize, and this is not an issue of fact, but of law.

Mr. Edward D. Robbins for appellee.

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint alleges that the defendant intends to build a bridge for carrying its railroad tracks over Main street at the corner of that street and North Main street (they being highways within the limits of the town of Bristol), and threatens to build a stone abutment in connection with said bridge, so as to encroach upon North Main street, and occupy a strip thereof, as shown by the annexed map, marked "Exhibit A," and claims an injunction restraining the defendant from building any structure within the limits of North Main street. Exhibit A is a map (drawn to a scale) purporting to be a facsimile of the defendant's plan and profiles for the abolition of the Main street grade crossing at Bristol, prepared and signed by its chief engineer. The right of the plaintiff to ask an injunction arises from the duties imposed upon it by law, as the agent of the state in the maintenance and care of these highways; and the defendant, in its second defense, sets up the paramount authority of the state, exercised through an order of the railroad commissioners, appropriating this portion of the highway as necessary for the abolition of a public nuisance endangering the lives of its citizens who use the highways. The answer contains a first defense, in which each allegation of the complaint is either denied or admitted, and a second defense, which purports to allege extrinsic facts sufficient, if proved, to defeat the plaintiff's action, admitting for the purposes of the defense the facts stated in the complaint. The allegations of the defense are: (1) The existence of an order by the railroad commissioners directing the defendant to remove its present grade crossing of Main street, and for that purpose changing the location of said crossing to a point 80 feet southerly, at the corner of Main and North Main streets, and directing the defendant to there build over Main street, and adjoining North Main street, a bridge, with a wing or supporting abutment, whose location is definitely fixed by the maps which are a part of the order. (2) The structure which the defendant threatens to build, as alleged in the complaint, and shown on the maps contained in the complaint, is in exact accordance with the command of the commissioners contained in the order, and the maps, which are a part thereof. If these allegations of fact are denied and proved, a complete defense to the action is established. Instead of replying, by denial or otherwise, to the defense, the plaintiff has demurred; and the action of the court in overruling that demurrer is the only error assigned in this appeal.

Before dealing directly with the demurrer, we consider what seems to be the plaintiff's conception of the fundamental defect claimed to be apparent in the second defense. It is this: An inspection of the record of the proceedings of the commissioners does not clearly indicate what portion, if any, of the land within the true limits of the highway, is to be covered by the structure authorized. This claim is true, but it must be distinguished from a claim confounded with it,—that the record does not precisely indicate that portion of the surface of the land which the structure authorized is to occupy. The latter claim is not true. A map (drawn to a scale) locating the structure in accordance with distances from permanent and known monuments describes its actual location as precisely as is possible. Such is the character of the map now in question. It purports to denote corners of permanent buildings, and the center line of the appellee's present location, fixed by public authority, and made a matter of public record. It is unnecessary that a map of a projected structure, of the nature of that which was the subject of the orders of the railroad commissioners, should be so drawn as to describe every possible monument in the vicinity of its site. It is enough if it describes such, and so many, that, when received upon the ground, and in relation to the ground, a competent surveyor can ascertain the points at which to set his stakes. The presumption is that the board of railroad commissioners, one of whose members the law requires to be a civil engineer, has made no order for the construction of a public work which cannot be precisely executed. On demurrer, the answers which set forth such an order were entitled to the support of that presumption. The exact position of the land to be occupied being thus sufficiently shown, any statement in the order of the precise point where the actual line of North Main street crosses this land is immaterial to the sufficiency of the defense. The commissioners are dealing with the abatement of a nuisance. Their authority to order such construction of a bridge as is necessary to most thoroughly abate that nuisance is complete, including the power to occupy land covered by a highway. They have no authority to determine the disputed lines of a highway, and were not bound to do so in making the order. The defense set up is complete, whether the land the defendant is ordered to occupy is covered to the extent of 1 foot or of 20 feet by the easement of a highway. If the plaintiff, as guardian of that highway, thought its limits were unnecessarily encroached upon, it was its duty to appeal from the order. The legal exercise of discretion by the commissioners cannot be challenged in any other way.

But in this connection the plaintiff claims that the record does not clearly show that the commissioners intended that any portion of the highway should be occupied. We think the record does clearly show that the commissioners made this location with full understanding that the land occupied might be, and probably was, within the limits of this highway. Assuming that there must be an intention to appropriate the portion of the highway within the limits of the land designated, we think that intention sufficiently appears on the face of the record, which includes the order expressed in writing and in maps. The commissioners apparently decided that the structure described, covering the land defined, was necessary to the abatement of the nuisance, notwithstanding a portion of the land defined might be covered by the adjoining highway, and ordered the defendant to build that structure. This they had the power to do, and were not bound to first adjudicate the legal limits of that highway, and then, in addition to the limitation of the use of the highway necessarily involved in the location of the structure ordered, to formally condemn or discontinue as a highway a precise number of square feet. The decision made, and the structure ordered, were a sufficient appropriation for that purpose of such portion of the highway as actually covered land designated. It follows that when the defendant alleges the existence of this order, and that the structure it threatens to build as alleged in the complaint is in exact accordance with the order, it sets up a complete and valid defense, consistent with the truth of the essential allegations of the complaint; it alleges facts, and not conclusions of law; it assumes the whole burden of proof properly belonging to it (i. e., the burden of proving the existence of the order, and the identity of the structure it has threatened to build, as alleged in the complaint, with the structure it has been ordered to build); and it does not, as claimed by the plaintiff, allege facts that in any event can be held equivalent to a general denial, for it admits the allegation material to the plaintiff's case, that the threatened structure is within the limits of the highway. And if the defendant fails to establish by proof the existence of the order, and the identity of the structures, the admission of this fact entitles the plaintiff to judgment. If, on the other hand, the defendant does prove the facts it has alleged, then the fact admitted, material to the plaintiff's case, becomes immaterial to the case the defendant had established, and whether the fact so admitted is in reality a fact or not cannot affect the defendant's right to a judgment. "All demurrers shall distinctly specify the reasons why the pleading demurred to is insufficient." Gen. Stat. § 873. Reasons for claiming the insufficiency of the second defense, not specified in the demurrer, do not demand discussion. The plaintiff is not entitled to a reversal of the judgment because the trial court did not sustain the demurrer for reasons not specified. The first reason stated in the demurrer is too general to have any force. It is claimed under the fourth reason that the clause in the written portion of the order directing the building of a bridge over Main street, "with not less than 12 feet clear head room, with stone abutments located upon the street lines upon each side, and with supporting columns upon the gutter lines of the street," controls the subsequent clause, directing changes in North Main street, and contradicts and renders invalid that portion of the order contained in the maps which directs in detail the changes to be made in North Main street, and fixes the exact location upon the surface of the land of the supporting wall or abutment to be there built. We do not so read the order. The description of the bridge over Main street as one with abutments on the street lines, and supporting columns on the gutter lines, of that street, exhausts its force in describing the abutments and supporting columns mentioned, and that description cannot be construed as applicable to the portions of the order dealing with changes in other streets, nor as compelling a wing or supporting abutment on North Main street to be located upon the street line, notwithstanding the portion of the order directing these changes locates with certainty the abutment in a different place. Giving the widest allowable scope to the language of the two other reasons, they present, in addition to the points already considered, only this claim: That the railroad commissioners had no power, in their order for the elimination of the grade crossing at Main street, to direct the abutment in question to be built within the lines of North Main street; and, if they had such power, they have not given such directions. If the commissioners had the power to order the erection of the abutment as described, covering a portion of the highway, it is immaterial to the sufficiency of the second defense, for reasons already stated, whether or not the abutment ordered actually extends within the legal lines of North Main street. That they had the power, under chapter 220 of the Public Acts of 1889, to order any changes or alterations in highways, including their partial discontinuance, necessary to the elimination of a dangerous grade crossing (of which necessity the commissioners are the judges), subject to a review of their proceedings on appeal to the superior court, and that the law conferring this power is constitutional, is too well settled to be now questioned. Suffield v. New Haven & N. Co. 53 Conn. 363, 370; Fairfield's Appeal, 57 Conn. 167, 171; Doolittle v. Branford, 59 Conn. 402, 407; Cullen v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 66 Conn. 211, 222; New York & N. E. R. Co.'s Appeal, 62 Conn. 527. An appeal was taken from the order in question to the superior court, and the order was affirmed by that court, and the judgment of the superior court was affirmed by this court, in the case last cited. To all these proceedings the plaintiff was a party. So far as concerns this plaintiff, the question of public safety, and that of necessity of occupying any portion of North Main street for the elimination of the grade crossing as ordered, is res judicata. Doolittle v. Branford, 59 Conn. 411. The plaintiff suggests in argument that the course of proceedings by the commissioners, as recited in the order, lays no valid foundation for an order directing changes in North Main street. The record of the commissioners' proceedings, on its face, seems sufficient to justify any necessary change in that highway; and, being sufficient on its face, the question of some possible latent defect cannot be raised by this demurrer, even if the plaintiff could raise it in any other way than by appeal.

The brief and argument of the plaintiff suggest that its real grievance is based on the assumption that the second defense in some way cuts off or abridges its right to establish upon trial the claim that, whatever this order may apparently say, the commissioners did not in fact intend to authorize the occupation of any part of North Main street, and therefore did not authorize an abutment extending over the line of that street. We fail to see how this right, if the plaintiff has such a right, is in any way affected by the mode of pleading the second defense, or how the demurrer can be construed as specifying such a reason for the insufficiency of the pleading. If the plaintiff can in this action, or in any other action, attack the validity of the order, or establish a meaning not apparent on its face, because the order was made under a misapprehension of essential conditions, it certainly cannot do so by means of this demurrer. We think the question raised by the demurrers to the second defenses to the first and second counts do not materially differ. No claim was made in argument that the same considerations did not apply to both demurrers.

There may be doubt whether the true theory of the practice act would not, in a case like this, require the defendant to allege the facts set up in the second defense in connection with those set up in the first as a single defense, rather than to make such facts the basis of a separate and distinct defense. The practical results of following either form may be substantially the same, and any error in such a matter is waived, if not specified in a demurrer. As the question is not material to our decision, we merely mention the doubt, in order to avoid any implied approval of the form followed.

There is no error in the judgment of the Superior Court.

NOTE.—As to carrier's liability for assaults on passengers, see note to Davis v. Houghtelin (Neb.) 14 L. R. A. 37; also Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Bar-ger (Md.) 26 L. R. A. 220; Krantz v. Rio Grande 40 L. R. A.

Western Railway Company, alleging that on June 18, 1896, while she was a passenger upon the train of the defendant, one Munroe, an employee of the defendant, unlawfully assaulted her and attempted to commit a rape upon her person, and that the defendant was negligent in not protecting her, and in having such employee in its service; it being known to the company that he was notoriously a dissolute and abandoned character. Upon the trial the evidence was conflicting, but there was evidence in behalf of the plaintiff, which, if credible, established the allegations in her petition. It appeared from this evidence that the person committing the assault was a baggage master on the train, and that he came into the part of the coach in which plaintiff was sitting alone, and, having fastened both of the doors of the car, committed the assault upon her which is the subject-matter of her complaint, and did not desist until someone came to one of the doors, and witnessed what was transpiring in the car. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000, and, the defendant's motion for a new trial being overruled, it excepted.

When a contract of carriage is entered into between a passenger and a carrier, there arises out of the relation thus created, not only a duty to safely transport the passenger to the destination fixed in the contract, but also to protect him from injury, violence, insult, and ill treatment at the hands of the servants of the carrier who are in charge of, or connected in any way with, the carriage in which the passenger is being transported. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 541. This seems to be the settled doctrine of this state. Western & A. R. Co. v. Turner, 72 Ga. 292, 53 Am. Rep. 842; Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Condor, 75 Ga. 51; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Fleetwood, 90 Ga. 23; Cole v. Railroad Co. (last term) 29 S. E. —. While a carrier of passengers owes a duty to all of its passengers to protect them from violence and insult on the part of its servants, it owes an especial duty to female passengers, to protect them from insult and abuse. In the case of Chamberlain v. Chandler, 3 Mason, 242, Judge Story, in discussing the question now under consideration, uses the following language: "In respect to passengers, the care of the master is one of peculiar responsibility and delicacy. Their contract with him is not for mere ship room, and personal existence on board; but for reasonable food, comforts, necessities, and kindness. It is a stipulation, not for toleration merely, but for respectful treatment, for that decency of demeanor which constitutes the charm of social life; for that attention which mitigates evils without reluctance, and that promptitude which administers aid to distress. In respect to females, it proceeds yet farther, it includes an implied stipulation against obscenity, that unmodesty of approach, which borders on lasciviousness, and against that wanton disregard of the feelings which aggravates every evil, and endeavors by the excitement of terror, and cool malignancy of conduct, to inflict torture upon susceptible minds. What can be more disreputable, and at the same time more distressing, than habitual obscenity, harsh threats, and immodest conduct, to delicate and inoffensive females? What can be more oppressive than to confine them to their cabins by threats of personal insult or injury? What more aggravating than a malicious tyranny, which denies them every reasonable request, and seeks revenge by withholding suitable food and the common means of relief, in cases of seasickness and ill health?" In the case of Nieto v. Clark, 1 Cliff. 145, this decision of Judge Story's was cited with approval by Judge Clifford. While it is true that in two cases cited the carrier whose liability was under consideration was a carrier by water, still the doctrine laid down in these cases has been followed in cases where suits were brought for wrongs of a similar nature inflicted upon passengers in a railway carriage. See Craken v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ballard, 85 Ky. 307.

2. One of the jurors impaneled to try this case was called from the jury box, and placed upon the stand as a witness. To this proceeding the defendant objected on the ground that a person who had been selected as a juror in a case was, by reason of such relation to the case, disqualified to testify as a witness. It is too well settled to admit of discussion that a juror is not incompetent to testify as a witness solely on account of having been impaneled and sworn in the case, if he is otherwise competent. Civil Code, § 5337; Chattanooga R. & C. R. Co. v. Owen, 90 Ga. 266 (9), and cases cited.

3. There was sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict, and none of the alleged errors were such as to require the granting of a new trial.

4. The owner of a ditch on public lands of the United States does not forfeit the same merely by nonuser.

(January 24, 1898.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Ada County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of a right of way for an irrigating ditch. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hawley & Puckett, J. H. Richards, and Hugh E. McElory, for appellant:

An action to establish a right to the possession of a right of way over which to divert water cannot be maintained exclusively of the right to divert water, especially as against one who has such right to divert.

Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122.

There is only one way, so far as this controversy is concerned, to acquire the right to the possession of a right of way over the public domain, and that is as follows: "Whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for . . . agricultural . . . purposes have vested and accrued . . . the right of way for the construction of . . . canals . . . is acknowledged and confirmed."

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2339.

Not having attempted to sustain the allegations relative to acquiring a right to the use of water, what possible claim of right can respondent have under these provisions to the right of way in controversy herein?

Since the right of way cannot exist without the water right, it follows that the same measure of diligence will be required to maintain lawful possession of the one as of the other.

Messrs. N. M. Ruick and W. E. Borah, for respondent:

Possessory rights to ditches, and possessory rights to water, may each have an existence independent of the other.

A person may convey a water right, reserving the ditch, or convey a ditch independent of the right to the use of the water accustomed to flow therein.

Kinney, Irrigation, § 224, and cases cited in note; Reed v. Spicer, 27 Cal. 58.

Interest in a water ditch is real estate, and can only be transferred by deed, prescription, or condemnation.

Burnham v. Freeman, 11 Colo. 601; Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 871.

Clifford v. Larrien (Ariz.) 11 Pac. 397, recognizes ownership of a ditch in one person, and ownership of water running therein in another.

A ditch constructed on unoccupied public lands of the United States is held by grant, and the owner of such ditch does not forfeit his right thereto merely by non-user.

Welch v. Garrett (Idaho) 51 Pac. 405.

There can be no abandonment without some action of the will and an intent to abandon, but such intent may be inferred from the acts and declarations of the party against whom the relinquishment is claimed.

Gassert v. Noyes, 18 Mont. 216; Wimer v. Simmons, 27 Or. 1.

Sullivan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover possession of a certain right of way for an irrigating ditch in Ada county, on which is situated an incomplete canal. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 18th day of January, 1896, one Eagleson located a water right, the water appropriated thereby to be used in the irrigation of certain lands therein described, and that a notice thereof was duly posted on the south bank of Bolsé river, about 1 mile above what is known as the "New York Dam Site," and nearly opposite the mouth of Sheep gulch, in Ada county (that being the place of intended diversion), whereby he claimed the waters of said river, to the amount of 300 cubic feet per second; that within the time required by law a copy of said notice was filed for record in the recorder's office of Ada county, and a duplicate copy thereof in the office of the state engineer; that said Eagleson, who is designated "promoter" in trust for the plaintiff corporation thereafter to be formed, began, within sixty days after posting said notice, to construct a canal, by surveying, laying out, and staking off a right of way. Then follows a description of said right of way, which substantially covers the the right of way claimed by the defendant corporation, and commonly known and designated as the "New York Canal Right of Way." It is also alleged that Eagleson, after said 18th day of January, 1896, became and was in the lawful and undisputed possession of said right of way, and proceeded with diligence in the construction of a ditch thereon; that thereafter, on the 10th day of February, 1896, said Eagleson, together with others, organized the corporation plaintiff and appellant, and that on the 29th of February said Eagleson conveyed to said corporation all of the rights he had acquired in and to said water right and right of way; that thereupon the plaintiff corporation took possession of said right of way, and diligently proceeded with the construction of a canal upon said right of way; that, while the plaintiff was such owner and in possession of said right of way, the defendant corporation, on or about the 20th day of April, 1896, wilfully and maliciously, with force and violence, and without right or title, drove the plaintiff, its agents and employees, therefrom, and took possession of said right of way, except that part situated between the point where the said notice of location of water right was posted and the point commonly known as the "New York Dam Site," and ever since has withheld, and still withholds, possession thereof; that defendant has committed waste on said right of way, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $1,000. The second cause of action set up in the complaint is equitable in its nature, and under it a temporary injunction was granted. Plaintiff prays judgment for possession of said right of way, and for $2,000 damages, and for an injunction. The defendant makes an answer, and files a cross complaint. In them are set forth a brief history of the organization of the Idaho Mining & Irrigation Company; its ownership of certain water rights, and the greater portion of the right of way described in the complaint; the operations of said company, and its expenditure of about $300,000 upon said right of way, in surveying and constructing a very large canal, about 6 miles in length, which resulted in the insolvency of said company, and a large indebtedness to one W. C. Bradbury for constructing said canal; the purchase of said canal, right of way, and water rights of said company by said Bradbury at sheriff's sale,—and alleges the organization of the defendant corporation, and the sale and transfer to it by Bradbury of said canal and right of way, and the work done by said defendant company thereon since its purchase thereof. The trial was by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of that part of the right of way situated above the said New York dam site; and it rendered judgment in favor of the defendant for the remainder of said right of way, or that below said dam site. A motion for a new trial was interposed by the appellant, and denied by the court. The appeal is from the judgment and an order overruling the motion for a new trial.

This appeal involves the right to the possession and ownership of that portion of said right of way below said dam site; no appeal having been taken from the judgment awarding that part of said right of way above said dam site to the appellant. It appears from the record that one Eagleson located a water right on Boise river on January 18, 1896, with a view of diverting the water by means of a canal, and surveyed a right of way therefor, which right of way was substantially the same as the right of way hereinafter referred to as the "New York Canal and Right of Way" (the intention being to appropriate said right of way), and the uncompleted canal situated thereon; that thereafter, on the 10th of February, 1896, said Eagleson, with others, organized the corporation plaintiff, and on the 29th day of February, 1896, conveyed whatever title he had acquired to said right of way and water right to said corporation; that thereupon said corporation began the construction of a canal on said right of way; that on or about April 20, 1896, the defendant corporation, through its agents and employees, drove the agents and employees of the plaintiff corporation therefrom, and took possession thereof for the defendant, except that portion situated above said New York dam site. It further appears that some time prior to the year 1890 the Idaho Mining & Irrigation Company, a corporation, had planned a system of canals for diverting water from Boise river, and designated it the "New York Canal System." That system, aside from necessary laterals, consisted of the Main canal and the Phyllis canal. The latter was taken out of Boise river about 14 miles below Boise City, was about 37 miles in length, and had a capacity of about 300 cubic feet of water per second, and was completed to Snake river in June, 1890. The Main canal was designed to be taken out in the cañon some miles above Boise City, and it was to be constructed 40 feet wide on the bottom, and to carry 12 feet in depth of water. The main canal was known as the "New York Canal," and the record shows that the water from it was to have been distributed by a system of laterals. The Phyllis canal was to be supplied with water partly from Boise river, and partly by taking up the waste water from said main canal. The Phyllis canal has been in use since its completion, in 1890. Work was begun on the New York canal in 1890, and up to April, 1891, the company had expended $300,000 in its construction, completing a section 6 miles in length, when the company became insolvent, and was owing to the contractor, W. C. Bradbury, who constructed said work, a large sum of money. Thereupon Bradbury filed a lien, under the laws of this state, upon the right of way and canal in controversy, and also upon the Phyllis canal, which lien was foreclosed, and said rights of way and canal sold at sheriff's sale to said Bradbury, who thereafter obtained a sheriff's deed to the same, February 8, 1894; said Bradbury thus became the owner of said canal system, and of all rights, interests, and privileges theretofore held and owned by said Idaho Mining & Irrigation Company. It appears that an association, composed of many farmers, began negotiation in January, 1896, with Bradbury for the purchase of said New York canal. Said association was thereafter merged in the defendant company, the Farmers' Canal Company, Limited, which company was incorporated in March, 1896. About 175 farmers became stockholders in said corporation. As a result of said negotiations, said company took possession of said canal on February 21, 1896, on which day a deed and contract were drawn between Bradbury and said company; but said deed was not delivered until April 10, 1896. It appears that W. W. Lynch, I. N. Hall, and others, located a water right on Boise river, January 24, 1896, at the mouth of the cañon above referred to, which right they thereafter conveyed to the defendant company. After defendant took possession of said canal as aforesaid, it caused the right of way below the mouth of said cañon to be resurveyed and cross-sectioned, and began work, and expended in cash and labor on said canal about $2,500, up to February, 1897. It appears that the plaintiff (the appellant company) had procured an injunction on June 6, 1896, against the defendant company, whereby said company was restrained from interfering in any manner with the right of way for said canal in said cañon, above the point where the said Lynch and Hall water location was made. Thereafter the defendant company did no work above that point. It appears that some work had been done in said cañon by the New York Canal Company, which is another name for the Idaho Mining & Irrigation Company. After Bradbury had obtained title to said canal by sheriff's deed, it appears, he procured surveys, plans, and estimates for a dam across Boise river at the lower end of said cañon, some 2 miles below the original head of the New York canal, with the avowed intention of raising water so as to use that portion of the New York canal that was completed, and also for the purpose of developing a water power, and later obtained a report upon the subject, with a view of interesting capital in the undertaking. In conveying said canal and right of way to the defendant corporation, Bradbury reserved the exclusive right to develop said water power, but conveyed to defendants two certain water rights, which are described in the deed from Bradbury to defendant, and will be hereafter referred to as water rights located by Burns and Foote.

Numerous errors are assigned, but the main question for decision is, Did the defendant establish a superior right to the possession of said right of way?

The first contention of appellant is that an action to establish a right to the possession of a right of way on the public domain, over which to divert water, cannot be maintained unless the parties have first acquired a right to divert water; and it cites § 2339, United States Rev. Stat. The respondent alleges in its cross complaint that it procured, by purchase, a water right from Bradbury; and it is contended by appellant that, as the defendant failed to prove that allegation, the right to the possession of said right of way cannot be maintained. It must be remembered that, at the date of the location of the water right and right of way under which appellant claims, Bradbury was the owner of said right of way and partially completed canal; and conceding that, because of the delay in the construction of said canal, the water rights located by Burns and Foote had been forfeited we do not think that worked a forfeiture of said uncompleted canal and right of way. At that time Bradbury was the owner of a water right consisting of 300 feet per second of the waters of said Boise river, and was diverting said water through the Phyllis canal, which was a part of said New York Canal System, and of which system said New York canal was intended, when completed, as the main canal. That being true, had Bradbury retained the ownership of the canal and right of way in dispute, he could, on the completion of said canal, have diverted through it a part or all of the water that had been appropriated for diversion through said Phyllis canal, and thus had a valid use for such canal, and a water right in connection therewith, or might have utilized said canal by water subsequently located and appropriated or purchased. The record does not show the slightest intention to abandon said right of way and canal, nor is there any proof of forfeiture. We are of the opinion that possessory rights to ditches and to the use of water may each have an existence independent of the other. A ditch may be conveyed, reserving the water right, or the water right may be conveyed, reserving the ditch. Clifford v. Larrien (Ariz.) 11 Pac. 397. Ditches and water rights are real estate, under the provisions of § 2825, Rev. Stat. See also Kinney, Irrigation, § 224; Reed v. Spicer, 27 Cal. 58. In Welch v. Garrett (Idaho) 51 Pac. 405, this court held "that a ditch constructed . . . on unoccupied public lands of the United States is held by grant, and the owner of such ditch does not forfeit his right thereto merely by nonuser." The plaintiff seeks to appropriate to its own use said canal and right of way, on the ground that its grantors had acquired a right to divert water, and had located a right of way for an irrigating ditch over and upon the right of way claimed by respondent, and places its claim on the ground that said last-named right of way had been forfeited or abandoned. Forfeiture or abandonment presupposes a prior valid right. Abandonment is a question of intention, and forfeitures are not favored, and must be clearly established. The record does not show abandonment, and we do not think the loss of the right to divert water under a specific location necessarily forfeits the right to an irrigating canal or right of way for one. It is not contended or claimed that appellant acquired title to said right of way and canal through prescription, or otherwise than by locating a right of way over it in January, 1896, at which time Bradbury was the owner and in possession thereof, and shortly thereafter sold the same to the defendant. In fact, negotiations were in progress between Bradbury and the promoters of the defendant corporation for a sale and purchase of said canal and right of way at the time plaintiffs' grantors made the alleged location.

The Lynch and Hall location had been made prior to the purchase of canal and right of way of Bradbury by defendant, and, although the defendant did not plead said Lynch and Hall water right in the trial of the case, the court permitted its proof; and that is assigned as error. Section 4225, Rev. Stat., provides that no variance between the allegations in the pleadings and proof is deemed to be material unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon its merits. Had an amendment been offered, setting forth the location and purchase of said water right, we think the court would have been warranted in allowing it; and, besides, we do not think that the variance referred to misled the plaintiff to his prejudice. Section 4231, Rev. Stat., provides that, in every stage of an action, courts must disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and that no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect. However, in our view of this case, it was not absolutely necessary for the defendant to show the purchase of said Lynch and Hall water right, to establish its right to the possession of the uncompleted canal and right of way in dispute. The Idaho Mining & Irrigation Company had expended three or four hundred thousand dollars in attempting to complete said New York Canal System, and became insolvent. The contractor, Bradbury, was a large creditor, and had done much of the work in constructing said system, and had to take the same in payment of such indebtedness. It appears that he was unable to complete said system, and sold said right of way and uncompleted canal to the defendant corporation, composed of a large number of farmers, who own land that may be irrigated from said canal extended.

Under the facts of this case, it would be repugnant to every principle of justice and equity, and would result in confiscation, to hold that plaintiff became the owner of said uncompleted canal and right of way, and was entitled to the possession thereof. We are of the opinion that Bradbury had not forfeited said canal and right of way, that he had a lawful right to sell and convey the same to the respondent, that he did so, and that respondent is the owner of said right of way, and entitled to the possession of the same.

The judgment of the court below must be affirmed, and it is so ordered, with costs in favor of respondent.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Henry WELLENVOSS et al., Appts.,
v.
GRAND LODGE OF KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS of Kentucky et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A mandatory injunction to compel the secret password of the grand lodge of a benevolent society to be given to a delegate of a subordinate lodge, and to permit him to participate in the deliberations, is not within the province of a court of equity, where it is not shown that any right of property is endangered, although an irreparable injury may be done to the delegate and to his lodge by excluding him.
2. An allegation that a person pays dues to a lodge, and that lodge pays to a grand lodge, and that both bodies are chartered benevolent societies, does not sufficiently allege that they have any rights of property in the grand lodge.

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Pulaski County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to compel defendants to recognize the right of Wellenvoss to admission to defendant's councils.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. H. Waddle for appellants.

Messrs. W. A. Morrow and James A. Garrison for appellees.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants, Henry Wellenvoss and Uhlend Lodge, No. 4, Knights of Pythias of Louisville, Kentucky, by this proceeding in the circuit court, sought a mandatory injunction against appellees, Thomas B. Mathews, grand chancellor of the Grand Lodge of the Knights of Pythias of Kentucky, and the Grand Lodge of the Knights of Pythias of Kentucky, commanding Mathews, as grand chancellor, to impart to appellant Wellenvoss the password of the grand lodge, and commanding the grand lodge to receive Wellenvoss into its body, and to permit him to participate in its deliberations as a regular authorized delegate of appellant Uhlend lodge, at the regular session of that body at Somerset, Kentucky, in September, 1895. The petition alleges that appellant Wellenvoss is a member of Uhlend lodge, in good standing, and has been since 1889, and that Uhlend lodge is a member in good standing of appellee grand lodge, and as such member is entitled to representation in the deliberations of said body, as well as to all the rights and privileges pertaining thereto, and, in accordance with its rights, had selected and commissioned appellant Wellenvoss as its representative to the grand lodge, and that appellees had wrongfully, and without right or authority, excluded appellant Wellenvoss from its deliberations. The petition also alleges that both appellant Uhlend lodge and appellee grand lodge are benevolent societies, the appellant being subordinate and deriving its charter from appellee. It is alleged that appellant Wellenvoss, by the laws of the order, pays regular dues to appellant Uhlend lodge, to be used as the lodge chooses, according to its laws; that Uhlend lodge pays regular dues to the grand lodge to defray its legitimate expenses, etc. It is alleged that, unless the court grant a mandatory injunction, great and irreparable injury will be done to both appellants, in that Wellenvoss will be deprived of his rights as representative and Uhlend lodge will be denied its right of representation. Appellants, when they filed their petition, gave notice and afterwards entered motion before the judge of the circuit court in chambers for the writ. Appellees appeared, and filed demurrer; and also filed answer; also affidavits denying appellant's right to the relief sought. Appellants filed affidavits in support of the motion, and on hearing before the judge in chambers, the writ was refused. Appellants afterwards filed an amended petition, in which the only allegation is that both appellant Uhland lodge and appellee grand lodge are regular incorporated bodies by the laws of Kentucky. On final hearing, the court sustained a demurrer to the petition as amended, and, appellants declining to plead further, the action was dismissed, and from that judgment this appeal is taken.

The question presented by this appeal is, Does the petition as amended present a cause of action? By the allegations of the petition there is no right of property involved. The only right claimed to have been violated is the social right of Wellenvoss to participate in the deliberations of the grand lodge and the right of Uhland lodge to have representation. It is not alleged that appellee grand lodge absolutely refused Uhland lodge representation, but taking the pleading in its usual way, most strongly against the pleader, the only denial by the grand lodge was the right of Wellenvoss to represent Uhland lodge, which was not a property or civil right, but only social. The petition alleges that over the subordinate lodges, of which Uhland lodge is one, there is a grand lodge for the state, appellee; and over the grand lodges of the several states a supreme lodge. It is argued by appellee that, as appellants have informed the court of the existence of a supreme body, the natural presumption would follow that appellants had a right of appeal to that tribunal, and could not be heard to complain in the courts until, at least, they had exhausted all the remedies provided in the order. There is force in this contention, but we are not prepared to say from this record that this right of appeal actually exists. The supervisory powers of the supreme body over the grand lodges, or the powers of the grand lodges over the subordinate lodges, are not disclosed by the pleadings, and we decline to speculate or presume as to these powers. By this action the chancellor is asked to compel the proper officer of a secret benevolent society to impart to a person the secret password that will admit that person to the meetings. This is sought because it is alleged, and for the purposes now will be taken as true, that, if appellant Wellenvoss be not admitted, great and irreparable injury will be done, both to Wellenvoss and Uhland lodge. It is alleged that Wellenvoss pays dues to Uhland lodge, and that Uhland lodge pays dues to appellee, the latter being its pro rata of the legitimate expense of appellee. We are of opinion that there is no right of property involved. It is not alleged that, by the denial of appellee to admit Wellenvoss to its councils, appellant Uhland lodge will lose any right of property or be endangered in any right of property. It is not alleged that appellee is possessed of any property in which appellant Uhland lodge has an interest. It is not alleged that, by the failure of Wellenvoss to gain admittance to the appellee as the representative of Uhland lodge, he will lose any right of property either in the grand lodge or in Uhland lodge. The allegation that Wellenvoss pays dues to appellant Uhland lodge, and that lodge to appellee, and that both bodies are chartered benevolent societies, does not, of itself, state such rights of property as would authorize the chancellor to interfere because of the alleged violation of the property rights. There should be some allegation showing that there is property or funds in the hands of the society in which a party is directly interested before he can ask the aid of the court for relief.

We are referred to no case that has ever held that it was within the province of a court of equity to compel by any process that the secret password or secret work of any social benevolent society be imparted to a person. On the contrary, it has been held repeatedly by this court that courts of equity cannot revise or question ordinary acts of church discipline; and in the case of Schmidt v. Abraham Lincoln Lodge, 84 Ky. 490, this court said: "The chancellor will not or cannot restore him to membership, or require that he shall be permitted to attend their stated meetings." We are of opinion that, as no right of property is involved, the chancellor could not interfere with the social relations of this society, and therefore properly denied the mandatory injunction.†

Judgment affirmed.

PHILLIPS INVESTMENT COMPANY et al.

(.....Ky.....)

An "apartment house," constructed for residence purposes only, is not a breach of a condition in a deed against using the property except for "residence purposes."

(March 12, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to restrain the erection of an apartment house. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Simrall, Bodley, & Doolan, for appellant:

The covenants embodied in the several deeds to lots in St. James Court subdivision, without regard to extraneous circumstances, prohibit the erection of the building proposed by appellees.

Gillis v. Bailey, 21 N. H. 156.

In construing this covenant the court must look to surrounding circumstances in order to ascertain the meaning of the parties.

The testimony of an architect as an expert witness is competent to show the meaning of the words "residence" and "apartment house" as architectural terms, and prove that they have a peculiar and technical signification in that science or profession.

Mr. Bennett H. Young, also for appellant:

A purchaser of land under a deed containing no conditions may nevertheless take subject to certain parol restrictions made to others by his grantor, where he had knowledge, or the opportunity to know, of such restrictions before making his purchase.

Knapp v. Hall, 20 N. Y. Supp. 44, 17 N. Y. Supp. 487; Willis v. Hulbert, 117 Mass. 151; Collins v. Tillou, 26 Conn. 368, 68 Am. Dec. 398; Hall v. Solomon, 61 Conn. 482.

In the Kentucky mind, "residence purposes" and "a residence" have a fixed and definite meaning. It has never been the habit or custom to use those words in Kentucky, except as expressing a place where a family live in a single house.

The limitation in the deed is notice to purchasers, and puts purchaser on notice.

Tallmadge v. East River Bank, 26 N. Y. 107.

A purchaser of lots takes all appurtenances, natural or acquired.

Ronan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 235; Memphis & St. L. Packet Co. v. Grey, 9 Bush, 146.

Nobody that bought these lots ever had any idea of any apartment house being erected, and such a restriction on the use of the property is not against the theory of the law, but having once been made, it should be the effort of the courts to protect parties in the exercise and use of their rights.

Mr. E. F. Trabue also for appellant.

Messrs. C. B. Seymour and George B. Eastin, for appellees:

Equity will not lend its aid by injunction in this class of cases when the covenant in question is too vague and uncertain to be specifically enforced, but will leave the party aggrieved in such case to pursue his remedy, if any, at law.

2 High, Inj. § 1135.

A restrictive covenant to the effect that the purchaser is to erect on the premises herein described "a single dwelling" does not forbid the erection of a single apartment house.

Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L. R. A. 391.

Mr. W. S. Pryor also for appellees.

Hazelrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to restrain the erection of what is known in the record as an "apartment house" on St. James' Court, in the city of Louisville. The language of the restricting clause in the conveyance controlling the matter is as follows: "It is a condition of this deed that the property herein conveyed shall be used for residence purposes only, and that, in erecting a residence therein, it shall be built of brick or stone, and shall cost not less than $7,000, and that in erecting said residence the front wall thereof shall be not less than 35 feet back from the sidewalk line of St. James' Court." It is also averred that there was a symmetrical plan for improving this court with single and segregated private residences, which would be disturbed, in fact destroyed, by the erection of the house complained of, and notice of which plan was given the public by advertisements, posters, and handbills descriptive of the character of the buildings that were to be erected in the court. The proof shows that the building complained of is to cost some $40,000, is to be of brick and stone, and its front wall is to be set back the required distance. The controversy is whether this house is to be used for residence purposes only, within the meaning of the deed. The explanation of its character and in answer to the claim that there was to be in it a public or semipublic restaurant, the originator of the scheme to erect this house testifies that "there is to be no restaurant of a public nature. There is to be everything in this house to make housekeeping comfortable. Every apartment in the house is to have a parlor and dining room and one or more bedrooms and a kitchen. Every apartment is to have more than one bedroom. There is only one four-room flat. Provision is made in the house for hot and cold water and all other conveniences. The basement, in which is to be a large dining room, to be used by the occupants of the house, if desired, also contains three sets of laundry tubs, that each apartment may have one or more days to use in laundering their linen, or to be used in any way they choose, as a laundry is used in a private residence. A part of the basement is to be used for storing the trunks of the parties who may choose to put their trunks out of their apartments. There is to be nothing about it of a cheap or nasty kind. There is but one house in St. James' Court constructed of as fine material, and that is the Conrad residence." It is shown, indeed admitted, that these different apartments or flats are places for persons to reside in; but it is contended that the language of the restriction conveys the idea of a single residence, for a single family, or, at any rate, excludes the idea of a number of residences under the same roof or in the same house. We think, however, that to give the language used this meaning would be to extend its scope beyond the expressed intention of the parties. The purposes for which the houses to be erected on the court were to be used were "residence purposes only;" and as the house in controversy is to be constructed for such purpose only, and is not to be used for any other purpose, we do not think its construction is at all prohibited by this restriction clause. If the intention had been to permit the erection of only segregated private residences, the instrument would doubtless have so provided. In Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L. R. A. 391, the purchaser covenanted to erect "a single dwelling, costing not less than $7,500, and further, "that only a single dwelling is to be constructed or placed upon each 50-foot lot." It was held that the intention was to require the property to be used for residence purposes, and, under the restrictive clauses named in the deed, stores, livery stables, warehouses, etc., could not be erected, but that flats or apartment houses could be erected. In Gillis v. Bailey, 21 N. H. 156, the language was sufficiently explicit to prohibit the erection of flats or apartment houses. The language was: "In order that the buildings erected thereon may not be crowded together, but may each be surrounded by a space of open ground; and for this purpose it has been agreed that only one single dwelling house, with a shed, barn, or other out-buildings requisite for the use of the same, shall be . . . erected," etc. We do not think the language we have here to deal with, "for residence purposes only," is as restrictive as that in either of the cases cited. The proof as to the general plan of improving this court, as shown by the advertisements of its original promoters, is indefinite, and knowledge of them was not brought home to the appellee.

We think the chancellor properly refused the relief asked, and his judgment is affirmed.

Anthony O. MANUEL.

(91 Me. 274.)

1. The liability of an innkeeper for goods stolen from a peddler's cart while in the innkeeper's custody is not avoided by the fact that the peddler had no license to peddle, as he did not lodge at the inn as a peddler.

2. A cart of a peddler who becomes a guest at an inn is delivered to the innkeeper for safe custody, within the meaning of Rev. Stat. chap. 27, § 7, when by his direction it is placed in a livery stable belonging to him, although it was not connected with the inn.

(January 22, 1898.)

Grant v. Ward, 64 Me. 240; Fayette v. Livernore, 62 Me. 236.

I have been unable to find any authority for holding that a peddler, going from town to town, in this state, selling goods, in an action to recover for the wrongful conversion of such goods, or in a case like the one at bar, is required to prove that he has a license to sell the goods, in order to maintain his action for their loss or conversion.

It is true that, formerly, it was held by this court that no action could be maintained for intoxicating liquors intended for unlawful sale in this state. But those decisions were under the statutes of 1846, 1851, and 1855,—legislation that was afterwards changed, by the enactment of our present liquor law in 1858.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case, wherein the plaintiff claims to recover of the defendant, an alleged innkeeper, for the loss of his goods while he was a guest at the defendant's inn. The plaintiff was a peddler, and stopped at the defendant's inn; and while his peddle cart was in the defendant's stable it was broken open, and the goods in question were stolen therefrom. By their verdict for the plaintiff, the jury, under instructions to which no exceptions were taken, have settled that the defendant was an innkeeper; that the plaintiff was a traveler, and a guest at the defendant's inn; and that the goods were lost while the plaintiff was defendant's guest.

The defendant contends that the plaintiff, being a peddler, and the goods lost having been merchandise carried by him for the purpose of sale, is not entitled to recover unless he shows affirmatively that he was licensed as a peddler under the provisions of the Public Laws of 1889, chap. 298. The defendant also contends that under the circumstances of the case he is liable, if at all, only as bailee, and not as innkeeper.

1. The defendant's bill of exceptions states that "there was evidence tending to show that at the time of the loss the plaintiff was traveling from town to town, and from place to place in the town of Brownville, selling said goods and chattels, in violation of § 1, chap. 298, of the Public Laws of 1889, unless the plaintiff had a license from the secretary of state so to do. There was no evidence from either plaintiff or defendant as to whether the defendant had a license or not."

The defendant requested the presiding justice to instruct the jury that "an innkeeper is not liable for the loss of merchandise carried by a peddler for the purpose of sale, who stops at said inn, unless such peddler has a license to peddle under the laws of the state." This instruction was refused.

There was no evidence in the case that the plaintiff did have or did not have a license, and the defendant claims that the burden to show a license was on the plaintiff. But we do not consider or decide this question, because, if, as we hold, the want of a license does not preclude the plaintiff from recovering, the matter of the burden of proof is immaterial.

We think that the plaintiff is not debarred from maintaining this action, though he may have had no license as a peddler.

The defendant relies upon the principles stated in Lord v. Chadbourne, 42 Me. 429, 66 Am. Dec. 290; Mohney v. Cook, 26 Pa. 342, 67 Am. Dec. 419, and other cases. It is true, in the language of Lord v. Chadbourne, 42 Me. 429, 66 Am. Dec. 290, that "the common law will afford no aid to a party whose claims can be successfully enforced only by a violation of its principles, or in direct contravention of a statutory enactment." It is true, in the language of Mohney v. Cook, 26 Pa. 342, 67 Am. Dec. 419, that "there are . . . cases wherein an injured party will be remediless, because of his own fault, even when that fault does not contribute to the accident. A vessel engaged in the slave trade, piracy, or smuggling, and injured by another, or the keeper of a gambling house, injured in his business by a neighboring nuisance, could have no remedy. Not, however, because the persons are out of the protection of the law for their offenses, nor because their illegal business brought them to the place of danger, but because their business itself, with all its instruments, is outlawed. Prohibited contracts, prohibited trades, prohibited things, receive no protection." Among such prohibited contracts is the sale of intoxicating liquor intended for illegal sale in this state (Wasserboehr v. Boulter, 84 Me. 165); the sale of hay pressed and baled, and not branded (Burton v. Hamblen, 32 Me. 448); the sale of lumber not surveyed and marked (Richmond v. Foss, 77 Me. 590); the sale of hoops not culled (Durgin v. Dyer, 68 Me. 143).

All such sales are expressly or by implication forbidden by law. So, a party has been held remediless who seeks to enforce a contract made on Sunday. Towle v. Larrabee, 26 Me. 464. And he who suffers an injury arising from his violation of the Sunday law, so-called, is equally without remedy. Wheelden v. Lyford, 84 Me. 114.

The language in Lord v. Chadbourne and in Mohney v. Cook, above cited, is a correct statement of a general proposition. How inap-plicable it is to the case at bar can easily be seen when we look at the questions which were decided in these cases. In the former, the precise question decided was that under the provisions of the statute of 1851, chap. 211, § 16, no action whatever could be maintained for intoxicating liquors or their value. Intoxicating liquors were thus practically outlawed. Trespass against a wrongdoer, even could not be maintained. But when the statute was modified the rule was modified accordingly, and it was thereafter held that trespass would lie for the unauthorized conversion of intoxicating liquors, even though they were intended for illegal sale in this state. Hamilton v. Goding, 55 Me. 419; Bliss v. Winslow, 80 Me. 274; Adams v. McGlinchy, 66 Me. 474. In Mohney v. Cook, 26 Pa. 349, 67 Am. Dec. 419, the question actually decided was that a party who erects an obstruction in a navigable stream, and thereby occasions an injury to another, cannot, in an action for such injury, set up as a defense that the plaintiff was unlawfully engaged in worldly employment on Sunday, when the injury occurred.

It will be seen in the illustrations which we have given that a remedy has been refused because the plaintiff's right of action was directly connected with, or grew out of, a violation of law. But it is not unlawful for a peddler, with or without license, to put up at an inn. The plaintiff did not lodge at the defendant's inn as a peddler, but as an individual. As a property owner, merely, he intrusted his property to the defendant's safekeeping. It was not unlawful for him to eat, drink, and be sheltered in an inn, nor to deliver, or offer to deliver, his money and other property to the innkeeper for safe custody. If his property consisted of merchandise carried by him for the purpose of sale without a license, in violation of law, it was none the less property. A peddler may lawfully care for and protect his property. If he exposes it for sale, or sells it, without license, he may be fined. No penalty attaches to the merchandise itself. It cannot be seized or forfeited. It is neither contraband nor outlawed. The rights and liabilities which exist between the innkeeper and his guest, who is a peddler, are created by law, and grow out of the relation between them, and are in no degree dependent upon the purpose of the owner to sell the goods at some future time without license. It is therefore the opinion of the court that, even if the plaintiff had no license to peddle, that fact would not constitute a defense to this action, and that the requested instruction was properly refused.

2. The evidence tended to show that the defendant's stable, where the plaintiff's peddle cart was kept, was a livery stable, unconnected with the inn, and known by the plaintiff to be so. The defendant directed the plaintiff to take his horse and cart to the stable. The plaintiff did so, and there put them into the care of the defendant's hostler. The defendant requested that the jury be instructed that "an innholder is not liable for the loss of merchandise carried by a peddler who stops with said innholder, which is left by such peddler in a livery stable known by said peddler to be a livery stable, and not connected with said inn." This request was refused, and we think correctly refused.

The defendant does not claim that an innkeeper may not be liable for the loss of the merchandise of his guest, under some circumstances; but he insists that when the plaintiff left his cart in the livery stable, "not connected" with the inn, the defendant's liability, at the most, was that of bailee, and not that of innkeeper. As the stable belonged to the defendant, and was used by him for putting up the team of his guest, we understand the expression "not connected," as applied to the stable, to mean that the stable was not physically attached to the inn,—that it stood in a different place.

By the statute law of this state (Rev. Stat. chap. 27, § 7) an innkeeper is not liable for goods such as it is claimed were lost in this case, except upon delivery, or offer of delivery, by the guest to the innholder, his agents or servants, for safe custody. The plaintiff put up at the defendant's inn. He thereby became a guest. He had a horse and peddle cart. He was directed by the defendant to take them to the stable. He did so. He put them into the care of the defendant's hostler. This constituted a statutory delivery to the defendant. It is clear that the delivery was "for safe custody," and in this respect this case is unlike the cases cited by the defendant, where a peddler took his merchandise to a separate room to show and sell (Neal v. Wilcox, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 146, 67 Am. Dec. 266), or where one procured from the landlord a lot in which to keep his hogs and horses for the purpose of showing and selling them (Burgess v. Clements, 4 Maule & S. 306), or where one had a room especially for the purpose of keeping or selling his goods (Carter v. Hobbs, 12 Mich. 52, 83 Am. Dec. 762).

When the plaintiff's goods were thus delivered to the defendant for safe custody, they were infra hospitium. Though the defendant directed them to be placed in a stable "not connected" with his inn, his liability was not modified or discharged. It was his stable. It was the place he selected in which to keep the goods safely. That the place was not connected with the inn does not control. Hilton v. Adams, 71 Me. 19. It was a single transaction,—the putting up at the inn, and the delivery of the goods to the defendant. We cannot doubt but that the defendant received the plaintiff's goods as an innkeeper. Norcross v. Norcross, 53 Me. 163, and cases cited; Clute v. Wiggins, 14 Johns. 175, and note to same case, 7 Am. Dec. 449. The refusal of the presiding justice to give the requested instruction was right.

The defendant waives his other exceptions.
Exceptions overruled.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

MAYOR, etc., OF BALTIMORE, Appl.,
v.

FAIRFIELD IMPROVEMENT COM-PANY et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. The mere power to erect and maintain hospitals and pest houses does not imply or include the further power to erect and maintain them in such a way or at such a place as will cause injury to others.
2. Serious injury to the value of the property of the residents of a locality by the establishment of a pest house in the vicinity will warrant an injunction against it.
3. Persons who locate near a pest house which was not a nuisance when established because it was a secluded locality are not deprived of redress if they are injured by it, merely because they have voluntarily chosen to reside in close proximity to it, unless the right to maintain has ripened by prescription into an indefeasible right.
4. An abandonment of the use of property for a quarantine station, which will preclude the subsequent resumption of its use for persons with contagious diseases after people have built residences in the vicinity in reliance on such abandonment, is made when the city discontinues such use and establishes a quarantine station elsewhere, and later on, after improvements have progressed in the vicinity, burns up the hospital buildings and pest houses, and, by resolution, directs the sale of the property.
5. A contract for the care of a woman in the advanced stages of leprosy, by a laborer and his wife, who are unskilled people and have no authority to restrain her from wandering away, and who have several small children in their family, is an unreasonable one, the execution of which may be restrained, because of its tendency to cause a dissemination of the disease.
6. A perpetual injunction may be granted against the execution of a contract for the care of a person having leprosy, when its tendency is not to protect the community, but to cause a dissemination of the disease.

APPPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City enjoining defendant from using certain property as a hospital for the care of a person afflicted with leprosy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas I. Elliott for appellant.

Messrs. J. Charles Linthicum and Enoch Harlan, for appellee, Fairfield Improvement Company:

Equity will restrain certain nuisances by injunction.

Am. Rep. 654; Brantly's Digest, 743, No. 5; 744, No. 11.

The true criterion as to whether a nuisance is sufficient for a court of equity to interfere by injunction is, "whether the nuisance complained of will or does produce such a condition of things as, in the judgment of reasonable men, is naturally productive of actual physical discomfort to persons of ordinary sensibilities, and of ordinary tastes and habits, and as, in view of the circumstances of the case, is unreasonable and in derogation of the rights of the complainant."

Where the nuisance operates to destroy health, or impair the comfortable enjoyment of property, an action at law furnishes no adequate remedy, and protection by injunction must be given.

Eddy v. Board of Health, 10 Phila. 94.

Messrs. John P. Poe and Robert Moss, for appellees, commissioners of Anne Arundel County:

A court of equity has the same power to enjoin a municipal corporation from establishing or continuing a nuisance as it has to enjoin an individual, and what would be a nuisance, if committed by an individual, will be treated in a court of equity as none the less a nuisance because ordered to be committed by a municipality.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. p. 448, note, and cases there cited.

If, on the one hand, it be argued that leprosy is a loathsome, dangerous, and contagious disease, then in sending her to the neighborhood in question, the appellants were unquestionably establishing what in law is a nuisance, dangerous to life and health, irreparably destructive to property and property rights, and plainly within the power of the court to restrain by injunction.

Haag v. Vanderburgh County Comrs. 60 Ind. 511, 28 Am. Rep. 654.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal was taken from a decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city. That decree enjoined the mayor and city council of Baltimore from placing and keeping on a 20-acre tract of land owned by the city an unfortunate woman afflicted with leprosy. This land adjoins property belonging to the Fairfield Improvement Company of Baltimore, and the property of the company is divided into building lots. Many lots have been sold, and quite a number of houses have been built in the vicinity of the city's land. This 20-acre tract was acquired by the city perhaps half a century ago. It is situated some 8 miles distant from the city, and lies in Anne Arundel county. Up until the year 1883 it was occupied as a place of quarantine against contagious diseases brought towards the city by water, and there were hospitals upon it that were used for the isolation and treatment of similar diseases originating or found in the city during the prevalence of epidemics. In about the year just named the mayor and city council purchased other property, located near Hawkins Point, some 16 miles distant from the city, and there established a quarantine station, which has ever since been in charge of a resident physician selected by the city. There have been no cases of contagious or infectious diseases treated upon this 20-acre lot or tract since 1882 or 1883, and it was subsequent to that time that the Fairfield Improvement Company's property was developed. A great many persons, chiefly employees of fertilizer and other factories, now reside in Fairfield; and doubtless they located there in the belief that the city had permanently abandoned the hospitals and pest houses formerly used in that locality. The ground upon which the relief by injunction was sought is the apprehended injury to the company's contiguous property by the placing of a person suffering with such a loathsome and horrible disease in close proximity thereto. The statute law of the state confers upon the mayor and city council plenary power to establish, both within and beyond the city's limits, hospitals and pest houses for the isolation and treatment of contagious and infectious diseases. Code Pub. Local Laws, art. 4, §§ 378, 409. The preservation of the public health renders such legislation highly essential, and the authority of the general assembly to enact it, in the exercise of the police power of the state, is beyond question or controversy. Within the scope of the power thus granted, the whole authority of the state is included and delegated (Harrison v. Baltimore, 1 Gill, 264), and, therefore, whatever the state may directly do in furtherance of these objects, the municipality, clothed with a delegated power from the state, may also lawfully perform, though there may be a difference as to the legal consequences resulting from an exercise of the power by the state directly and those flowing from an exertion of the same power by the municipality. If it be conceded that the state may, in exercising a public power, create a private nuisance with immunity, the immunity grows out of the public necessity, and rests upon the state's sovereignty; but it cannot, or, at all events, will not, in the absence of an explicit legislative declaration, be assumed that the state would, if directly exercising the same power, so exercise it as to produce or cause an injury to the rights of property of an individual, unless, perhaps, the very doing of the act directed to be done will necessarily and unavoidably, under any condition, result in the creation of what would be, but for the authorization, a private nuisance. The delegation of a power to do an act, while conferring full authority to perform the act itself, does not, therefore, without more, essentially and without exception carry the right to so do it as to inflict loss or injury upon an innocent individual. As thus understood, the power of the municipality to erect and maintain hospitals and pest houses may be exerted and applied precisely as the same power, if not delegated, could have been availed of by the state. Acts done under such delegated authority, which without that authority would in themselves be public nuisances, furnish no ground for civil or criminal proceedings at the instance of the state; for the authority to do the acts makes them, when done, perfectly lawful as respects the public, and, being lawful, there is no superior public right which they invade or violate. These are what have been sometimes described as "legalized nuisances" (Wood, Nuisances, chap. 23), since they are strictly necessary and probable results of legislative authorization. They ultimately rest for their sanction upon the paramount power of the legislature, and the importance of the public benefit and convenience involved in their continuance as affecting the greatest good to the greatest number. Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036. But, however free from interference by the public acts of this character may be when authorized to be done by a municipality under competent and sufficient legislative grant, the right of an individual to complain of the special injury sustained by him as a consequence of their being done is, ordinarily, in no way impaired or affected. The mere naked grant of power to a municipality to do acts which, if done without the sanction of that power, would be nuisances, does not, in all instances, carry with it a guaranty of immunity from claims for private injuries that result directly from the exercise of the power. And this is necessarily so in the absence of an explicit or implicit legislative declaration to the contrary, because the legislature cannot be presumed from a general grant of authority to have intended to sanction or legalize any acts or any use of property that will create a private nuisance which will injuriously affect the property of another. That the state may, in the exercise of the police power, and for the preservation of the public health, authorize the summary destruction of private property contaminated with the germs of disease, is thoroughly and definitively settled. Deems v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 174, 175, 28 L. R. A. 541; Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205. But there is a broad distinction between a summary destruction of an offending thing and a direct injury to unoffending property; that is, property itself not liable to destruction because not dangerous to the public health or safety. The immediate and imminent danger to life or health justify, under the police power, the one; while the other is left to be redressed in the due course of law. However broad, therefore, may be the powers of a municipality to erect and maintain hospitals and pest houses for the segregation and treatment of contagious and infectious diseases, and however necessary their exercise may be, they must, generally speaking, be exerted and put into operation subject to the no less well-defined right of the individual to possess and enjoy his unoffending property without the molestation of a nuisance. It cannot be pretended that the city authorities could, even under their comprehensive powers, locate a pest house in the midst of a thickly settled community. The right to locate the pest house does not carry with it or include the right to locate it in a place where other persons would be exposed to the contagion and disease. "Powers given by statute are not to be used to the peril of the lives or limbs of the Queen's subjects. They are to be exercised reasonably, and with due care, so as not by negligence to cause dangers to others."—observed Watson, B., as quoted in 2 Addison, Torts, § 1041. Where commissioners of sewers and boards of health have obtained statutory powers of drainage into rivers, streams, and natural watercourses, the power must be exercised so as not to create a nuisance, or interfere with the private rights of individuals. 2 Addison, Torts, § 1085. The mere power to erect and maintain hospitals and pest houses does not imply or include the further power to erect and maintain them in such a way or at such a place as will cause injury to others. And so in Broer v. New York, 3 Barb. 254, it was held that statutory authority given to commissioners of emigration to lease or purchase docks where emigrants may be landed will not justify them in leasing for that purpose property situated in a thickly populated part of a city, where the contemplated use of the premises would be a serious menace to the health of the community. See, too, Harford County Comrs. v. Wise, 71 Md. 52, 53; West Orange Twp. v. Field, 37 N. J. Eq. 600, 45 Am. Rep. 670; Danbury & N. R. Co. v. Norwalk, 37 Conn. 109; Seifert v. Brooklyn, 101 N. Y. 136, 54 Am. Rep. 664; Wood, Nuisances, § 764.

Whatever immunity a municipality may have in exercising a public, as contradistinguished from a strictly corporate, power, it does not result from some collateral act, or from the negligent doing of a permissible act. The infliction of an injury upon another is neither the natural nor the necessary result of an exercise of the power to build a hospital; but, if injury does ensue, it would result from the collateral circumstance that the place selected was not the appropriate site, or from the negligent method of doing what would otherwise be a lawful act.

Assuming at this point that leprosy is a contagious disease which is a menace to the health of a community, and assuming also that the mayor and city council through its health department were about to utilize this 20-acre tract of land for the first time for the erection of a pest house thereon for the reception of this particular patient, there can, in view of the legal principles just discussed, and in the light of the facts to which allusion has been made, be no doubt as to right of the Fairfield Improvement Company to invoke the restraining aid of a court of equity to prevent the establishment of such a nuisance. Wood, Nuisances, § 796. But it is insisted that the company went to the nuisance, and it is denied that the nuisance went to the company, and therefore it is contended that the relief sought cannot be granted. Though there cannot be a prescriptive right to maintain a public nuisance, there may be such a right as to a private one. The authority given by the legislature to the city to erect such a pest house prevents it, when erected and used, from being a public nuisance. If it be no nuisance at all when erected, because of being erected in a secluded locality, persons who afterwards locate near it are not, if injured, deprived of redress merely because they have voluntarily chosen to reside in close proximity to it, if the right to maintain it has not ripened by prescription into an indefeasible right. This doctrine was settled in Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Malone, 78 Md. 280, 281, 9 L. R. A. 787, and is fully supported by the cases therein cited.

This brings us to an examination of the facts, so that we may determine whether they fall within the principles we have been considering. Leprosy is, and has always been, universally regarded with horror and loathing, and it is conceded to be an incurable disease. In past ages its unfortunate victims, shunned and avoided by their fellow men, viewed by all with superstitious dread, wandered about the open country, naked and starving. Hospitals for the relief of those smitten with the terrible malady seem to have been unknown in antiquity. The sufferers were eventually isolated in villages occupied by them exclusively. With the tide of emigration westward during the decline of the Roman empire, leprosy was spread over Europe, and in the Middle Ages it prevailed to an alarming extent; its principal ravages dating from the crusades. The influence of Christianity tempered the rigor of the affliction, and as early as 583 the third council of Lyons directed the bishops of each city to feed and support the lepers at the expense of the church. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, hospitals and asylums were numbered by hundreds in almost every country. But, whether isolated in villages in the East, or segregated in hospitals in the West, the leper was completely and forever an outcast, being considered both legally and politically dead. The advance of civilization, while in a measure ameliorating his condition, and checking the spread of the pestilence, stripped the disease of none of the dread with which it had always been regarded by the great majority of mankind. The horror of its contagion is as deep-seated to-day as it was more than 2,000 years ago in Palestine. There are modern theories and opinions of medical experts that the contagion is remote, and by no means dangerous; but the popular belief of its perils, founded on the Biblical narrative, on the stringent provisions of the Mosaic law that show how dreadful were its ravages and how great the terror which it excited, and an almost universal sentiment, the result of a common concurrence of thought for centuries, cannot, in this day, be shaken or dispelled by mere scientific asseveration or conjecture. It is not, in this case, so much a mere academic inquiry as to whether the disease is in fact highly or remotely contagious, but the question is whether, viewed as it is by the people generally, its introduction into a neighborhood is calculated to do a serious injury to the property of the plaintiff there located. As to this the record leaves no room for doubt. That the disease is contagious no one seems to deny. Its liability to contaminate others is the element that makes its introduction into a community a nuisance, and when it is conceded that the purpose is to place this woman, having a fully developed and far-advanced attack of leprosy, in charge of a laborer and his wife who have had no experience in such a case, and who have several small children in their family, the danger of spreading the contagion is perfectly obvious. It will not do to say that the children are to be separated from their parents. There would be great hazard of their being brought in contact with the patient. The record abundantly shows that the Fairfield Improvement Company's property will be seriously lessened in value, that residents of the vicinity will abandon their homes, if this unfortunate and afflicted woman should be placed where the city proposes to confine her. On this branch of the case we entertain no doubt that the facts fully warranted the issuing of the injunction. "In all such cases the question is whether the nuisance complained of will or does produce such a condition of things as, in the judgment of reasonable men, is naturally productive of actual physical discomfort to persons of ordinary sensibilities and of ordinary tastes and habits, and as, in view of the circumstances of the case, is unreasonable and in derogation of the rights of the complainant." Dittman v. Repp, 50 Md. 521, 522, 83 Am. Rep. 325; Wood, Nuisances, § 66, and note 4, and cases therein cited. Inasmuch as the infliction of injury on any individual was not necessarily contemplated in the grant of the power referred to,—that is to say, was not a necessary and inevitable consequence of an exercise of the power to maintain a hospital,—the right to maintain it at this particular place in the existing circumstances cannot be put on the ground of explicit or implicit authorization; and it remains now to inquire whether a prescriptive right is possessed by the city to build or to continue a pest house in the vicinity of Fairfield. Had the city never abandoned this locality as a place for the confinement and treatment of contagious diseases, it is very doubtful whether its right to place this patient there could now be challenged. It is equally doubtful whether the adjoining property would ever have been improved and peopled as it now is if the old quarantine station, hospitals, and pest houses had not been long ago discontinued. In 1883, when the new quarantine property at Hawkins Point was purchased, this 20-acre tract was in point of fact abandoned by the city as a place for the isolation of contagious diseases. Later on, and after improvements had progressed in the vicinity, the hospital buildings and pest houses were burned by the city health officers; and still later a resolution was adopted by the city council directing the sale of the property, except that portion which had been used as a burying ground for those who died during the epidemics years ago. When persons have acted on the belief, founded on such palpable evidence, indicating that the city had physically abandoned this property for the isolation and treatment of contagious diseases, it is too late, especially when that physical abandonment has been followed by the passage of a resolution actually directing the property to be sold, to assert the right to restore the place to its former uses, if such a restoration would cause injury to those who have in good faith relied on the conduct of the city in actually discontinuing the use of the property for the purposes of quarantine and isolation. The conclusion of fact we draw from the record is that there was an abandonment of this property by the city when it removed its quarantine officers and attendants to Hawkins Point; and the city cannot now, to the detriment of the appellee, resume the occupation of this place for the detention of this patient. She must be placed elsewhere. The evidence shows, as we have indicated, that the health authorities of the city propose to place this woman in the charge of a laborer and his wife. A contract has been made with them, and under it this laborer and his wife agree to care for the patient. They are unskilled people. They possess no authority to restrain the woman from wandering away, and they have no legal right to detain her against her will. They are not officers of the city, nor clothed with any of the powers of the board of health. They are simply employed by the city to care for this woman on the city's property, where no health officer or city official is stationed. The mere fact that the place of her proposed detention belongs to the city adds nothing to the power of the laborer to hold her; and most certainly these facts do not amount to the establishment of a hospital under the power which the city possesses. The contract is, on its face, unreasonable. Its tendency is to cause a dissemination of the disease, and not to protect the community; and for this, if for no other reason, the injunction ought to be made perpetual. There was no error committed in granting the relief prayed, and the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs above and below.

1. Certificates of stock, even when indorsed in blank for the purpose of authorizing the making of an instrument of transfer over the signature, are not negotiable securities.
2. A signature to a blank transfer of certificates of stock, plainly showing that it is made by a guardian of infant owners, will not pass a good title to one who takes them before any transfer on the books of the corporation, without inquiry and merely as a pledge for a debt from the cashier of a bank in which they were placed for safe keeping, but from which they were feloniously taken by the cashier.
3. Negligence which will work an estoppel against reclaiming property must be a proximate cause of the purchase or advancement of money by the holder of the property, and must enter into the transaction itself.
4. The negligence of a guardian in leaving certificates of stock indorsed with her signature in a bank for safe keeping is not the proximate cause of the advance of money upon them to a cashier of the bank who feloniously takes them, since this criminal conduct could not reasonably be anticipated.
5. The decree of a probate court ordering the sale by a guardian of shares of stock owned by infants is void, when it was made without any notice to them or to the guardian, upon a petition signed in the guardian's name without any authority.

(June 15, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendants Gray et al. from judgments of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to reach certain shares of stock in the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, which belonged to the plaintiffs, who were minors, but which had been wrongfully transferred until they reached the possession of appellants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry S. Dewey, for appellants:

By the signing in blank of the transfer indorsed upon the certificates, and by the delivery of the certificates so indorsed, a valid transfer of the title to the stock was effected, by which both the guardian and the wards are bound.

Andrews v. Worcester, N. & R. R. Co. 159 Mass. 64; Central Nat. Bank v. Williston, 138 Mass. 244; Fitchburg Sav. Bank v. Torrey, 134 Mass. 239; Stone v. Hackett, 12 Gray. 227.

At common law, a guardian may sell the personal property of his ward without obtaining any special license or authority, and a bona fide purchaser from him of such property is protected and is entitled to the property, even though the guardian misappropriates the proceeds of the sale; and this rule applies to shares of stock.

Craig*, 6 Leigh, 399; Lamar v. Micou, 112 U. S. 452, 28 L. ed. 751; Maclay v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 152 U. S. 499, 38 L. ed. 528.

The statute of this commonwealth relating to the granting by the probate courts of authority for the sale of personal property by guardians does not change the rule of common law as to the power of the guardian to sell; for this statute is permissive, and not restrictive, and the purpose is only to provide a mode by which the guardian may obtain in advance a judicial approval of the sale.

It is within the power of an executor or administrator to pledge shares of stock belonging to the estate, and the pledgee is protected, even though he knew that the executor pledged it as an executor.

A guardian cannot properly, or even legally, take in his own name a certificate of stock belonging to his ward.

The guardian has no title.

Estoppel in pais arises "independently of contract, from act or conduct which has induced a change of position in accordance with the real or apparent intention of the party against whom the estoppel is alleged."

Bigelow, Estoppel, 5th ed. 8, 453.

Where a pledgee of certificates of stock indorsed in blank takes the certificates and sells or pledges them to another, who takes such certificates in good faith and for value and without notice that his vendor or pledgee held them as a pledge, the purchaser or pledgee from the pledgee is as fully protected in his rights as though the person with whom he dealt was the absolute owner of the stock.

The pledgee of stock has practically no protection as to his stock except the honesty and responsibility of his pledgee. The bona fide purchaser or pledgee from the pledgee is equally protected whether the certificates of stock are indorsed by the pledgee or vendor, or are indorsed in blank by some previous holder.

The assignment of the certificate of stock estops the transferor from claiming any further title in the stock as against subsequent bona fide transferees, although such assignment be not registered.

Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 8d ed. § 378, and cases cited.

The decree of the probate court having jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter, authorizing the sale of the stock, is conclusive, and cannot be attacked in any collateral proceedings; not even could it be attacked in a court of equity for fraud.

Messrs. R. Foster and H. J. Ryan for appellees.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Each of the plaintiffs is the owner of stock in the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, represented by certificates in the possession of Gray, Dewey, & Co., the defendants. The plaintiff in the first case owned two certificates, —one for nineteen shares, and one for twelve shares,—both of which passed into the hands of the appellants, and were surrendered by them in exchange for a new certificate for thirty-one shares, issued in their own names. The plaintiff in the second case is the owner of one certificate for twelve shares, which the defendants received, and which has not been surrendered. Both of the plaintiffs are minors, and their respective certificates were made in their own names. These certificates were deposited for safe-keeping by their mother, who was their guardian, in the Pittsfield National Bank. While the certificates were in the bank, the guardian borrowed money from the bank for her personal use, for which she gave her notes, and at the same time signed upon the back of each of her son's certificates a blank form of transfer, with a signature as follows: "Simon John O'Herron, by Mrs. Catherine O'Herron, Guardian." In like manner, on her daughter's certificate, she signed with the signature, "Nora L. O'Herron, by Mrs. Catherine O'Herron, Guardian," and left the certificates as collateral security for the payment of her notes. This transaction occurred on or about December 17, 1889. On or about December 20, 1889, the cashier of the bank, one Francis, who had access to the vault where these certiates were kept, took them, without authority from anybody, and delivered them to the defendants as security for one of his personal debts. In May, 1890, the guardian paid her notes at the bank. Some time in the year 1891, the defendants took the two certificates standing in the name of Simon John O'Herron to the office of the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, and asked to transfer the stock, and have a new certificate issued in their own names. The corporation refused to permit a transfer of the stock or the issue of new certificates, without a decree of the probate court authorizing the sale of the stock. Thereupon the defendants requested Francis to procure such a decree. He then had a petition prepared by the register of the probate court for the county of Berkshire, in the name of the guardian, praying for leave to sell and transfer the certificates, and he signed the petition as follows: "Catherine O'Herron, Guardian, by E. S. Francis." On this petition, on July 21, 1891, the probate court issued a decree in the usual form, authorizing the guardian to sell or transfer the whole or any part of the stock. All this was done without notice of the petition by publication or otherwise, either to the plaintiffs or to their guardian, and without the knowledge of either of them. The transfer of the stock was then made on the books of the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, and a new certificate for thirty-one shares issued to the defendants. Francis continued to act as cashier of the bank until his death, by suicide, on or about July 27, 1893, when his fraudulent conduct was discovered, and his estate was found to be insolvent. He paid the dividends on the stock to the plaintiffs' guardian regularly as long as he lived. At the time of receiving the certificates, the defendants supposed that Francis was rightfully in possession of them, and they had no notice of his want of authority to pledge them, except the form of the certificates and of the transfers. The question is whether the defendants acquired a good title to the stock as against the plaintiffs. It is not necessary to consider the original claim of the bank to the stock as security for the loans to the guardian, as the loans were paid. It is clear that the guardian had no right to pledge the stock, and we do not intimate that the bank acquired a valid title to it.

Francis, under whom the defendants derived their title, had no right to the certificates, but held them feloniously. They were the general property of the plaintiffs, and the special property of the bank, which had the possession of them as bailee. The act of Francis in taking them, and pledging them as his own, if not larceny at common law, was at least embezzlement, which, by our statute, is deemed to be larceny. Pub. Stat. chap. 203, §§ 87, 41. A bona fide purchaser for value, from one who has taken property in such a way, acquires no title to it. The only exception to this rule is when the property consists of negotiable securities. Heckle v. Lurvey, 101 Mass. 344, 345, 3 Am. Rep. 366; Spooner v. Holmes, 102 Mass. 503, 507, 3 Am. Rep. 491. But certificates of stock, even when indorsed in blank for the purpose of authorizing the making of an instrument of transfer over the signature, are not negotiable securities. This is settled by the highest authority. Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, 388, 1 Am. Rep. 115, 97 Am. Dec. 107; Shaw v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 557, 565, 566, 25 L. ed. 892; Knor v. Eden Musee American Co. 148 N. Y. 441, 31 L. R. A. 779; Bangor Electric Light & P. Co. v. Robinson, 52 Fed. Rep. 520; London & C. Bkg. Co. v. London & R. Plate Bank, L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 232. It is plain, therefore, that the defendants cannot maintain their claim on the ground that the nature of the property takes it out of the general rule that no title can be acquired from one who has no title.

It is contended that Stat. 1884, chap. 229, is applicable to these cases. If we assume in favor of the defendants that this statute will protect a bona fide purchaser or pledgee for value to whom a certificate of stock has been delivered with a written transfer of it, or a written power of attorney to sell, assign, or transfer it, signed by the owner, it does not help the defendants. The signature on the back of these certificates was not that of the owner, but of a guardian whose trust relation to the property was disclosed on the face of the papers. In their report on the revision of the statutes (1834), the commissioners say, in a note to chapter 79, § 22 (which is § 21 in the final enactment), that they have made the provision as to sales of property by guardians the same as that for trustees appointed under wills. The provision for trustees under wills is found in Rev. Stat. chap. 69, § 11, in Gen. Stat. chap. 100, § 14, and, with certain broader provisions from more recent legislation, in Pub. Stat. chap. 141, § 20. The provision in regard to guardians is found in Gen. Stat. chap. 109, § 22. As a part of the history of the legislation, see also Stat. 1817, chap. 190, § 35, and Stat. 1820, chap. 54, § 3. It is the duty of one purchasing property held by a trustee to ascertain whether the transaction appears to be within the trustee's authority. Atkinson v. Atkinson, 8 Allen, 15; Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, 1 Am. Rep. 115, 97 Am. Dec. 107; Loring v. Salisbury Mills, 125 Mass. 138; Smith v. Burgess, 133 Mass. 511; Loring v. Brodie, 134 Mass. 453; Colonial Bank v. Cady, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 267; Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 Wall. 165, 21 L. ed. 142.

The statute does not protect the purchaser in a case like the present.

It is contended, further, that the plaintiffs are estopped from reclaiming their property by the negligence of their guardian in leaving their certificates at the bank, indorsed with her signature. The principle which the defendants invoked is not applicable to the facts. Negligence which will work an estoppel of this kind must be a proximate cause of the purchase or advancement of money by the holder of the property, and must enter into the transaction itself. Sean v. North British Australasian Co. 7 Hurlst. & N. 603, 2 Hurlst. & C. 175; Colonial Bank v. Cady, L. R. 15 App. Cas. 268, 282; Barendale v. Bennett, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 525, 530; Picker v. London County Bkg. Co. L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 515; Knor v. Eden Musee American Co. 148 N. Y. 441, 31 L. R. A. 779; Arnold v. City Bank, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 578, 587, 588; Schofield v. Earl Lonsborough [1895] 1 Q. B. 586 [1896] A. 40 L. R. A.

C. 514; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Davenport, 97 U. S. 871, 24 L. ed. 1049; Bangor Electric Light & P. Co. v. Robinson, 52 Fed. Rep. 520.

If the negligence is such as might be an appropriate foundation for an action at law to recover damages by one who advances his money, it may be availed of by way of estoppel, to avoid circuity of action. But the facts of this case fall short of showing such negligence. The guardian intrusted the certificates to a national bank of good reputation. Neither she nor anybody else had any reason to anticipate the larceny or embezzlement of the property, and a fraudulent use of it, to deceive others, by a trusted officer of the bank. She had no reason to expect that, if the certificates were stolen, anybody would take them without inquiring whether, as trust property, they had been disposed of by the guardian for the benefit of her wards. The conduct of the guardian was not a cause, but a mere condition, of the defendants' advance of money upon the faith of the certificates. A criminal act of Francis intervened as the cause of the defendants' loss; and this the guardian had no reason to anticipate.

When the certificates of stock came into the hands of the defendants they showed on their face that they had not been assigned or transferred by their owners, but only by one who stood in a relation of trust to the owners. The transfer had not been completed, and the stock still stood in the names of the plaintiffs on the books of the corporation. There was only a signature of the guardian upon each certificate, appended to a blank which contained nothing to show the nature of the transaction by which it came into the hands of Francis. There was nothing to indicate that the plaintiffs had received value for the stock. Francis, who presented the certificates, was using them solely for his personal benefit. On the face of the paper there was notice to the defendants that they were trust property while in the hands of the guardian. The defendants were put upon inquiry, and they had no right to receive them as a pledge for Francis's debt, without at least having information of facts which would warrant them in believing that the plaintiffs' interests had been protected in the transaction by which they came into the hands of Francis. Apparently they made no inquiry, but took them as they were, knowing that the plaintiffs were to receive nothing from the disposition which Francis then made of them. We are of opinion that there is no principle of estoppel that can be invoked in favor of the defendants to deprive the plaintiffs of their property.

The decree of the probate court does not give effect to the claim of the defendants. It was not made until long after the transfer to them. It purported to authorize a sale of the stock, and not a pledge of it, much less a pledge of it for the benefit of others than the plaintiffs. But, above all, the probate court acquired no jurisdiction of the case as against the plaintiffs. No case nor any proper party was ever before the court in regard to the sale of the stock. The unauthorized signature and appearance of Francis availed nothing as against the plaintiffs or their guardian.

Jochumsen v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 3 Allen, 87; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 46, 38 L. ed. 896, 901.

The fact that the Pittsfield National Bank is paying the expenses of the plaintiffs' litigation is immaterial. The plaintiffs are proceeding in their own rights and on their own equities. They may elect to proceed to recover back their stock, even though they might have a different kind of remedy against the bank. There is nothing in law or in equity to forbid their acceptance of such aid in the litigation as the bank may, for its own interest, choose to render them. There is no privity between the bank and the appellants. The act of Francis by which the appellants obtained their possession was a wrong against the bank and the plaintiffs, as well as against the defendants.

Decree in each case affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

BUSINESS MEN'S LEAGUE et al., Respts., v.

James R. WADDILL, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. The mere possibility of injury by an unconstitutional statute, which may prevent insurance companies from making such contracts as persons might otherwise procure them to make, will not authorize injunctive relief in behalf of those who wish such contracts.
2. An injunction against the approval by the superintendent of the insurance department of a uniform policy of insurance, under a statute which is alleged to be unconstitutional as an attempt to delegate to him legislative powers, cannot be granted on behalf of individuals in order to protect them in the right to make contracts of insurance to suit their varying needs and circumstances, as the statute, if unconstitutional, cannot stand in the way of any contracts that may be made.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to prevent the superintendent of insurance from approving a form for a uniform insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fyke, Yates, & Fyke, for appellant:

The petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

No facts are alleged which show that any property right of plaintiffs will be in any manner affected by the threatened action of defendant. Moreover, the petition should show a particular injury to plaintiffs distinct from that which they might suffer in common with the public.

Courts of equity will not enjoin the acts of executive officers of the government within the scope of their authority, in a matter resting in their jurisdiction; nor will state officers be restrained from enforcing a law of the state merely upon the ground of its alleged unconstitutionality.

The state has the right to prescribe the conditions upon which fire insurance companies may do business in this state; the state can prescribe what their contracts may or may not contain.

Daggs v. Orient Ins. Co. 186 Mo. 382, 35 L. R. A. 227.

Injunction will not lie, because a court of equity will not lend its aid by injunction for the enforcement of right or the prevention of wrong in the abstract and unconnected with any injury or damage to the person seeking the relief.

1 High, Inj. 2d ed. § 1, p. 2.

Messrs. Orr, Christie, Bates, & Bruce, for respondents:

The act of the legislature authorizing the superintendent of the insurance department to approve a form of fire insurance policy for use in the state of Missouri to the exclusion of all other forms was an attempted delegation of legislative power, and was therefore unconstitutional and void.

S. 650, 681-694, 36 L. ed. 294, 306-310.

The respondents, being residents and property owners, had such a property interest in the right to contract freely for fire insurance (as authorized by law) that they were competent to sue, for themselves and for all others similarly situated, to restrain the appellant from so acting in excess of his powers under color of official authority, as to impair, violate, or interfere with such right of contract.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs seek an injunction to prevent the superintendent of the insurance department from approving, under the act of March 18, 1895 (Acts 1895, p. 194) a uniform policy of insurance, to be used, to the exclusion of all other forms, by the fire insurance companies doing business in this state. It is claimed that said act attempts to delegate legislative powers to said superintendent, and is therefore unconstitutional and void. The petition charges that defendant, who was such superintendent at the time this suit was begun, was about to approve and promulgate, by authority of said act, a form of policy to be used to the exclusion of all others by the fire insurance companies doing business in Missouri; that, when so approved, he would forthwith officially advise all such companies, or "indicate to them expressly or by necessary implication, that from and after the 1st day of January, 1896, it would be unlawful for them, and each of them, to issue in this state any fire or lightning policy which did not embrace, and in all respects conform to, the said exclusive form which the said superintendent was so threatening to approve and promulgate." It is alleged that the effect of such action will be to force, induce, or enable such companies to employ said form, to the exclusion of all others, under color of lawful authority or legal requirement, and thus impose upon plaintiffs and all others similarly situated harsh, unfair, and unjust conditions in their contracts of insurance, and cause them serious and substantial damages. Plaintiffs are alleged, in the petition, to be owners of property of great value in the city of St. Louis. Some of them are wholesale merchants, who carry large stocks, and are in the habit of keeping the same insured. It is further stated that plaintiffs had been accustomed to make contracts of insurance containing such terms and conditions as their situation demanded, and that they had the right so to do. It is also alleged that the threatened action of defendant will deprive them of that privilege, and prevent them from making contracts of insurance to suit their varying needs and circumstances, in accordance with the rules and requirements of the insurance companies and the valid laws of the state, and that they will thereby be deprived of a valuable property right. An objection to the introduction of any evidence under this petition was interposed by defendant and overruled. The circuit court granted a perpetual injunction, and from that decree defendant has appealed, 40 L. R. A.

and renews the point here that the petition fails to state a cause of action.

The first question that arises for determination is whether plaintiffs have any standing, in equity, to maintain this suit. They do not charge that defendant was about to interfere directly with any contract which they had made or were intending to make. Their real complaint, stripped of all unnecessary matters, is that the above-recited act of the legislature is unconstitutional; that, nevertheless, defendant is about to approve a form of policy under it. If he does so, they say, the insurance companies will, either under the erroneous belief that such action is binding upon them, or because they prefer to adopt such form, refuse to issue any other kind of policy, and, by such conduct of the companies, under the guise of obedience to said act, plaintiffs may be not able to make contracts of insurance, which they otherwise might make. We know of no principle that will authorize a party to contest the validity of a legislative act, and enjoin an officer from carrying out its provisions, simply in order that another person may thereby have the opportunity to make a more favorable contract with him. State v. Hathaway, 106 Mo. 236. Yet this seems to be plaintiff's attitude in this case. "Injury, material and actual, not fanciful, theoretical, or merely possible, must be shown as the necessary or probable results of the action sought to be restrained." People v. Canal Board, 55 N. Y. 390. There is no analogy between this case and Newmeyer v. Missouri & M. R. Co. 52 Mo. 81, 14 Am. Rep. 94, cited by respondent, and the line of cases similar to that, where it is decided that a taxpayer may restrain the illegal action of county courts, whereby the public burdens, of which he must bear a part, are increased. It will be noted, also, that all cases cited by respondents to show that it is a delegation of legislative power to authorize the superintendent of insurance to prescribe the terms and conditions to be inserted in such policies were suits upon actual contracts of insurance, and were not proceedings to prevent possible future injury. O'Neil v. American F. Ins. Co. 166 Pa. 72, 26 L. R. A. 715; Anderson v. Manchester F. Assur. Co. 59 Minn. 182, 28 L. R. A. 609; Dowling v. Lancashire Ins. Co. 92 Wis. 63, 31 L. R. A. 112. If the act is unconstitutional, it cannot stand in the way of any contracts plaintiffs may make. The mere possibility of injury to them because they may be unable to find companies that will contract with them upon satisfactory terms cannot authorize injunctive relief in their behalf. The action of the circuit court in making the injunction perpetual was erroneous.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to dissolve the injunction and dismiss the bill.

All concur.

I. Generally.

It seems that at common law the owner of a dog had the same right of property in it as he had in any other property, except in cases of larceny, and as to this the statute of 10 Geo. III., chap. 18, removed the exception.

The owner of a dog has such a right of property in the animal that he may maintain an action against anyone unlawfully injuring or killing him. Some cases go so far as to hold that, under the police power to kill, the owner cannot be deprived of his dog without a trial of his right of property guaranteed by the Constitution, but there is some conflict of authority on this question. The owner may maintain an action of trover, replevin, or trespass against anyone taking his dog and converting him to his own use, as in GRAHAM v. SMITH. The owner may recover the value of his dog lost through the negligence of a common carrier. As to the right to maintain an action for injuries caused by railroad trains to a dog on the track, there is some conflict of authority, due largely to the fact of the propensity of the dog to roam, its instinct and ability to escape from danger, and the inconvenience which would be caused by stopping 40 L. cause plaintiff's remedy, if any, was by possessory warrant, and not in trover. The magistrate overruled this demurrer, and his decision was sustained by the superior court.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

In the American courts dogs have been held to be a species of property, and entitled to less trains. Many of the states by statute have made dog stealing larceny, and some have construed statutes against taking goods or other property to include dogs, but upon this question there is some conflict. At common law a prosecution for malicious mischief could be had for maliciously killing a dog. The license laws of the states are generally held not to be tax laws or a double taxing, but within the police powers of the state, although some states provide for a tax upon dogs as property.

In Hurley v. State, 30 Tex. App. 333, the court adopted the language in the dissenting opinion of State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 46 Am. Rep. 423, and said that "a dog is the subject of ownership. Trespass will lie for an injury to him. Trover is maintainable for his conversion. Replevin will restore him to the possession of his master. He may be bought and sold. An action may be had for his price. The owner has all the remedies for the vindication of his rights of property in this animal as in any other species of personal property he may possess. He is a domestic animal. From the time of the pyramids to the present day, from the frozen pole to the torrid zone, wherever man has been, there has been his dog. Cuvier has asserted that the dog was perhaps necessary for the establishment of civil society, and that a little reflection will convince us that barbarous nations owe much of their civilization above the brute to the possession of the dog. . . . It may be said that he was ferus naturæ; but all animals, naturalists say, were originally ferus naturæ, but have been reclaimed by man, as horses, sheep, or cattle; but, however tamed, they have never, like the dog, become domesticated in the home, under the roof, and by the fireside of their masters."

"Large amounts of money are now invested in dogs, and they are largely the subjects of trade and traffic. In many ways they are put to useful service, and, so far as pertains to their ownership as personal property, they possess all the attributes of other personal property." Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365.

In State v. Sumner, 2 Ind. 377, it was said: "A man, therefore, at common law may have an absolute property in him."

In Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 146, 32 Am. Dec. 677, it was said that dogs belong to that class of domiciled animals which the law recognizes legal regard and protection than more harmless and useful animals, although an action for injury may be maintained by their owner.

as property, and whatever it recognizes as property it will protect from invasion, by civil action on the part of the owner.

In Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 481, 15 Am. Rep. 355, it was said: "That a dog was property was conceded at common law, as also that the owner might maintain a civil action for its loss."

In Mowery v. Salisbury, 82 N. C. 175, it was said that "property in dogs is recognized by the law and protected against wanton and needless injury, and a civil action for damages may be maintained."

In Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 30 Am. Rep. 152, it was said: "In some of the states dogs are by statute placed upon the same footing as other personal property."

In Lavery v. Hogan, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 197, Affirmed in 1 N. Y. S. R. 84, it was said that dogs are the subject of ownership, and are sometimes valuable property, and for an injury thereto an action will lie.

In Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 81, it was said that the common law gives the owner of dogs a civil action to recover damages for their destruction and injury.

In Shaw v. Craft, 37 Fed. Rep. 317, it was said that dogs upon a farm are regarded as domestic animals.

In State v. Giles, 125 Ind. 124, it was said that Elliott's (Ind.) Supp. § 335, defining the word "animal" to include "all brute creatures and all domestic fowls," embraced dogs.

In Wilcox v. State (Ga.) 39 L. R. A. 709, it was held that a dog was a domestic animal.

In State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 523, 69 Am. Dec. 516, it was said that "dogs are domesticated or tame animals, and as much the subject of property or ownership as horses, cattle, or sheep. . . . A dog without a collar is the subject of property."

So it was said: "We can see no reason why the property of its owner in a valuable dog is not quite as deserving of protection against the wilful and malicious injury of the reckless and malignant, as property in fruit, shade, or ornamental trees, whether standing in the garden or yard of their owner, or in a public street or square, or any other species of personal property."

In Uhlein v. Cronack, 109 Mass. 273, it was said that by the common law a dog is property, for an injury to which an action may lie.

In Ten Hopen v. Walker, 96 Mich. 236, which was an action for unlawfully killing a dog, it was said: "It is settled in this state that dogs have value, and are the property of the owner, as much as any other animal which one may have or keep."

6 Wait, Act. & Def. pp. 128, 155.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The official report states the facts. It is somewhat difficult to determine the status of the dog as property in this state. It is not difficult to show that the owner has a property right in the animal, but it is difficult to define the nature and extent of it. This right seems to be better defined at common law than it is by the construction which this court has put upon our statutes. Our Constitution (art. 7, § 2, "1) impliedly recognizes dogs as property. It provides that the general assembly may impose a tax upon such domestic animals as, from their nature and habits, are destructive of other property. It is true that this power tion for shooting and wounding plaintiff's dog, an instruction was properly refused which was to the effect that the law did not recognize a right of property in dogs, as this was not the law in Missouri.

A recovery in an action of trespass was allowed for killing the dog of another person in possession of a third party. The court said that although they were not regarded at common law of such value as that the stealing of them amounted to larceny, yet an action at law would lie for destroying them. "There is no distinction between them and other chattels as to the possession necessary to the maintenance of an action of trespass." White v. Brantley, 37 Ala. 480.

So, where the defendant failed to justify the killing of a dog as a nuisance, it was held that a dog was a species of property for an injury, to which an action at law could be sustained, and if the trespass was aggravated smart money could be allowed, even if the property had no pecuniary value. Parker v. Mize, 27 Ala. 480, 62 Am. Dec. 776.

In State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581, it was said that dogs are property in Missouri, and damages may be recovered civilly for injuries to them.

In Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153, it was said that under Texas Penal Code, §§ 572, 575, providing that homicide is justified in the protection of the person or property against any other and violent attack, homicide may even be justified in the possession or protection of the dog by its owner.

In Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, it was said: "When we call to mind the small spaniel that saved the life of William of Orange and thus probably changed the current of modern history (2 Motley's Dutch Republic, 398), and the faithful St. Bernards, which, after a storm has swept over the crests and sides of the Alps, start out in search of lost travelers, the claim that the nature of a dog is essentially base, and that he should be left as prey to every vagabond who chooses to steal him, will not now receive ready assent."

In People v. Maloney, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 593, it was said that the New York Revised Statutes are inconsistent with the common-law rule in regard to larceny, and "by them dogs are so far regarded as property as to be, in certain cases, the subject of taxation. The owner is made liable for the acts of his dog; thus recognizing that a dog has an owner, and consequently that the thing owned is property. For every civil purpose, not only by statute, but by the decisions of our courts, a dog is regarded as property."

In Ireland v. Higgins, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 125, it was said that there was a precedent for holding that a dog is property in 13 Hen. VII., Roll 35, where in to tax partakes of the nature of a police regulation, and is made the exception to our uniform and ad valorem system of taxation; but the words giving the power evidently intend to and do denote the dog as a domestic animal, and, by reference, class this animal with other property. Section 2965 of the Code recognizes the ownership of dogs, in that it makes the owners liable to suit for the recovery of damages for injuries inflicted by their dogs under certain circumstances. Section 4402 of the Code makes the dog, eo nomine, a subject of simple larceny. This provision, however, does not seem to bring the dog as property to any high degree, because, in speaking of all other domestic animals, it is provided, "and also a dog" may be the subject of simple larceny, implying two things—that he was not, theretofore, a subject of simple larceny, nor was he a domestic animal. To one of us, at least, a possible reason why the dog may not, by common consent, have been accorded a place among domestic animals not more worthy and even less valuable, is suggested by a learned writer (Grotius) when he says, "The reason why some creatures fly and avoid us is not the want of gentleness and mildness on their part, but on ours." In Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, 58 Am. Rep. 476, which was an action against a railroad company for the negligent and malicious killing of a dog by the operation of a train of cars, it was held that a dog is property only in a qualified sense, and that such an action would not lie; and in the case of Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, 24 L. R. A. 732, it was held that the wilful and malicious killing of a dog was not an indictable offense under § 4627 of our Code. In the latter case, however, the ruling was based on the construction that the subjects of that particular statute were inanimate property. In the case, however, of Manning v. Mitcherson, 69 Ga. 447, 47 Am. Rep. 764, it was ruled that the trespass for assault and battery the defendant justified that J. S. was possessed of a dog de bonis propriis, and delivered it to him to keep, and that the plaintiff would have taken it from him, in which he resisted him and in defense and custody of his dog he beat him, and the hurt which he had was de son tort d'emeuse, etc., which proveth a property in the dog when he justifieth the beating of one in defense of it. 2 Edw. II. Avowry.

In St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Stanfield, 63 Ark. 643, 37 L. R. A. 659, it was said that "the common-law rule, even in cases of larceny, is extremely technical, and has no sound basis to rest upon. . . . Except in cases of larceny, however, the dog was property at the common law, and the owner had his remedy by civil action for the loss or destruction of the same."

In Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479, it was said that every species of personal property was not the subject of larceny at common law. "For example, dogs were treated as personal property, and on the death of their owner, if not disposed of by will, went to his executor or administrator as such. So the owner of a dog could bring a civil action against one who injured or took the animal."

1 Williams on Executors, 9th Eng. ed. p. 830, *617, says: "Chattels animate may be subdivided into such as are domestic and such as are feræ nature. In such as are of a nature tame and domestic (as horses, dogs, kine, sheep, poultry, and the like) a man may have an absolute property, and they are therefore capable of being transmitted, like any other personal chattel, to his executor or administrator."

In Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, it was said that dogs would pass as assets to the executor or administrator of a deceased owner.

In 4 Burn's Ecclesiastical Law, p. 297, it is said that "also hounds, greyhounds, spaniels, and the like, as they may be valuable, and may serve not only for delight, but for profit, shall go to the executors." Law of Test. 379.

But Noy's Maxims, 166, says: "If a man die seized of any lands, and do not dispose of them by his will, they descend to the heir as aforesaid. And he shall have, not only . . . but any other of . . . the hawks and the hounds."

In 1 Williams on Personal Property, p. 19, it was said: "It appears to have been formerly thought that hawks and hounds were not subjects of personal property, but would descend with the lands to the heir; but this opinion is not now law;" and Wentworth's Office of an Executor says: "Although they be for the most part but things of pleasure, that hindreth not; but they may be valuable as well as instruments of music, both tending to delight and exhilarate the spirits; a cry of hounds hath to my sense more spirit and vivacity than any other music."

In Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh, 808, it was said the possessor has a base property in dogs, and may maintain a civil action for injury done to them.

In Wheatley v. Harris, 4 Sneed, 468, 70 Am. Dec. 258, it was said that upon the question whether the owner of a dog has such a property in him as will entitle him to maintain an action for killing or injuring the dog, there can be no doubt. The court said that in Ireland v. Higgins, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 125, it was laid down that the law takes notice of a greyhound, mastiff, dog, spaniel, and tumbler, and trover will lie for them. See also Wadhurst v. Damme, Cro. Jac. 45, justifying the killing of a mastiff.

In Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Wms. Saund. 84, it was argued that "in Ireland v. Higgins, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 125, it was said that the law takes notice of a mastiff, hound, spaniel, and tumbler." (But in Ireland v. Higgins this statement was made by the counsel in argument.)

But in Chunot v. Larson, 43 Wis. 536, 28 Am. Rep. 567, it was said that "property in a dog is of peculiar character. A man is not, by the common law, considered to have the same valuable property in a dog as in cattle and sheep."

In Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 31, in a larceny case, it was said that it was persuasive to show that dogs in Alabama are not regarded as property in the proper sense of that term, that they are neither administered as such nor taxed as other property.

In Wilton v. Weston, 48 Conn. 325, it was said that "if it be assumed that property in dogs stands on the same ground as that of property in other domestic animals, such, for instance, as the horse, we should be compelled to concede that this objection [to making a town liable for damages done by dogs where the owners reside in towns] should prevail, and the law should be declared invalid. But such assumption is unwarranted, as all the authorities agree."

In Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, it was said: "The very fact that they are without the protection of the criminal law shows that property in dogs is of an imperfect or qualified nature, and that they stand, as it were, between animals feræ nature, in which, until killed or subdued, there is no property, and domestic animals, in which the right of property is perfect and complete. They are not considered as being upon the same plane with horses, cattle, sheep, and other domesticated animals, but rather in the category of cats, monkeys, parrots, singing birds, and law of this state contemplated that, to have property in animals which are wild by nature, the owner must have them within his actual possession, custody, or control, and this may be done by taming, domesticating, or confining them; and it was ruled also in that case that a possessory warrant would lie for the recovery of a bird when so in possession; and animals, by that decision, come under the same class. It is therefore apparent that an owner has property in his dog, and that this property is sufficient to support an action to recover possession of it when such has been lost.

Dogs have been held to be property by the courts in the District of Columbia, in Kansas, Texas, Connecticut, Tennessee, Michigan, Nebraska, Utah, and perhaps in other states. A contrary ruling has been made in several of the other states. His status seems to be more clearly defined by the common law. The compilers of the American & English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 1, p. 584) lay down the proposition that "at common law the dog is considered a tame, harmless, and docile animal." If this be true,—and our investigation does not bear it out to its full meaning,—then the owner can have an absolute property in such animals, because animals which are of a tame and domestic nature are the subjects of absolute property. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 572. The latter proposition is supported by reference to a number of authorities. We, however, think that Chancellor Kent more correctly lays down the common-law rule that "animals feræ naturæ, so long as they are reclaimed by the art and power of man, are also the subject of a qualified property;" and that, "while this qualified property continues, it is as much under protection of law as any other property, and every invasion of it is redressed in the same manner." 2 Kent, Com. § 348. Thus, it has been held that trover lies for wild geese which have been tamed, but which, without regaining their natural liberty, have strayed away. Amory v. Flynn, 10 Johns. 102, 6 Am. Dec. 316. So also for domestic fowls.

similar animals kept for pleasure, curiosity, or caprice." This statement should have been qualified by putting it in the past tense, and by showing that most of the states had placed dogs within the protection of their criminal law the same as other property, thus recognizing the right of property in dogs, and among these some of the states cited by the learned justice to sustain the proposition that in the absence of a statute they are not regarded as the subjects of larceny.

The law gives the owner the right of reclamation, but in all other respects the owner has only that qualified property in him which he may have in wild animals generally. State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 48 Am. Rep. 423.

In Leach v. Elwood, 3 Ill. App. 453, it was said that while it may be true that owners have a certain right of property in their dogs not recognized at common law, nevertheless they are, even when domesticated, of that wild nature and destructive instinct which renders the animal subject to any reasonable police regulations that have been established by the proper authorities.

In Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 30 Am. Rep. 152, it was said that "dogs have always been held by the American courts to be entitled to less legal regard and protection than more harmless and useful domestic animals."

In Carthage v. Rhodes, 101 Mo. 175, 9 L. R. A. 352, it was said that while in a sense dogs are property, and the owner may invoke the aid of the law for their protection as property by civil action, yet they are a base sort of property having no market or assessable value, do not enter into the estimate of the appreciable wealth of the state, and never have been considered subjects of taxation for revenue.

And in Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 1 Am. Rep. 94, 97 Am. Dec. 82, which was an action for killing a dog, it was held that all rights of property are held subject to such reasonable control and regulation of the mode of keeping and using as the legislature, under the police power vested in them by the Constitution of the commonwealth, may think necessary for the preventing of injuries to the rights of others, and the security of public health and welfare.

In Milman v. Shockley, 1 Houst. (Del.) 444, it was held that the legislature had seen proper to place all sheep-killing dogs and sheep-worrying puppies in the category of public nuisances, which anybody might abate and put out of the pale which the law had provided for the protection of the rights of property.

In McKenzie v. Campbell, 1 U. C. Q. B. 241, where a constable was justified in killing a dog that was at large contrary to a proclamation of the mayor under a city ordinance, it was said by Robinson, Ch. J.: "Considering the light in which the common law regards a property in dogs," I am of opinion that the corporation have under the statute power to make such laws as may in their judgment seem best calculated for at once arresting the evil.

By the law of Aquilla if any man injuriously kills the four-footed beast of another which may be reckoned among his cattle, he shall be condemned to pay, etc. "As the law does not speak of four-footed beasts in general, but only of cattle, we may collect that wild beasts and dogs do not come within the intentment, which can be understood to include only those animals which feed in herds." Cooper, Justinian, lib. IV., tit. III. § 1.

In Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 1 Am. Rep. 94, 97 Am. Dec. 82, it was said: "There is no kind of property over which the exercise of this power is more frequent or more necessary than that which is the subject of the present action. In regard to the ownership of live animals, the law has long made a distinction between dogs and cats and other domestic quadrupeds, growing out of the nature of the creatures and the purposes for which they are kept. Beasts which have been thoroughly tamed, and are used for burden or husbandry, or for food, such as horses, cattle, and sheep, are as truly property of intrinsic value, and entitled to the same protection, as any kind of goods. But dogs and cats, even in a state of domestication, never wholly lose their wild natures and destructive instincts, and are kept either for uses which depend on retaining and calling into action those very natures and instincts or else for the mere whim or pleasure of the owner; and therefore, although a man might have such a right of property in a dog as to maintain trespass or trover for unlawfully taking or destroying it, yet he was held, in the phrase of the books, to have "no absolute and valuable property" therein which could be the subject of a prosecution for larceny at common law, or even, according to some authorities, of an action of detinue or replevin, or a distress for rent, or which would make him responsible for the trespasses of his dog on the lands of other persons, as he would be for the trespasses of his cattle."

In Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, it was held that a dog was not property except in a qualified sense, either at common law or under the statutes of this state.

Likewise the court in that case said that dogs

Leonard v. Belknap, 47 Vt. 608. Blackstone declares that the property in a dog is base property, but that such property is sufficient to maintain a civil action for its loss. 4 Bl. Com. 236. Professor Schouler, in his treatise on the law of Personal Property (§ 49), pronounces the dog to be a tame animal, from which definition it would appear that an owner can acquire an absolute property in the animal; and he distinguishes this animal from such others as property can be acquired in only by possession. So it will be seen that at the common law and under our statutes the owner has property in his dog, and not only so, but such property right is sufficient to maintain a civil action to recover its possession.

In the case now under consideration the defendant in error brought an action of trover in a justice's court to recover possession of his dog. A demurrer was filed to the proceeding in that court, which was overruled by the magistrate, and the case taken to the superior court by writ of certiorari; whereupon the judge of the latter court held that the ruling of the magistrate was correct. So do we, on the authorities before referred to. The action of trover, while changed with us in some respects, was originally a special action on the case, in favor of any person who had a general or special property in goods, against any person who wrongfully withheld them from his possession. The special or qualified property which has been shown to exist in animals of this character is sufficient to support this action. The action lies for every species of personal property, animate or inanimate. 6 Wait, Act. & Def. pp. 128, 155. The question was expressly ruled in the state of Massachusetts, even though the courts of that state had declared that the property right in a dog was only a qualified one. See Cummings v. Perham, 1 Met. 555. The question was likewise ruled in Binstead v. Buck, 2 W. Bl. top page 1117.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

are not property in such a sense as makes them assets belonging to the estate of a deceased person, and are never inventoried or appraised, however numerous or valuable; nor are they subject to levy and sale, so far as we are informed.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 5434, making it lawful for any person to kill a sheep-killing dog, an instruction that the law recognizes a right of property in dogs, and that it was necessary to show that the dog at that time was killing sheep, was erroneous. Carpenter v. Lippitt, 7 Mo. 242.

To say of a peer of the realm that he had no more conscience than a dog was held scandalous, and if spoken of any other person an action upon the case would lie. Duke Buckingham's Case, cited in 3 Bulst. 226.

II. Actions of trover, replevin, and trespass.

In GRAHAM v. SMITH it was held that the owner of a dog has such a property in it as will enable him to maintain an action of trover for its recovery in case of its wrongful conversion. This is in accord with the uniform rule of law in such cases.

An action of trespass can be maintained for taking away a dog, and an action of replevin, trover, or for conversion can also be maintained. Binstead v. Buck, 2 W. Bl. 1117; Ireland v. Higgins, Cro. Eliz. 125; Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365; Cummings v. Perham, 1 Met. 555; People v. Maloney, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 593; Athill v. Corbet, Cro. Jac. 463; Edwards v. Engleton, Hob. 283a; Filow's Case, 12 Hen. VIII. 3; Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2344; People, Longwell v. McMaster, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 13; Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153; People v. Campbell, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 386; Queen v. Slade, L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 433; State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 772.

So, an action of trover was maintained for a pointing dog, where the plaintiff proved the dog to be his property, and it was found at the defendant's house twelve months after it was lost, and the defendant demanded twenty shillings for twenty-nine weeks' keep before he would deliver up the dog. Binstead v. Buck, 2 W. Bl. 1117.

And an action for trover will lie for a greyhound, and it need not be averred that he is tame. Ireland v. Higgins, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 125.

In State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 523, 69 Am. Dec. 516, it was said that a dog without a collar is the subject of property, and trover may be maintained for its conversion, even when the statute authorizes the killing of such dog.

- 40 L. R. A.

"A trover lies for conversion of a spaniel dog because it was reclaimed. Enter Pells and Leman adjudged in Banco on Demurrer. See Hub. R. Case 363, between Pells and Leman, and brief on error afterwards in King's Bench where no opinion was given for that, but was reversed for another cause, namely for default of the original. Intr. Tr. 14 Car. B. R. Rot. 217." 1 Rolle, Abr. 5.

In Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, it was said that dogs are so far regarded at common law as property that an action of trover could be brought for their conversion.

A recovery was allowed in trover for a dog, and it was held that Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 58, § 12, authorizing any person to kill a dog at large without a licensed collar on, did not warrant a person to convert him to his own use, as the object of the statute was to rid society of a nuisance. Cummings v. Perham, 2 Met. 555.

In People v. Maloney, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 593, it was said that the owner of a dog may bring an action for an injury inflicted upon his dog, and if taken away he may bring replevin or trover.

An action of trespass was maintained for taking a greyhound with a collar, and the plea that the dog was coursing a hare on the defendant's land, and therefore he took and led him away, was deemed frivolous. Athill v. Corbet, Cro. Jac. 463.

And in an action of trespass for that the defendant with force and arms took and led away quendam cartem venaticum prec., etc., a judgment was given for plaintiff. Edwards v. Engleton, Hob. 283a.

So, in an action of trespass charging that the defendant beat his servant and carried away one dog called a bloodhound, on demurrer it was held that he may have his action for this thing. Filow's Case, 12 Hen. VIII. 3.

In Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2344, it was said: "In the year book of 12 Hen. VIII., fol. 3, a. b. Great Dispute was made (upon the footing of property too) whether an action would lie for taking away a bloodhound, the arguments used against it were such as have, among others, been used upon the present occasion, viz., that it was of no value nor profit; but for pleasure. That felony could not be committed of it; consequently not trespass. That when the dog was out of the party's possession he ceased to have any property in him. That a dog was not thievable; would not pass by a grant of omnia bona. That replevin or detinue would lie of a dog."

And in Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, 58 Am. Rep. 478, it was said that by the common law and under our Code he may maintain trespass

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

L. V. HAMBY
v
C. C. SAMSON, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

A dog is the subject of larceny under Code 1873, § 3902, making it a crime for anyone to steal any "chattels" of another.

(April 8, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of W. B. Quarton, one of the judges of the District Court for Kossuth County, discharging vi et armis for wantonly and maliciously killing his dog.

And in Dand v. Sexton, 3 T. R. 37, a recovery was had in trespass vi et armis for beating the plaintiff's dog, whereby the dog was hurt and the plaintiff lost the use of him. The question involved was as to the amount of costs under 43 Eliz. § 6.

In People, Longwell v. McMaster, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 182, it was said that civil actions may be maintained for injury to or conversion of dogs as in regard to other domestic animals.

In Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153, it was said that civil actions would lie for the recovery of a dog or for his conversion, and damages could be recovered for injuries done or imposed, and punishment inflicted for his destruction.

In an action on the case, where it was alleged that a dog came to the hands of the defendant which belonged to the plaintiff, and the defendant did assume to deliver the said dog to the plaintiff upon request, and that the plaintiff had requested him and he did not deliver the dog, on demurrer it was held that an action would lie for the dog. Ireland v. Higgins, Owen, 93.

And in Ireland v. Higgins, Owen, 93, it was said in argument that in 23 Eliz. Leek's Case, one had judgment to recover great damages for a bloodhound.

In People v. Campbell, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 386, it was said: "An action can be brought to repossess one of a dog of which he has been unlawfully deprived."

So, under 2 & 3 Vict. chap. 71, § 40, providing that upon complaint by any person claiming to be entitled to the property or possession of any goods which are detained by any other person, the value of which shall not be greater than £15, it shall be lawful for such magistrate to order the goods to be delivered to the owner thereof, the word "goods" was held to include a dog. Queen v. Slade, L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 433.

In State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 772, it was said: "At the common law, although it was not a crime to steal a dog, yet it was such an invasion of property as might amount to a civil injury and be redressed by a civil action."

In 8 Bacon, Abr. 549, Replevin and Acovery, it was said that replevin does not lie of things which are fero naturæ, as dogs, but if things wild by nature are made tame, or are reclaimed, so long as they continue in that condition they belong to the person who has the possession of them, and he may bring a replevin. But it was said that a replevin will not lie for a mastiff dog, though an action of trespass will.

III. Actions against common carriers.

Where a railroad or transportation company received a dog as a common carrier, it was liable for loss of the dog through negligence of its employees. 40 L. R. A.

plaintiff under a writ of habeas corpus from the custody of the defendant, to which he had been committed for larceny of a dog. Reversed.

Statement by Deemer, Ch. J.:

This is a habeas corpus proceeding, in which plaintiff alleged that he was unlawfully restrained of his liberty by the defendant, who is sheriff of Kossuth county, under a warrant of commitment issued by a justice of the peace of said county on an information charging the plaintiff with the crime of larceny of a dog. The district judge discharged the petitioner, and defendant appeals.

Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Higdon, 94 Ala. 286, 14 L. R. A. 515; Stuart v. Crawley, 2 Stark. 323; Cantling v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 54 Mo. 385; Kennedy v. American Exp. Co. 22 Ont. App. Rep. 278; Ashenden v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 5 Exch. Div. 190, 42 L. T. N. S. 586, 28 Week. Rep. 511, 44 J. P. 203.

So, a limitation of liability in the ticket for loss of a dog by a railway company, restricting the right of recovery to £2 unless 5 per cent of the value above £2 is paid for carriage to the carrier, was held to be unreasonable and void, under 17 & 18 Vict. chap. 31, railway and canal traffic act, § 7, providing that the company shall be liable for the loss of or any injury done to any animal or to any articles, goods, or things in the receiving, forwarding and delivery, notwithstanding any notice limiting liability, providing the company may make such conditions as the court or judge shall adjudge to be reasonable. Dickson v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 176.

A condition in a printed ticket that the railway company will not be liable in any case for loss or damage to a dog above certain specified value delivered to them for carriage, unless the value is declared, is not just and reasonable under railway and canal traffic act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. chap. 31, § 7), providing that every such company shall be liable for loss or injury to horses or other animals notwithstanding any notice limiting such liability. The railroad was held liable for a dog lost without any neglect or default on its part or that of the connecting line. Ashenden v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 5 Exch. Div. 190, 42 L. T. N. S. 586, 28 Week. Rep. 511, 44 J. P. 203.

Under railway and canal traffic act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. chap. 31), regulating traffic on railways, and § 1, providing that "traffic" includes "animals," and § 2, providing that railway companies shall afford reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivery of traffic, it was held that the company was bound to afford reasonable facilities for carrying dogs. Dickson v. Great Northern R. Co. (1886), L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 176.

And a company was liable where a passenger was required by the conductor to place his dog in the baggage car, without notice that the railroad company's rules required a baggage master's fee, and the owner refused to pay any fee to the baggage master, who refused to put the dog off at the proper station and carried the dog beyond and lost it, and the owner offered to pay a fee before he knew the dog was lost. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Higdon, 94 Ala. 286, 14 L. R. A. 515.

But where the conditions of a ticket were that the railroad company would not be liable in any case for loss or damage to a dog above the value of £5, unless a declaration of its value was made at the time of booking, and would be liable in no case for an injury to a dog of whatever value when such

Messrs. Raymond & Raymond, for appellant:

Larceny under the common law is defined as the "felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another."

4 Chitty's Bl. Com. p. 179.

As to those animals which do not serve for food, and which, therefore, the law holds to have no intrinsic value, as dogs of all sorts, and other creatures kept for whim and pleasure, though a man may have a base property therein, and maintain a civil action for the loss of them, yet they are not of such estimation as that the crime of stealing them amounts to larceny. But by statute 10 Geo. III. chap. 18, very high pecuniary penalties, or a long imprisonment and whipping in their stead, may be inflicted by two justices of the peace

(with a very extraordinary mode of appeal to the quarter sessions) on such a steal, or for knowingly harboring a stolen dog, or having in custody the skin of a dog that has been stolen.

All larcenies at common law are of goods and chattels, and must be of some value, but no particular value is required.

If the carcass was of any value, either for food or for its hide, it would be the subject of larceny.

The reason of the law being changed, the law is also changed.

Bouvier, Law Dict. 11th ed. 145.

When dogs became domesticated and of injury arose from fear or restiveness, and if the declared value of the dog exceeded £5 the price of conveyance in addition to regular fare would be at the rate of 2½ per cent or 6 d. in £1 upon the declared value above £5, whatever may be the amount of such value or for whatever distance, and the plaintiff made no declaration of value and paid 3s., and the dog was placed in a horse box and fastened with a leather collar and a strap to the side of the horse box, and escaped through an open window and was lost, a judgment against the company for £21 was set aside upon the ground that the conditions in the ticket were just and reasonable. Harrison v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. 2 Best & S. 122, 31 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 113, 8 Jur. N. S. 740, 6 L. T. N. S. 466.

In Ashenden v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 5 Exch. Div. 190, 42 L. T. N. S. 586, 28 Week. Rep. 511, 44 J. P. 203, it was said that Harrison v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co.

So, where a greyhound was delivered to a carrier and was tied by a cord in a watch-box, but slipped from the noose and was lost, the carrier was responsible for his value. Stuart v. Crawley, 2 Stark. 323.

So, where a passenger delivered a dog to the baggage master and paid the charges thereon, a recovery was allowed where the dog was lost from having been put off at the wrong station, although the company had a rule that "live animals are allowed as baggage men's perquisites," but it was not shown that the plaintiff had notice of such rule. Cantling v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 54 Mo. 335, 14 Am. Rep. 476.

And an express company was liable where dogs were shipped for exhibition, which fact was known to the company, and were not delivered to the address until ten hours after their arrival, and too late to compete, and the plaintiff was entitled to damages including anticipated profits. Kennedy v. American Exp. Co. 22 Ont. App. Rep. 278.

The case of Harrison v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. 2 Best & S. 122, 31 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 113, 8 Jur. N. S. 740, 6 L. T. N. S. 466, allowing a railroad company to exempt itself in certain cases by limiting its liability for dogs, was overruled. The cases holding a transportation company not liable do so on the ground that it was not a common carrier.

Where a greyhound was delivered to the servants of a railroad company who were not common carriers of dogs, and the fare demanded was paid, and in transferring the greyhound from one train to another which had not then arrived the dog was fastened to an iron spout on the platform by reason of a strap and collar originally put on by the owner, and while so fastened slipped its collar and ran upon the track and was killed, a recovery was denied. *Richardson v. C. P. 75, 41 L. J. C. P. N. S. 80, 26 L. T. N. S. 131, 20 Week. Rep. 461.

In Richardson v. North Eastern R. Co. L. R. 7 C. P. 75, 41 L. J. C. P. N. S. 80, 26 L. T. N. S. 131, 20 Week. Rep. 461, the case of Stuart v. Crawley, 2 Stark. 323, was distinguished, as in that case the defendant was a common carrier and here the defendants are not, and in that case when the dog was delivered to the defendant's servant he had the means of seeing that it was insufficiently secured by the cord around his neck, whereas here the mode of securing the dog by the collar and strap was originally adopted.

Where a railroad company did not hold itself out as a common carrier of dogs, and refused to accept hire and furnish tickets for their transportation, and the agent referred the owner to the baggage master, who told him, "You know the rules about dogs," but as an accommodation consented to take the dogs in his car and promised to look after them, for which he received $2, no recovery could be had for the loss of a dog under a complaint charging the defendant as a common carrier, where the proof showed him liable as a private carrier only. Honeyman v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 13 Or. 352, 57 Am. Rep. 20.

IV. Actions for injuries to dogs by railroad and street cars.

In CITIZENS' RAPID TRANSIT CO. v. DEW it was held that a motorman could not rely upon the quickness and celerity of a dog in order to absolve the company from all duty and care to prevent running over the dog with an electric car, and a street-railway company was held liable for the killing of a dog by an electric car, caused by the negligence of a motorman. It was further held that a dog is not a trespasser on a street-car track that is laid in the highway on the same level.

But under Miss. Code 1880, § 1059, providing that in all actions against railroad companies for damages done to persons or property, proof of injury inflicted by the running of the locomotives or cars of such company shall be prima facie evidence of the want of reasonable skill and care upon the part of the company, where a dog was killed by a train a recovery was denied on a showing made that the employees of the company did all that could be done to avoid the accident. It was held that the presumption was that the dog had the instinct and ability to get out of the way of danger, and would do so unless its freedom of action was interfered with by other circumstances. Jones v. Bond, 40 Fed. Rep. 281.

And under La. Laws 1882, p. 160 (act July 5, 1882), providing (§ 2) that dogs are property, but no dog shall be entitled to the protection of the law unless placed upon the assessment roll, and (§ 3) providing value to mankind, the reason for this ancient rule became obsolete and the law itself was repealed.

Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 385; Haywood v. State, 41 Ark. 479; State v. House, 65 N. C. 315, 6 Am. Rep. 744; Clark, Crim. Cas. Horn-book Series, p. 332; People v. Maloney, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 598; People v. Campbell, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 386; State v. Brown, 9 Baxt. 53, 40 Am. Rep. 81; Com. v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky. 681.

The principles of the common law, ancient or modern, not being enforced in this state except so far as they are applicable to our habits and conditions of society (Wagner v. Bissell, 8 Iowa, 896; Pierson v. Lane, 60 Iowa, 60), it cannot be said that these obsolete rules were in force in this state at the time of the enactment of § 3902 by the different legislatures, much less that these ancient rules were considered by the legislature.

Section 3902 of the Code is as follows: "If any person steal, take, and carry away of the property of another any money, goods, or chattels, he is guilty of larceny."

The words "property, goods, and chattels" are words of common use and are to be taken in their actual, plain, and ordinary sense.

Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Gleason, 56 Iowa, 47; Blackman v. Wadsworth, 56 Iowa, 80; State v. Phipps, 95 Iowa, 491; State v. Smith, 46 Iowa, 673.

It can hardly be said that it was not the object of the statute and the spirit of the law to make it a crime to steal property of any kind that in civil actions for the killing of or for injuries done to dogs, the owner cannot recover beyond the amount of the value of such dog as fixed by himself in the last assessment, and New Orleans city ordinance, July 1, 1890, providing that no dog shall be permitted to run at large without a license tag, the plaintiff should have shown a compliance with the law of the state and the ordinance of the city as a condition precedent to recovery from the railroad company for negligently killing his dog. Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 168 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1189.

V. Right to kill dogs.

a. Police power.

The question of the right of property in dogs enters largely into the cases of the "right to kill a dog," and reference is made to the case of Hubbard v. Preston (Mich.) 15 L. R. A. 249, note on that subject. A summary of the cases on that subject may be grouped as follows:

The following cases affirm that by virtue of the police power certain classes of dogs may be killed: Leach v. Elwood, 3 Ill. App. 453; Haller v. Sheridan, 27 Ind. 494; Independence v. Trouvalle, 15 Kan. 70; State, Curtis v. Topeka, 36 Kan. 76, 59 Am. Rep. 529; Com. v. Markham, 7 Bush, 487; Hagerstown v. Witmer, 86 Md. 293, 39 L. R. A. 649; Towerv. Tower, 18 Pick. 262; Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136; Morewood v. Wakefield, 133 Mass. 240; Faribault v. Wilson, 34 Minn. 254; Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 373; Mowery v. Salisbury, 82 N. C. 175; Griggs v. Dittoe, 52 Ohio St. 601; McKenzie v. Campbell, 1 U. C. Q. B. 241; Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689; People, Renshaw v. Gillespie, 25 App. Div. 91.

Other cases deny the power: Lowell v. Gathright, 97 Ind. 313; Stebbins v. Mayer, 38 Kan. 573 (no city ordinance); Bishop v. Fahay, 15 Gray, 61; Kerr v. Seaver, 11 Allen, 151; Cozzens v. Nason, 109 Mass. 275; People, Shand v. Tighe, 9 Misc. 607; Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153; Heisrodt v. Hackett, 34 Mich. 283; Archer v. Baertschi, 8 Ohio C. C. 12; Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. 25 App. Div. 26.

b. Unlawfully killing dogs.

It was held that an owner may recover for unlawfully killing his dog. Parker v. Mize, 27 Ala. 480, 62 Am. Dec. 776; Johnson v. McConnell, 80 Cal. 546; Lowell v. Gathright, 97 Ind. 313; Gibbons v. Van Alstyne, 29 N. Y. S. R. 461; Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 146, 32 Am. Dec. 677; Wheatley v. Harris, 4 Sneed, 468, 70 Am. Dec. 258; Heilgmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222, 13 L. R. A. 272.

Where a constable shot a dog going on his accustomed route from the barn, on the sidewalk, to the garden, and the jury found a special verdict to the effect that if the defendant was not justified in 40 L. R. A.

shooting the dog the damages were $75, and if he was justified in shooting the dog they found a verdict of $200 for shooting into the fence and garden, judgment was rendered for $275. Swann v. Bowie, 2 Cranch, C. C. 221.

c. Barking and howling dogs.

Some cases hold that a barking and howling dog may not be killed. Sequoy v. Hartzell, 1 Ind. App. 500.

Other cases affirm the right to kill such dog. Woolf v. Chalker, 31 Conn. 121, 81 Am. Dec. 175; Brill v. Flagler, 23 W. Va. 354, Overruled in Dunlap v. Snyder, 17 Barb. 561; Lavery v. Hogan, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 197.

In Hubbard v. Preston, 90 Mich. 221, 15 L. R. A. 249, the court said it was a question for the jury.

d. Dangerous dogs.

A dangerous dog may be killed in self-defense. Woolf v. Chalker, 31 Conn. 121, 81 Am. Dec. 175; Reynolds v. Phillips, 13 Ill. App. 557; Anson v. Dwight, 18 Iowa, 241; Nehr v. State, 35 Neb. 638, 17 L. R. A. 771; Credit v. Brown, 10 Johns. 265; Putnam v. Payne, 13 Johns. 312; Maxwell v. Palmerston, 21 Wend. 407; Dunlap v. Snyder, 17 Barb. 561; People, Dillon v. Metropolitan Police, 15 Abb. Pr. 167; Lavery v. Hogan, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 197; People, Shand v. Tighe, 9 Misc. 607; Bowels v. Fitzrandolph, Addison (Pa.) 215; Keck v. Halstead, 2 Lutw. 630; Spaight v. McGovern, 16 R. I. 658, 7 L. R. A. 388; Brown v. Carpenter, 26 Vt. 632, 62 Am. Dec. 603; Quigley v. Pudsey, 26 N. S. 240.

In Wright v. Wrancoet, 2 Neb. 237, 1 Sid. 336, "in an action sur case for killing a mastiff dog, the defendant justified because the plaintiff suffered him to go unmuzzled and that he fell on a dog kept by the defendant for preservation of the house, and that the defendant, to preserve his dog, killed the plaintiff's dog, which per T. and W. is ill, without saying he could not otherwise do it. . . . But per Keeling, Ch. J., this is a sufficient justification, to which Moreton inclined." But the defendant not attending it was adjourned. In 1 Wms. Saund. 84, it was held that the plea was bad, and judgment was given for the plaintiff.

Some cases held that under the evidence the killing was not justified. Uhehn v. Cromack, 109 Mass. 273; Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 146, 32 Am. Dec. 677; Perry v. Phipps, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 259, 51 Am. Dec. 387; Spaight v. McGovern, 16 R. I. 658, 7 L. R. A. 388 (contributory negligence); Clark v. Webster, 1 Car. & P. 104; Hanway v. Boulbee, 4 Car. & P. 350, 1 Moody & R. 15; Morris v. Nugent, 7 Car. & P. 572.

e. Trespassing dogs.

It is generally held that a mere trespassing dog cannot be killed. Brent v. Kimball, 60 Ill. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 33; Tyner v. Cory, 5 Ind. 216; Dinwiddie that is of value. This is the common meaning of the words used, and must prevail.

Equitable L. Ins. Co. v. Gleason, 56 Iowa, 46; Marshall v. Blackshire, 44 Iowa, 478; Harriman v. State, 2 G. Greene, 265.

Messrs. Clarke & Cohenour, for appellee:

Under the common law a dog is not the subject of larceny.

1 Hale, Pl. C. 1st Am. ed. p. 512; 4 Bl. p. 286; 2 Bishop, Crim. L. § 773; 1 McClain, Crim. Law, § 539; Davis, Criminal Code and Digest, p. 176; State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 772; State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599; State v. Holder, 81 N. C. 527, 81 Am. Rep. 517; Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17

Am. Rep. 31; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 782.

It then follows that if a dog is to be included in subjects of which larceny can be committed, it must be by virtue of some positive statutory enactment including them in the subjects of larceny.

Under the common law a dog belonged in the same classification of animals as does a coon, all of which were held not to be the subjects of larceny.

Warren v. State, 1 G. Greene, 111; Shaul v. Brown, 28 Iowa, 42, 4 Am. Rep. 151.

Statutes worded similarly to our statute do not make a dog the subject of larceny.

Champneys*, cited in 2 Marsh. 584.

Other cases hold that such dog may be killed. Simmonds v. Holmes, 61 Conn. 1, 15 L. R. A. 253; Dunning v. Bird, 24 Ill. App. 270; Lipe v. Blackwelder, 25 Ill. App. 119; Meneley v. Carson, 55 Ill. App. 74; Bradford v. McKibben, 4 Bush, 545; Barret v. Utley, 12 Bush, 399; Hubbard v. Preston, 90 Mich. 221, 15 L. R. A. 249; King v. Kline, 6 Pa. 318.

Where a confectioner and baker placed poisoned bread and cheese behind his counter underneath the same to destroy rats and mice, and plaintiff's dog, while his daughter was waiting to be served, went under the counter and ate some of the poisoned bread and cheese, no recovery could be had. Stansfeld v. Bolling, 22 L. T. N. S. 799.

Under 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 97, § 41, providing that whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously kill, maim, or wound any dog, shall be punished, a conviction could not be had for placing poisoned meat in a garden for the purpose of killing a trespassing dog. In this case it was said that it might be an offense under 27 & 28 Vict. chap. 15, § 2, making it criminal to set up poisoned meat calculated to destroy life. Daniel v. James, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 351.

f. Sheep-killing dogs.

It is generally held that sheep-killing dogs may be killed. Thompson v. State, 67 Ala. 106, 42 Am. Rep. 101; Johnson v. McConnell, 60 Cal. 545 (Statute); Milman v. Shockley, 1 Houst. (Del.) 444 (Statute); Hunt v. State, 3 Ind. App. 383; Carpenter v. Lippitt, 77 Mo. 242 (Statute); Brauer v. English, 21 Mo. App. 490; Duniap v. Snyder, 17 Barb. 561; Brown v. Gabby, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 159; Miller v. Spaulding, 41 Wis. 221.

Other cases deny the right unless the dog is caught in the act or the statute authorizes it. Lentz v. Stroh, 6 Serg. & R. 34 (statute not retroactive); Wells v. Head, 4 Car. & P. 568.

g. Dogs chasing other animals.

Dogs chasing other animals cannot be killed. Spray v. Ammerman, 65 Ill. 309; Livermore v. Batchelder, 141 Mass. 179; Hinckley v. Emerson, 4 Cow. 351; State v. Latham, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 83; Janson v. Brown, 1 Campb. 41; Vere v. Lord Crawford, 11 East, 568; Wright v. Ramscot, 1 Wms. Saund. 84; Kellett v. Stannard, 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 156. Some cases, however, affirm the right. Anderson v. Smith, 7 Ill. App. 354; Barret v. Utley, 12 Bush, 399; Leonard v. Wilkins, 9 Johns. 238; Boecher 40 L. R. A.

v. Lutz, 13 Daly, 28; Sutton v. Coover, 4 York, 22; Protheroe v. Mathews, 5 Car. & P. 581; Wadhurst v. Damme, Cro. Jac. 45; Barrington v. Turner, 3 Lev. 28.

If a man hunt with a tumbler (greyhound) in my warren, still I am not justified in killing the tumbler with my mastiff set on by me. This case was cited in Barrington v. Turner, 3 Lev. 28, where a recovery was denied for killing greyhounds which chased a deer in defendant's park. Lewins's Case, 2 Rolle, Abr. 567.

Where the defendant justified killing the plaintiff's mastiffs to prevent them from killing the plaintiff's hogs that were trespassing, Hale said: "The justification of killing the mastiffs is well enough; for a man may not set mastiffs upon pigs to kill them, but he may hunt them with a little dog." King v. Rose, Freem. C. L. 347, 4 Raym. 228, 3 Keb. 228.

In Wadhurst v. Damme, Cro. Jac. 45, in an action for trespass for killing a mastiff dog, a defense that the dog was in the habit of killing conies in his warren was held good.

A recovery could not be had for damages for killing a dog which chased a rabbit into the lands of the defendant, and ran against a dog spear and was injured. Jordin v. Crump, 8 Mees. & W. 782, 11 L. J. Exch. N. S. 74.

In Deane v. Clayton, 2 Marsh. 577, 1 J. B. Moore, 203, 7 Taunt. 499, as to whether the owner of woodland was liable for placing dog spears near the paths, thereby killing a trespassing dog chasing a hare, the owner of the dog using all his endeavors to call in his dog, was not decided.

h. Dogs "at large."

Dogs held to be at large. Com. v. Chase, 6 Cush. 248; Com. v. Dow, 10 Met. 382; Julienne v. Jackson, 69 Miss. 34; Nehr v. State, 35 Neb. 638, 17 L. R. A. 771; Griggs v. Dittoe, 52 Ohio St. 601; Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689; Brown v. Carpenter, 26 Vt. 638, 62 Am. Dec. 603.

Dogs held not to be at large. Lowell v. Gathright, 97 Ind. 313; Bishop v. Fahay, 15 Gray, 61; McAneany v. Jewett, 10 Allen, 151; Swann v. Bowie, 2 Cranch, C. C. 221.

i. Killing a dog by mistake.

A party killing a dog by mistake is held liable. Hanson v. Kitner, 31 Ill. App. 242; Harris v. Eaton, 20 R. I. pt. 1, p. 84; Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130, 28 Am. Rep. 496.

VI. Criminal actions for injuries to dogs.

A criminal prosecution would lie at common law for malicious mischief in injuring a dog, but a dictum in Missouri denies that such an action could be maintained.

In King v. Chaloner, 12 Mod. 377, "an information was against him for killing my Lord S.'s dog, setting forth that Lord S. was riding in the vill of Rep. 472; State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599; State v. Holder, 81 N. C. 527, 31 Am. Rep. 517; Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 31; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 782; 1 McClain, Criminal Law, § 539.

At common law a chose in action was not the subject of larceny, and statutes making "personal goods" the subject of larceny are usually construed as not including choses in action, and to be included in the definition of larceny they must be designated in express words as our statute has done.

12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 784; United States v. Davis, 5 Mason, 356; Warner v. Com. 1 Pa. St. 154, 44 Am. Dec. 114; Culp v. State, 1 Port. (Ala.) 33, 26 Am. Dec. 357.

D. in the county of Middlesex, and that his greyhound being tunc et ibidem following him, the defendant drew his sword, and tunc et ibidem killed the dog. Not guilty pleaded; and at nisi prius the defendant relicta verificatione confessed the action; and the postea was, 'that at nisi prius at such a day, the defendant relicta verificatione confessed the action.' Holt, Chief Justice. 'You should not have mentioned the nisi prius at all, but have entered it as of a term before; or, since you have mentioned it, you should have shewed that the jury was called, etc., and then the defendant relicta, etc., for now you tell us of a nisi prius, and shew nothing that was done there.' Brothrick excepted, that it did not appear what county the dog was in; for though Lord S. is said to be in Middlesex, the dog might be in another county, and ad tunc et ibidem shall only go to the vill, which may extend to more counties than one. Sed Per Curiam; 'It shall go to both.'

In a criminal prosecution for malicious mischief in shooting a dog the court said that many actions have been brought in this state and in England for injuries to such property, and it was held "if, then, dogs be personal property, they are protected by the law, and the owner has such an interest in them as that he can protect and defend them: and the destruction of them from malice to the owner is, in law, malicious mischief." State v. Latham, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 33.

But in State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581, it was said that it was not an offense at common law to kill a dog, and that in that respect the common law is still in force in Missouri. (But see State v. Latham, and King v. Chaloner, supra).

Under statutes making it criminal to injure "property," prosecutions have been maintained for injury to dogs. State v. Sumner, 2 Ind. 377; Harness v. State, 27 Ind. 425; Sosat v. State, 2 Ind. App. 596; State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 523, 69 Am. Dec. 516; Nehr v. State, 35 Neb. 638, 17 L. R. A. 771.

But the converse was held in the following cases: State v. Marshall, 13 Tex. 55; Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, 24 L. R. A. 732; Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh, 809; Davis v. Com. 17 Gratt. 617; State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581.

A dog was embraced in the term "all brute creatures." State v. Giles, 125 Ind. 124.

Or "animal." Warner v. Perry, 14 Hun, 337.

"Or other beasts." United States v. Gideon, 1 Minn. 292.

But a dog was not embraced in "domestic animals." State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 46 Am. Rep. 423.

Or "cattle." State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581.

In some prosecutions it was shown that the word "dog" was mentioned specifically in the statutes against malicious mischief. Hewitt v. State, 121 Ind. 245; Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132; State v. Pine, 30 Tex. 399; McDaniel v. State, 5 Tex. App. 475.

The terms "goods" and "chattels" cannot be extended by implication to include dogs, but if they are to be made the subjects of larceny it must be by a statutory enactment using express words for that purpose.

Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 695, 41 L. ed. 1169.

In the first place, the common law adopted and in force in Iowa is the common law and statutes of England in force and operation prior to the year 1707, the date of the union of England and Scotland under the title of Great Britain.

O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 381; Reynolds v. Wilmette, 45 Iowa, 693.

The statute of 10 Geo. III., chap. 18, only

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. p. 975, § 71, providing that any person who shall maliciously destroy any property shall be fined, it was held that "a man therefore at common law may have an absolute property in him" (a dog.) "A dog then, being a domestic animal, is a subject of absolute property, and, though not intrinsically for his flesh, yet extrinsically for his use, being of some, we might say of much, value, the killing of him under our statute is an indictable offense." State v. Sumner, 2 Ind. 377.

And under 2 Gavin. & H. (Ind.) p. 463, § 13, providing that every person who shall maliciously and mischievously injure any property of another shall be deemed guilty of a malicious trespass and be fined not exceeding twice the value of the damage done, in a prosecution for killing a dog it was held that the amount of damage done, and not the value of the animal killed, constituted the basis for the penalty and as a matter of law. The court said: "We cannot know that the dog was of no value after he was killed; at least, it is a fact that cannot be left to inference. Some animals are of as much value after they are killed as before. The damages occasioned by the injury complained of must be averred." Harness v. State, 27 Ind. 425.

And a conviction was had under Ind. Stat. Elliott's Supp. § 448, making it a misdemeanor for any person to mischievously or maliciously injure or kill any dog that has been listed for taxation, except sheep-killing dogs. Hewitt v. State, 121 Ind. 245.

Under Ind. act March 7, 1883, Acts 1883, p. 148, providing that any person who shall mischievously injure or kill any dog that has been duly listed for taxation shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, excepting from the act dogs killed while damaging property or sheep-killing dogs, a conviction was had where a dog was properly listed, and was not damaging any property, and was not shown to be a sheep-killing dog. Dinwiddie v. State, 103 Ind. 101.

A conviction could be had under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1955, providing whoever maliciously or mischievously injures or causes to be injured any property of another is guilty of malicious trespass, notwithstanding the act of March 7, 1883, § 5, providing against maliciously injuring or killing any dog that has been listed for taxation. Sosat v. State, 2 Ind. App. 588.

In Sosat v. State, 2 Ind. App. 588, it was said that the case of Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132, was decided before the dog law of 1883 and 1881 had been enacted.

In Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132, under 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. 1876, p. 462 (1881, p. 186), in a prosecution for unlawfully, maliciously, and mischievously killing a dog, it was said that ever since Ind. act of March, 1861, providing for licensing dogs, the laws of this state have recognized the property in dogs, and have required that their owners should contribute certain sums to the revenue of the township on account of their ownership of such property; that the first act of March, 1861, called it a provided for the punishment for taking and carrying away a dog, but did not make it larceny.

1 McClain, Criminal Law, § 589; 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 38, § 23.

Criminal and penal statutes are to be strictly construed, and their effect not to be extended by implication.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 374, 375, 387.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question presented by this appeal is whether or not a dog is the subject of larceny. That it was not at common law is conceded. The reasons for this were twofold: First, because it had no intrinsic value; and, second, because it was not fully domesticated, but by nature base. The courts held that dogs, although reclaimed, could not be used for food, but were kept for the mere whim or pleasure of their owners, and therefore had no intrinsic value. A great deal of research and eloquence has been wasted in attempting to show the fallacy of this rule. It appears to be well settled, however, that, in the absence of statutory modification of the common law, dogs are not the subject of larceny. State v. Lymsus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 772; State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599. When the statute relating to larceny covers "personal property in general," or "anything of value," some license fee, and the act of March, 1865, called it a township tax. The court said it may well be said that any article of property which the law subjects to taxation is prima facie an article of value.

Under Elliott's Supp. § 335, punishing cruelty to animals and defining the word "animal" to include all brute creatures and all domestic fowls, a conviction could be had for mutilating a dog. State v. Giles, 125 Ind. 124.

But under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2101, providing that whoever cruelly beats or needlessly mutilates or kills any animal shall be fined, etc., a conviction could not be had where some fox hounds were killed, and the defendant by mistake believed that they were chasing his sheep, although the hounds were on a fox trail. Hunt v. State, 3 Ind. App. 383.

In a prosecution for killing a dog under N. H. Rev. Stat. chap. 215, providing that if a person wilfully and maliciously commit any act whereby the personal estate of another shall be injured, such person shall be punished, it was held that dogs are the subject of property, and capable of being wilfully and maliciously injured under the statute. State v. Molbuffle, 34 N. H. 523, 39 Am. Dec. 516.

So, under a prosecution for maliciously killing a dog under Neb. Crim. Code, § 109, providing that if any person shall wilfully and maliciously injure or destroy any personal property, etc., it was held that a dog was property, and no one could destroy the same maliciously without making himself liable. Nehr v. State, 35 Neb. 638, 17 L. R. A. 771.

In State v. Marshall, 13 Tex. 55, under Tex. Hart. Dig. art. 560, providing that if any person shall wilfully and maliciously kill any horse, cattle, goat, sheep, or swine, or shall wilfully injure or destroy any property of another he shall be punished, a conviction could not be had for killing a dog. The statute has been changed since this decision.

In State v. Marshall, 13 Tex. 55, it was said that in some states dogs are by statute placed upon the same footing as other personal property, but we have in this state no statute upon the subject (malicious mischief). "They are not regarded by the law as being of the same intrinsic value, as property, as the animals enumerated in the statute."

But under Paschal's Dig. art. 2344, providing that if any person shall wilfully kill, maim, wound, poison, or disfigure any dog of another with intent to injure the owner thereof, he shall be fined, etc., a conviction could be had for killing a dog, the property of A. B. This statute changed the rule of law in Texas. State v. Pine, 30 Tex. 399.

And under Paschal's Dig. art. 2344, a conviction was had for killing a trespassing dog. McDaniel v. State, 5 Tex. App. 475.

In an action for false imprisonment it was held that under N. Y. Sess. Laws 1866, chap. 632, p. 1456, amending Rev. Statutes, pt. 4, tit. 6, chap. 1, § 26, and providing that any person who shall maliciously kill, maim, wound, or injure other animals shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and Laws 1867, chap. 375, § 40 L. R. A.

1, providing that if any person shall needlessly mutilate or kill any living creature such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, a conviction was wrongful where there was no allegation that the shooting of a dog was needlessly or maliciously done. Warner v. Perry, 14 Hun. 337.

In a prosecution for malicious mischief for killing a dog, a conviction was set aside because of failure of proof of ownership. The court said: "A dog, although for some purposes regarded in law as the subject of property, ministers rather to the pleasure than to the necessities or profit of his owner, especially when the latter is a youth. It is not, therefore, such an article as the father is bound to furnish to his minor child living with and dependent upon him. The dog of Chalmers Bookman was not given to him by his father, nor had the latter ever owned it. The son's title was wholly independent of the father." State v. Trapp, 14 Rich. L. 203.

It was necessary to allege and prove the value of a dog that was alleged to have been killed, under Minn. Rev. Stat. chap. 101, § 39, providing punishment for wilfully and maliciously killing, maiming, or disfiguring horses, cattle, or other beasts of another person. United States v. Gideon, 1 Minn. 292.

Under Ga. Penal Code, § 729, providing all other acts of wilful and malicious mischief in that injuring or destroying any other public or private property not herein enumerated shall be a misdemeanor, a conviction was had for the wilful and malicious killing of a dog. Wilcox v. State (Ga.) 39 L. R. A. 709.

But a conviction could not be had under Ga. Code, § 4637, providing that acts of wilful and malicious mischief in the injuring or destroying of any other public or private property not herein enumerated shall be punished, as this was intended to apply to inanimate property; and § 4612, providing against maliciously maiming or killing any horse, mule, bull, steer, ox, cow, calf, heifer, or other animal under the description heretofore given of horses and cattle, was not intended to apply to dogs. Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, 24 L. R. A. 732.

In Wilcox v. State (Ga.) 39 L. R. A. 709, it was said that the discussion in the Patton Case as to whether dogs were property was not necessary for the determination of the question involved.

So, under Va. Laws 1822-23, chap. 34, § 1 (Sess. Acts, p. 36), providing that any person who shall knowingly and wilfully without lawful authority destroy or injure any tree or property, real or personal, belonging to another, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, a conviction could not be had for killing dogs belonging to another. Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh. 809.

And under Va. Code, chap. 192, § 53, p. 796, providing that if a person unlawfully, but not feloniously destroy, deface, or injure any property, real or personal, not his own, he shall be guilty of a courts hold that a dog is included and becomes the subject of larceny. Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 865; Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 480, 15 Am. Rep. 355; Hurley v. State, 30 Tex. App. 333; State v. Yates, 10 Crim. L. Mag. 439. But the cases are by no means harmonious upon this proposition. See Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 31. In some states it is suggested that in subjecting dogs to taxation they are thereby made the subject of larceny under the generic terms "personal property" or "chattels," found in the statutes. Com. v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky. 681; Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 865. It is also said by other quite as respectable courts that these taxes are not imposed on the theory that dogs are property, but as police regulations, and therefore such taxation does not bring them within the statute. State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599, and State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 773. See also Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169. Our statute (Code 1873, § 3902) makes it a crime for anyone to steal any money, goods, or chattels of another; and if dogs are intended to be included it must be under the terms "goods and chattels." That they are not goods is clear. "Chattels," however, is a broader and more comprehensive term, and includes all kinds of property except the freehold and things which are a parcel of it. The supreme misdeemeanor, a conviction could not be had for killing a dog. Davis v. Com. 17 Gratt. 617.

And an indictment for killing a dog could not be sustained under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 127, § 1, providing punishment for killing or wounding "domestic animals." State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 46 Am. Rep. 453.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 3620, providing punishment for persons who shall wilfully and maliciously kill, maim or wound any horse, mare, colt, mule, or ass or neat or horned cattle of another, and § 3621, providing punishment against any person who shall wilfully and maliciously or cruelly maim, wound, beat, or torture any horse or other cattle, a conviction could not be had for killing a dog. State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581.

And under Mo. Rev. Stat. § 3593, providing punishment against any person who shall wilfully destroy or injure any goods, wares, or merchandise or other personal property of another, a conviction could not be had for killing a dog, as this statute was applicable to inanimate subjects of property, and did not include dogs. State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581.

Under S. C. act Jan. 1861 (12 Stat. at L. 903), providing for malicious trespass against certain animals and "other personal property," the question whether the malicious killing of a dog was embraced within the act was not decided. State v. Trapp, 14 Rich. L. 203.

A prosecution could not be maintained for maliciously killing a dog listed for taxation, under Ind. act March 7, 1893, as said act was repealed by act May 5, 1891 (Acts 1891, p. 453). State v. Brugh, 5 Ind. App. 592.

No reference was made to the case of Sosat v. State, 2 Ind. App. 549, probably because the prosecution was under a different statute.

In a suit for false imprisonment where a man beat a small dog that ran out barking towards him, and he was arrested a mile from the house and was taken before a magistrate and was discharged, and it was pleaded in justification that 7 & 8 Geo. IV. chap. 30, § 24, giving magistrates power of awarding compensation in cases of wilful and malicious injury to "property," and § 28, authorizing the immediate apprehension without warrant of persons found committing any offense against the act, the court left it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff had committed a wilful injury to the dog, and secondly whether he was found committing that offense and immediately apprehended, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff. Hanway v. Boulton, 1 Moody & R. 15, 4 Car. & P. 350.

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. chap. 28, § 8, providing that it shall be an offense to deposit any of certain poisons within 200 rods of a highway, pasture, field, or other improved land for the purpose of killing wolves, foxes, dogs, or other animals, an indictment which alleged that the defendant deposited poison in a certain field within 200 rods of a highway and pasture was held good on demurrer. State v. Bucknam (Me.) 2 New Eng. Rep. 697.

In regard to cruelty to animals, in some cases the prosecution failed on account of evidence.

So, under a statute against cruelty to animals a conviction could not be had where a man set a trap on his own premises in a bucket of slop, and a dog that had been in the habit of prowling at night and committing depredations was caught by the tongue. Hodge v. State, 11 Lea. 528, 47 Am. Rep. 307.

Where a party lawfully shot a neighbor's dog which was trespassing, and told the owner and policeman, and the defendant dragged the dog into the road, where he died some hours afterwards in great pain, a conviction could not be had under 12 & 13 Vict. chap. 92, § 2, for illtreating and torturing and causing to be cruelly illtreated and tortured a dog. It was held that the shooting was not unlawful, and no act of torture under the statute in this case was done by the defendant. Powell v. Knight, 38 L. T. N. S. 607, 28 Week. Rep. 721.

In People, Walker, v. New York Special Sessions, 4 Hun. 441, it was held that although a dog was not a beast of burden, yet it was not cruelty to train and subject him to any useful purpose. The court said that his use upon a treadmill or upon an inclined plane, or in any mode by which his strength and docility may be made serviceable to man is commendable and not criminal, but his abuse while so employed, whenever it amounts to cruelty, is a crime and punishable precisely under the same circumstances as the cruel usage of the higher animals.

Among the earliest laws for the protection of dogs is that mentioned in 7 Edinburgh Enc. p. 64: "Thus, this animal is put under the protection of the most ancient laws, which enact that 'no one should disturb or stop a bloodhound or man passing with him to follow thieves, or take malefactors.'"

VII. Larceny and obtaining a dog by false pretences.

At common law it was not larceny to steal a dog. The reason given was that larceny was punishable by death, and it was not fit that a man should suffer death for stealing a dog, and yet it was larceny to steal a hawk because used by princes and noblemen for hunting. At the same time the right of property in dogs was protected by allowing a civil action for their recovery or for injuries done to them, and a statute was passed, 10 Geo. III., chap. 18, making it a criminal offense to steal a dog. In this country some few states still preserve the relics of the common law in regard to prosecutions for larceny of a dog, while others have passed statutes making it larceny. In regard to construing statutes to include a dog which make it larceny to steal goods, chattels, or other property and the like, there is some conflict of authority. The construction of the courts in Kansas, Kentucky, New York, Tennessee, and Texas was that a dog was included in such a statute. In Alabama, Indiana, and Ohio it was held that such a phrase did not include dogs. But in Ohio this was changed by a subsequent amendment adding "anything of value."

In Coke Litt. 3, 109, it was said that a man hath a court of Kentucky, in the case of Com. v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky. 681, held that a dog was a "chattel," basing its holding upon the thought that the laws of that state recognized dogs as property, for the reason that they imposed a tax upon them, made the owner liable for damages done, and recognized the animal as property in all civil proceedings. But the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Findlay v. Bear, 8 Serg. & R. 571, held to exactly the contrary doctrine. See also Reg. v. Robinson, 28 L. J. M. C. N. S. 58. Those courts which hold that a dog is not "personal property," a "thing of value," or a "chattel," bottom their conclusion upon the assumption that it is not property in the strict sense of the term, and that dogs as a class have no intrinsic value. In the case of Warren v. State, 1 G. Greene, 106, we held that a raccoon was fera nature, and of so base a nature, in contemplation of law, as that one who stole it was not guilty of a larceny; citing Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 204, 20 Am. Dec. 573. But in the subsequent case of Anson v. Dwight, 18 Iowa, 241, which was, it is true, a civil case, we said: "Dogs may be personal property, and have value." Neither of these cases decides the question now before us, although it must be conceded that, if we follow the rule of the Warren Case to its logical conclusion, and mere property in some things which are tame by nature, and yet in respect of the baseness of their nature a man shall not commit any larceny, great or small, though he steal them, as of mastiffs, bloodhounds, or other kind of dogs, or cats.

In Lambard's Eirenarcha, 267, cited in Reg. v. Robinson, Bell, C. C. 35, it was said that "it is felonie to steale any the moveable goods of any person; but because it may in some cases be doubted whether the things so taken are to be numbered amongst moveable goods or no I will proceed in particularitie . . . to take dogges of any kind, . . . though they be in the house, is no felonie."

And a person could not be convicted of obtaining a dog by false pretenses, since it was not an animal in respect to which larceny could be committed. Reg. v. Robinson, Bell C. C. 34, 5 Jur. N. S. 203, 28 L. J. M. C. N. S. 58.

In Hale, P. C. 512, it was said that "larceny cannot be committed in some things, whereof the owner may have a lawful property, and such whereupon he may maintain an action of trespass, in respect of the baseness of their nature, as mastiffs, spaniels, greyhounds, bloodhounds" though reclaimed; "they serve not for food, but pleasure." But it was said to be larceny to steal a reclaimed hawk because used by princes and great men, and on account of the nobleness of its nature.

In Swan's Case, 7 Coke, 18a, it was said that a man may have property in some things which are of so base a nature that no felony can be committed of stealing them, and no man shall lose life or member for them, as of a bloodhound or mastiff molesters.

In Latham, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 33; Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573, it was said that by the old authorities a dog was not a subject of larceny because he was without value, but notwithstanding it is a species of property recognized as such by the law, and for an injury to which an action at law will be sustained.

In Davis v. Com. 17 Gratt. 617, it was said that at common law a conviction of larceny could not be had for stealing a dog, and this has never been altered by statute notwithstanding the reason for the distinction between other property and dogs has long since ceased.

And in Com. v. Maclin, 3 Leigh, 809, and State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 523, 69 Am. Dec. 516, it was said that by the common law the property in dogs is not such that larceny can be committed by stealing them.

And in Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, it was said that at common law it was not larceny to steal a dog, but that it was larceny to steal the "skin of a dead dog."

1 Burne's Justice of the Peace, p. 1174, says: "A remark has been made by Sir John Fielding in his 'Observations on the Penal Laws,' which ought to be repeated here. He recommends it to all persons to put brass or steel collars on their dogs' necks, with the name and place of abode of their owners, and to fasten them with a padlock; for the stealing such collars being felony, it will facilitate the punishing of the offender; and the dog, when found, is recoverable by action."

In Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689, it was said that they were not the subject of larceny at the common law. "Later cases, however, in the United States, hold that such property is also the subject of larceny."

In People, Shand, v. Tighe, 9 Misc. 607, it was said that the excuse of the courts in ancient times for not regarding the dog as property was that the prescribed punishment at that time for larceny of property of the value of 12 pence or more was death, and they thought it not fit that a man should die for a dog, and yet it was larceny to steal a tame hawk or a dog's hide.

In Norton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573, it was said that things of a base nature in contemplation of law, as dogs, cats, etc., cannot by the common law be the subject of larceny, although a man may have property in them which the law will protect by civil action.

In State v. Holder, 81 N. C. 527, 31 Am. Rep. 517, and Mowery v. Salisbury, 82 N. C. 175, it was said that the common law was the law of that state in regard to larceny of a dog, and that there was no statute making it larceny to steal a dog.

In State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599, it was said that the owners of dogs may have a property in them which the law will protect; that they are not a subject of larceny; that they are a subject of malicious trespass as held in Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132. The court said that this, however, does not settle the question; it does not follow that because a dog is the subject of malicious trespass it is the subject of larceny.

In Blair v. Forehand, 100 Mass. 136, 1 Am. Rep. 94, it was said that "beasts which have been thoroughly tamed, and are used for burden or husbandry, or for food, such as horses, cattle, and sheep, are as truly property of intrinsic value, and entitled to the same protection, as any kind of goods. But dogs and cats, even in a state of domestication, never wholly lose their wild natures, . . . and therefore although a man might have such a right of property in a dog as to maintain trespass or trover for unlawfully taking or destroying it, yet he was held, in the phrase of the books, to have "no absolute and valuable property therein, which could be the subject of a prosecution for larceny at common law, or even, according to some authorities, of an action of detinue or replevin or a distress for rent."

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2647, providing that anyone who shall own or harbor a dog on or before April 1, 1882, shall pay $1 for a registry number for a male dog and $2 for a female, and $2 for each additional dog, and § 2648, providing that it is unlawful for any unregistered dog to run at large and anyone may kill him, and § 2649, providing that anyone who shall steal or take any registered dog shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, a conviction could not be had under Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1963, making it grand larceny to steal "the personal hold that the terms "goods and chattels," as used in this criminal statute, are to be interpreted according to the strict rules of the common law, we must ultimately decide that dogs are not the subject of larceny. Code 1873, § 45, ¶ 2, provides that words and phrases should be construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language; paragraph 10, that "the word 'property' includes personal and real property;" and that (¶ 9) the words "personal property" include money, goods, chattels, evidence of debt, and things in action. In the case of State v. Phipps, 95 Iowa, 491, we held that the word "chattel," as used in a criminal statute relating to malicious mischief, covered horses and every other kind of personal property. We are constrained to believe that the definition of the words "goods and chattels," as used in the statute under consideration, should be referred to the common understanding at the time when the statute was enacted, and not to the strict rules of the common law that have no application to our present ideas with reference to the value and use of domesticated animals. No argument is needed to demonstrate that dogs are of much greater value to man than some animals to which the common law attributed value because of their use for food. Much that is said by Justice Earl in the Mulky Case might be goods of another" of the value of $25, and § 1834, making it petit larceny to steal the "personal goods of another" of the value of less than $25, where a dog was stolen in 1881, as he was not the subject of larceny, and the legislature did not intend by the words "personal goods" in defining grand and petit larceny to include dogs. State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599.

In State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 772, it was said, "In describing the property of which a larceny, either grand or petit, may be committed, the statutes of this state use the words 'goods and chattels.' . . . As dogs, at the common law, were held not to be the subjects of larceny, they are not included in the words 'goods and chattels' as used in the statutes referred to."

And the common-law rule that dogs are not such personal property as is the subject of larceny was held to apply under Ala. Rev. Code, § 3708, providing that any person who steals any personal property under any other circumstances than are specified in the two preceding sections is guilty of petit larceny. Ward v. State, 48 Ala. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 81.

So, under Pa. act April 5, 1790, 2 Sm. Laws, 531, providing that if any person shall feloniously steal, take, and carry away any goods, chattels, etc., he shall be guilty of petit larceny, it was not slander to charge that the plaintiff stole a dog, as there could be no felony of a dog. Findlay v. Bear, 8 Serg. & R. 571.

In 2 East, P. C. 614, it was said that there are some animals which, though they may be reclaimed, are considered of so base a nature that no larceny can be committed of them, and the same rule applied to dogs. But now by statute 10 Geo. III., chap. 18, the stealing of dogs is made punishable upon conviction before two justices.

Blackstone says, vol. 4, p. 236, as to those animals which do not serve for food, and which therefore the law holds to have no intrinsic value, as dogs of all sorts, and other creatures kept for whim and pleasure, though a man may have a base property therein, and may maintain a civil action for the loss of them, yet they are not of such estimation as that the crime of stealing them amounts to larceny. But by stat. 10 Geo. III., chap. 18, very high pecuniary penalties, or a long imprisonment and whipping in their stead, may be inflicted by two justices of the peace (with a very extraordinary mode of appeal to the quarter sessions) on such as steal, or knowingly harbor a stolen dog, or have in their custody the skin of a dog that has been stolen.

In Rex v. Helps, 3 Maule & S. 331, a conviction was had under 10 Geo. III., chap. 18 (act against dog stealing.)

Stat. 7 & 8 Geo. IV., chap. 29, § 31, provides that if any person shall steal any dog, or shall steal any beast or bird ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, not being the subject of larceny at common law, every such offender being convicted thereof before a justice of the peace shall forfeit, etc. Dr. 40 L. R. A.

Burns in Burns's Justice of the Peace, vol. 3, p. 673, questions whether under this statute it is not doubtful if the act makes it penal to steal a bitch.

24 & 25 Vict. chap. 26, and 8 & 9 Vict. chap. 47, and 7 & 8 Vict. chap. 47, were enacted against stealing a dog, or having possession of a stolen dog or the skin of a stolen dog, knowing the same to have been stolen.

In Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, 53 Am. Rep. 478, it was said that at common law a dog was not the subject of larceny, and slander could not be brought under the charge of stealing a dog; but by Ga. Code, § 4402, all domestic animals fit for food, and also a dog, are made subjects of simple larceny.

In Weathley v. Harris, 4 Sneed, 468, it was said by statute 10 Geo. III., chap. 18, to steal a dog was made subject to penal punishment by fine or imprisonment at the discretion of the justices, and for the second offense, in addition, the dog stealer was to be whipped.

In State v. Brown, 9 Baxt. 53, 40 Am. Rep. 81, it was said that the doctrine of the common law in regard to dogs not being personal property within the definition of larceny was abrogated by 10 Geo. III., chap. 18. It was said that there is a conflict of rulings in the different states.

In Johnson v. McConnell, 80 Cal. 545, it was said that at common law and in some of the states dogs are not the subject of larceny, but under Cal. Penal Code, § 491, they are declared to be property, and made subject of larceny.

In Woolf v. Chalker, 31 Conn. 121, 81 Am. Dec. 175, it was said at common law property in a dog, though recognized, has always been held to be "base," inferior, and entitled to less regard and protection than property in other domestic animals, and the court said: "Although since protected by express statutes from theft, the common-law estimate of property in them has never been changed."

In Patton v. State, 93 Ga. 111, 24 L. R. A. 732, it was said: "We do not think it probable the legislature of this state ever regarded the dog as being, in a general sense, property concerning which a criminal offense could be committed. After provision is made in the 6th division, title 1, of the [Ga.] Penal Code, for the indictment and punishment of larcenies of various domestic animals, § 4402 provides as follows: 'All other domestic animals which are fit for food, and also a dog, may be subjects of simple larceny; and any person or persons who shall steal any such animal or animals shall be punished' etc. If a dog had been considered as property, as are domestic animals fit for food, it is not likely that it would have been deemed necessary to provide especially that the stealing of one should be simple larceny."

The stealing of a dog is larceny, and it is slander to charge another person with stealing a dog. It was said that under Kan. Gen. Stat. 332, § 73, the quoted with profit, but the length of this opinion forbids. There are other provisions of the Code of 1873 which recognize property in dogs. Thus we find that an owner is liable for all damages done by his dog (§ 1485); that dogs are assessable both by the county and city authorities (see Acts 20th Gen. Assem. chap. 70, and § 499, Code 1873); and that cities may require dogs to be kept upon the premises of the owners thereof (17th Gen. Assem. chap. 25). While these are all in the nature of police regulations, yet they clearly recognize property in dogs; and it seems to us they are comprehended within the term "chattels" as used in the statute defining larceny. Surely, it was not the intent of the legislature to recognize dogs as property for the purposes of taxation, and yet leave them to the mercy of thieves. We reach this conclusion unmindful of the fact that the legislature in adopting the new Code added after the word "chattels" as it appears in the Code of 1873 these words: "Including all domesticated or restrained animals." In our opinion, the statute covered "dogs" before its amendment, and the added words have reference to other animals not covered by the generic term "chattels." We are of opinion that a dog is the subject of larceny, and that the trial court erroneously discharged the appellee.

taking and carrying away of any money, goods, rights in action, or other personal property or other valuable thing whatever, is declared to be larceny, and the legislative act levying a tax on dogs and rendering the owner of a dog liable for injuries to sheep, indicate that a dog is property and a thing of value. Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 481, 15 Am. Rep. 355.

And under Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 29, art. 11, § 1, providing for the punishment of persons guilty of larceny of goods and chattels, it was held that a dog was property, so as to bring him within the meaning of the term "chattel," as the legislature by various acts recognizes the dog as property, such as by the act of January 31, 1865, making them liable to assessment and taxation; and this was so without regard to the act of May 17, 1866, providing that upon the listing of a dog with the county clerk and the payment of taxes therein provided, he should for one year from that time be considered personal property for all purposes as fully as any other kind of personal property. The court said that he was already personal property. Com. v. Hazelwood, 84 Ky. 681.

In State v. Mease, 69 Mo. App. 581, it was said that under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 3535, dogs are the subject-matter of larceny by special statute.

In Carthage v. Rhodes, 101 Mo. 175, 9 L. R. A. 352, in a prosecution for failing to pay a license, it was said that dogs by statute have been made the subject of larceny.

Under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 690, § 1, providing that every person who shall be convicted of stealing the "personal property" of another of the value of $25 or under shall be adjudged guilty of petit larceny, and p. 703, § 33, defining "personal property" to mean "goods, chattels, effects, evidences of rights of action," etc., it was held that this was comprehensive enough to include dogs. Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365.

In Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, it was said that a system of taxation of dogs is enacted in Rev. Stat. 704, and "it can scarcely be supposed that the legislature meant to regard dogs as property for the purpose of taxation, and yet leave them without protection against thieves."

So under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 679, § 363 (63), providing that any person who shall be convicted of the felonious taking and carrying away of personal property of another of the value of more than $25 shall be adjudged guilty of grand larceny, and 2 Rev. Stat. 702, § 33, defining personal property to mean goods, chattels, effects, etc., an indictment for grand larceny for stealing one dog of the value of $50 and one collar of the value of $1, the property of A. B., was maintained. The court said if what is property depends upon the law or usages of society it would be impossible to say that the quality of the exclusive right of the owner to the use or enjoyment of his dog, his absolute power to sell and dispose of it, and the other characteristics and attributes of property had not been impressed by these laws and usages upon a dog. People v. Campbell, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 386.

Under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. p. 679, § 63, p. 702, § 33, an indictment charging grand larceny in stealing a dog of the value of $100, the property of A. B., was sustained. People v. Maloney, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 598.

In People, Shand, v. Tighe, 9 Misc. 607, it was said that under the common law of England a dog was not property, and it was not larceny to steal a dog although it was to steal a dead dog's hide, but the world moves and these crudities no longer exist, and in this state a dog is property.

In Lavery v. Hogan, 2 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 197, and People, Longwell, v. McMaster, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 132, it was said that dogs are the subject of larceny.

An indictment charging that the defendants in the night season forcibly broke and entered a stable with intent to steal two dogs, and that so entering they did steal two dogs of the value of $40, was good, as the larceny act of Ohio now defines property that may be stolen as "anything of value," and a dog comes within the meaning of the phrase "anything of value." State v. Yates, 19 Ohio L. J. 150.

In State v. Yates, 19 Ohio L. J. 150, it was said that since the decision of State v. Lymus, 26 Ohio St. 400, 20 Am. Rep. 772, which held that goods and chattels in the larceny act did not include a dog, the statute has been changed, and the words now used are "anything of value."

In that case the court also said that at the common law dogs were property, and although it was not a crime to steal a dog, yet it was such an invasion of property as might amount to a civil injury and be redressed by a civil action; but "why trespass would lie for stealing a dog, when it was no crime to steal him, is not plain to a mind unversed in that 'perfection of human reason' once, as before said, part of the common law."

Under Pa. act May 15, 1889 (Pub. Laws, 222), entitled, "An Act for the Taxation of Dogs and the Protection of Sheep," and providing that all dogs in this commonwealth shall hereafter be personal property and subject of larceny, a conviction was sustained. Com. v. Depuy, 148 Pa. 201.

In Harris v. Eaton, 20 R. I. pt. 1, p. 84, it was said that R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 93, providing for licensing dogs, makes a licensed dog property and the subject of larceny.

The Ala. act February 12, 1887, § 2, providing that anyone who shall take away with intent to steal or hold for a reward a dog registered under that act shall be punished on conviction as in other cases of larceny, was void for uncertainty, as the act did not provide punishment dependent upon value, or that the offender should be guilty of grand or petit larceny, or that he should be punished as in cases of grand larceny or petit larceny; and the court held that the act created an offense, but it failed to fix any certain punishment. Johnston v. State, 100 Ala. 32.

A dog not registered under Pa. act May 18, 1878, extending the act of April 6, 1854, throughout the commonwealth, was not the subject of larceny in a county in which the option act of June 12, 1878, had not been established. Com. v. Huggins, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 671.

In the note to Pepper and Lewis's Digest, 1239, it was said: "But, § 3 of the act of 1854, April 6 (Pub. Laws, 286), made registered dogs personal property and the subject of larceny, the act of 1878, June 12, (Pub. Laws, 198, § 6), made all dogs subjects of larceny in counties which by vote accepted the act, and by the act of 1893, May 25 (Pub. Laws, 136, § 7), supplying the act of 1889, May 15 (Pub. Laws, 22, § 6), all dogs in this commonwealth shall be the subject of larceny."

Under Tenn. Code, § 51, defining "personal property" to mean "goods and chattels," a dog is personal property, and if of any value is the subject of larceny under the statute. State v. Brown, 9 Baxt. 53, 40 Am. Rep. 81.

Under Texas Penal Code, art. 724, defining theft to be the fraudulent taking of corporeal property belonging to another, and § 725, providing that the personal property must be such as has some specific value which can be ascertained, embracing every species of personal property capable of being taken, and art. 733, providing that all domesticated animals and birds when they are proved to be of any specific value are within the meaning of "personal property," and art. 679, making it an offense to wilfully kill, wound, poison, or disfigure any dog or other domesticated animal,—a dog was held to be an animal and a subject of theft. Hurley v. State, 30 Tex. App. 333.

In Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153, it was said that for the theft of a dog the party could be convicted of a felony.

VIII. Value.

The value of a dog may be proved as that of any other property, by evidence that he was of a particular breed and had certain qualities, and by witnesses who knew the market value of such an animal, if any market value be shown. Some cases hold that it is not necessary to allege or prove the value in an action for unlawfully shooting a dog. This was so at common law, yet it was held at common law that the absence of any value was the reason that prevented a prosecution for larceny of a dog.

In CITIZEN'S RAPID TRANSIT CO. v. DEW it was held that the value of a dog could be shown by proving his pedigree, in addition to proof of qualities that made him valuable as a hunting dog. But 40 L. R. A.

2. A dog is not a trespasser on a street-car track which is laid in the highway on the same level with it.

3. The right to recover for injury to a dog is not lost by killing him under the honest but mistaken belief that he was fatally injured.

4. A motorman cannot rely upon the quickness and celerity of a dog to absolve himself from all duty and care to prevent running over him with an electric car.

5. A jury may consider common knowledge and observation about the habits and qualities of dogs.

6. The owner of a dog has such property the verdict was sustained by proof of value without regard to pedigree.

In an action against a street-railway company for killing a dog on the track, evidence by a witness who raised, trained, exhibited, and bought and sold dogs, that he knew their market value at that place, and that the dog in controversy was worth from $100 to $200, uncontradicted, was sufficient to sustain a verdict for $96. Melech v. Rochester Electric R. Co. 72 Hun, 604.

And in a suit against a railroad company for loss of a dog by baggagemen, the evidence concerning the dog in question by the owner, and the opinions of other witnesses on the value of dogs generally having the qualities attributed to this particular dog, was rightly admitted. The court said that such is the usual mode of ascertaining the price of cattle or sheep or any other marketable commodity, and it is necessarily more or less a matter of opinion among the dealers of such stock or property. Cantling v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 54 Mo. 385, 14 Am. Rep. 476.

In an action for wrongful killing of a dog it was held that the value of the personal property may be established by the opinion of witnesses who first show that they know that value. The court said that dogs may be personal property and have value, and are in such cases within the rule. Anson v. Dwight, 18 Iowa, 241.

So, in an action to recover damages for killing a shepherd dog valuable to herd cattle, it was competent for farmers who have knowledge of the characteristics and qualities of the dog and of the value of such an animal to a person who keeps stock, to testify as to his value. The court said: "It is not necessary that personal property must have a market value in order to render such opinions competent." Bowers v. Horen, 93 Mich. 420, 17 L. R. A. 773.

So, in Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, it was said that large amounts of money are now invested in dogs, and they are largely the subject of trade and traffic, and in many ways they are put to useful service, and, so far as pertains to their ownership as personal property, they possess all the attributes of other personal property.

In an action against a common carrier it was said that all evidence concerning the value of the dog in question by the owner, and the opinion of other witnesses, and the value of dogs generally having the qualities of this particular dog, was rightly admitted. Cantling v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 54 Mo. 385, 14 Am. Rep. 476.

So, an instruction that if the jury found the dog to have a market value on account of its qualities as a watch dog they were to give that value as damages was sustained. Uhlein v. Cromack, 100 Mass. 273.

In Perry v. Phipps, 32 N. C. (10 Fred. L.) 259, 51 Am. Dec. 387, it was said that as a watch dog his value is constituted by his being sharp and dauntless, and erty in him that he may maintain an action for killing or injuring him.

7. It is a matter of common knowledge that pedigree enters into the consideration of the value of dogs, including such as are kept for sporting purposes.

8. Evidence of the pedigree of a dog is not inadmissible on the ground that it is hearsay.

9. A street-railway company is liable for the killing of a dog by an electric car, caused by the negligence of the motorman.

(February 9, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County therefore it would seem these properties cannot in themselves convert him into a nuisance.

In an action for killing a dog that was chasing cattle, it was held that an instruction assuming, as a matter of law, that such dogs have not an established commercial value in that county was erroneous, and it was not a question of law, but one of fact for the jury,—especially as the evidence showed that such animals had been frequently sold for a valuable consideration. Spray v. Ammerman, 68 Ill. 309.

An instruction that "they should find his value from his qualities rather than from the opinions of witnesses, who place their estimate on the loss of services of the dog for a given time" was wrong, as the jury would have a right to consider both in fixing the value of the dog, and as it took from the jury the consideration of any question of commercial value and loss of services. Spray v. Ammerman, 68 Ill. 309.

In Heilgmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 223, 13 L. R. A. 372, where a recovery was allowed for poisoning a dog, it was said: "The authorities well state that dogs are property, and that an owner has his action and remedy against a trespasser for the damages resulting from injuries inflicted upon them. Some authorities hold that dogs have no market value. This may be relatively true, but it is not a rule that will govern in all cases. It may be difficult in the majority of cases to ascertain the market value of a dog, but such a result may in some cases be accomplished. The special charge asked by appellant and given by the court substantially presents the true rule in determining the value of dogs. It may be either a market value if the dog has any, or some special or pecuniary value to the owner, that may be ascertained by reference to the usefulness and services of the dog."

In Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 483, 15 Am. Rep. 355, in an action of slander for charging larceny of a dog, the court reviews the dog statutes of that state, and says it seems impossible in the light of these legislative and judicial expressions to decide that a dog is not property nor a thing of value.

In Archer v. Baertschi, 8 Ohio C. C. 12, it was said: "No controversy is made here, but that a dog is an animal that is of value, and that is recognized as property. While the supreme court at one time held that it was not the subject of larceny, yet they recognize under the decisions from the common law and from Blackstone down, that it was property sufficient to maintain a civil action, and could be protected as property."

So, in Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132, it was said, referring to a dog, that any article of property which the law subjects to taxation is prima facie an article of value.

And in Dickson v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 176, it was said by Lindley, L. J.: "So far 40 L. R. A.

in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of a dog. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Stuart Pilcher for appellant.

Mr. J. D. B. De Bow for appellee.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for negligently injuring and killing a dog. It was commenced before a justice of the peace, and on appeal was tried in the circuit court, before the court and a jury. There have been two trials, the first resulting in a mistrial, and the second in a verdict and judgment for $250, and defendant, the Rapid-Transit Company, has appealed and as I know, dogs in general are not more valuable than sheep or pigs in general."

In a prosecution for maliciously killing a dog it was held that a dog has value, and the prosecution could be maintained. Nehr v. State, 35 Neb. 638, 17 L. R. A. 711.

In State v. Yates, 19 Ohio L. J. 150, the court said: Tested by the common sense of men, and even by the common law, can there be any question that dogs come within the meaning of the phrase, "anything of value?" And a demurrer to an indictment alleging that dogs are of the value of $40 admitted the averments.

In Brown v. Hoburger, 52 Barb. 15, it was held that in order to render opinions as to the value of a dog competent evidence, it should first be shown that the dog in question is a marketable animal either belonging to some peculiar breed or possessing some peculiar qualities which make him an animal usually vendible at some proximately regular price.

In Brown v. Hoburger, 52 Barb. 15, it was said that in Dunlap v. Snyder, 17 Barb. 561, it was held unanimously by the four judges that evidence of the value of a dog was incompetent (Overruling the decision in Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354), and that it was held in that case that the jury were the judges of the value of the animal after hearing all the evidence touching his qualities.

In Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354, in regard to the value of a well-broke setter dog, it was held that the opinions were barely competent, and the answers of the witnesses depended in a measure upon their skill and judgment in respect to these animals.

In Dunlap v. Snyder, 17 Barb. 561, it was said by C. L. Allen, criticizing the case of Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354, that "there is no standard market value for such property, if property it can be called, and men differ in opinion as their fancies dictate in respect to value;" that "it is not to be presumed that a court or jury would have found a dog of any value, who had been accustomed to worry and kill sheep." Hand, P. J., said: "I have some doubt whether it is competent for any witness to give an opinion as to the value of a dog. If that can be done I think it must first appear that the animal belongs to a species (if there are such) that have a market value; and the witness must have some acquaintance with the qualities of that class; and also have some knowledge of their value. . . . If the testimony upon the general character of the dog was admissible the defendant had a right to impeach it on the question of value by showing that he was a sheep killer."

In Harger v. Edmonds, 4 Barb. 256, it was said that in Brill v. Flagler, 23 Wend. 354, "the opinion of Chief Justice Nelson (for that was not necessary to the decision of the cause) went too far when it professed to sanction the competency of evidence assigned many errors. They are too numerous to treat separately and seriatim.

It is said there is no evidence to sustain the verdict. It appears that the Rapid Transit Company operates a line of electric street cars from Nashville to West Nashville, over a highway known as the "Charlotte Pike." This pike is a public thoroughfare for wagons and other vehicles, horses, cattle, pedestrians, and is much used and frequented. The plaintiff was passing over this turnpike, returning from a nutting expedition into the country, in a conveyance, with his two daughters. He had taken his gun with him, and also a favorite bird dog. The accident occurred about 5 o'clock in the evening. The dog was running along the turnpike or thoroughfare some 150 or 200 yards in front of the plaintiff's vehicle, when he started across the tracks of the street-car line, which were laid on the bed of the turnpike. Some little birds flying up attracted his attention, and he stopped in the center of the track, and, as some witnesses say, was in the act of "setting" the birds. The term "setting," as used here, has a somewhat technical meaning, and means that he was "standing" and intently looking in one direction. In dog parlance, therefore, "setting" means "standing," and the attitude is also called "pointing." While in this attitude a street car came up as to "the value of the services of a person in breaking a setter dog."

Blackstone, vol. 4, p. 236, says: "As to those animals which do not serve for food, and which therefore the law holds to have no intrinsic value, as dogs of all sorts, and other creatures kept for whim and pleasure, though a man may have a base property therein and maintain a civil action for the loss of them, yet they are not of such estimation as that the crime of stealing them amounts to larceny."

The reasoning of this statement should not apply to dogs, notwithstanding the contempt originally bestowed upon them. In some countries they are valuable as beasts of burden. "The ancients ate puppies as a delicacy, and they offered them in sacrifice to their gods. Dogs are generally an article of food in the South Sea Islands, and provided to regale the visitors of the inhabitants. In various parts of Africa they are held in like estimation, and in the kingdoms of Whidaw and Dahomy their flesh is exposed for sale in the public markets." 7 Edinburgh Enc. 646. So they are esteemed in China, Japan, and among the North American Indians. The dog is as necessary an adjunct to the hunter as his gun, and we are dependent upon this animal for all the delicacies in game season. Gloves made from his skin rival those from a kid or a chamois. Clothing is made from his hide. His instinct is unerring. His affection is unwavering, and with this animal more than any other the relation of master and slave develops into mutual regard and affection. Were it not for the prejudice and hue and cry against hydrophobia and the difficulty in fixing liability for injuries to sheep, this animal would take the place he deserves and be regarded as any other species of property. The personal pronoun in the old adage "Love me, love my dog" expresses the regard and estimation the owner feels in his property, however others may feel inclined to regard it as a base cur. Vast sums of money are invested annually in dogs, and their values may be said to be no more fictitious than that of a seal skin saque out in the latest style, or a pedigreed Jersey cow.

In Lentz v. Stroh, 6 Serg. & R. 34, in an action for killing a dog the plaintiff to swell the damages had given evidence of the excellent qualities of the dog, a first-rate hunting dog worth a cow, and that the plaintiff would as soon have lost the best horse in his stable, which had cost him $120. The court said that the value of the dog was a proper inquiry, but shall not the defendant on the general issue contradict the evidence, and say: "But the dog was a most worthless cur, a most mischievous animal, . . . that he was a wolf in the clothing of a dog; a caput lupinum, and, instead of being of the value of $50 as the plaintiff states in his writ, he was really of no value beyond the value of his skin."

In State v. Latham, 35 N. C. (18 Ired. L.) 33, it was said that by the old authorities a dog was not the subject of larceny because it was without value. 40 L. R. A.

It was not necessary for the maintenance of an action for shooting a dog that the dog be shown to have pecuniary value. Parker v. Miss, 27 Ala. 483, 62 Am. Dec. 778; Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 146, 32 Am. Dec. 677.

And under a prosecution for maliciously killing a dog it was not necessary that the value of the dog should be alleged in the indictment, or proved on the trial. United States v. Gideon, 1 Minn. 292.

In an action for wrongfully killing a dog the court cited a statute authorizing a tax on dogs for the protection of sheep owners, and held that an instruction requiring the plaintiff to show that the dog was of some pecuniary value was wrong, saying: "The law recognizes the right of property in dogs." Brent v. Kimball, 60 Ill. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 35.

In Simmonds v. Holmes, 61 Conn. 1, 15 L. R. A. 253, where plaintiff contended that "neither the common law nor the statute will justify the killing of a dog unless for the necessary protection of property, to be ascertained by comparing the value of the property being injured with the value of the dog," it was held that Conn. Gen. Stat. § 3757, allowed the killing of all dogs irrespective of their value, if engaged in mischief away from their keepers. The court said that "there is no time or opportunity to place a value on the dog or on the thing threatened with injury."

And in Johnston v. State, 100 Ala. 82, in a slander case it was said: "Dogs are not property. There is no presumption, therefore, that any dog is valuable. Not being property, the prima facie presumption in any case is that the animal has no value. It is, of course, competent for the legislature to make dogs property, and a status thus given them would, we may concede without deciding, carry with it a presumption of value. This act does not do this, even in respect of dogs registered under its provisions."

In Gibbons v. Van Alstyne, 29 N. Y. S. R. 461, in an action for wrongfully killing a dog it was said: "If a dog had no value," it was nevertheless a trespass to kill the dog upon the land of the plaintiff, for which he was entitled to a verdict against the defendant.

And in an action for killing a dog evidence as to his market value was improper where the dog was not shown to have any market value. Smith v. Griswold, 15 Hun, 273.

In Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, 38 Am. Rep. 476, it was said dogs seem to have no market value, and the rule of damages in the case of live stock killed by running of trains could not apply to them.

IX. As to license and tax laws.

a. Generally.

Dog license laws are generally held to be within the police power. Cases in regard to actions for rapidly, and some of the witnesses say almost noiselessly, upon him, and ran over and crushed him, so much that his owner, seeing that he was fatally injured, shot and killed him. It appears that the gong was not sounded, the motorman did not shout at the dog, and did not make any effort to check the car until it was so close that it was impossible to prevent running over the dog. The motorman excuses his act by saying that the dog came upon the track so abruptly and unexpectedly, and so nearly in front of the car, that there was no time to stop the car or sound the gong, or take any other precautions. There is other evidence to show that the dog could be seen, and was seen, quite a distance before the car reached him, and the weight of the evidence is in favor of this view of the case. The car was running rapidly and smoothly at the time, the dog was in plain view upon the track, and, according to some of the witnesses, the motorman was looking at him for some distance, and evidently expecting that he would leave the track in time to escape injury.

All other questions out of the way, there is ample evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury as to the killing, the negligence of the motorman, and the reckless running of the cars at a rapid rate of speed, and without due pre-funds raised by taxing dogs, and license cases that do not pass on property rights in dogs, are not intended to be included in this note.

An unlicensed dog running at large could be killed under an ordinance of Ogden City, Utah, providing that all dogs found running at large within the limits of the city, not registered and collared, shall be liable to be killed, where the charter provided that the city council shall have power to license dogs, regulate or prohibit the keeping of dogs, and to authorize the destruction of the same when at large contrary to ordinance. Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689.

And where a person was refused a certificate of exemption from the dog license duty, under 41 & 42 Vict. chap. 16, § 22, custom and inland revenue act 1878, providing for exemption in cases of shepherd dogs, a conviction could be had and the justices could not dismiss the prosecution on the ground that the offense was trivial.

In Independence v. Trouville, 15 Kan. 70, it was said that an ordinance providing for fees for a marshal for killing dogs at large should not be held to be invalid because of the sacredness of the property that may be held in dogs. The court said that "property in dogs is of such a low character that it is hardly considered as property at all. . . . We do not suppose that property in dogs is of such a sacred character that dogs found running at large upon the public streets, in violation of a city ordinance, cannot be destroyed, but must be taken up and impounded, as a cow or other more valuable animal."

In Julienne v. Jackson, 69 Miss. 34, in an action against a city for killing a dog at large, it was said: "It may be conceded that the plaintiff had a property right in the animal, and might have recovered his value as against one unlawfully killing him. But of all property, dogs are more peculiarly the subjects of police regulations than any other class."

The license laws are generally held to be an exercise of police power, and not an exercise of the taxing power.

So, under Ill. act May 20, 1879, entitled "An Act to Indemnify the Owners of Sheep in Cases of Damage Committed by Dogs," providing for license fee of $1 on each dog, it was held that the license fee was in no sense a tax, and was not within the operation of Ill. Const. art. 9, § 1, providing that all needful revenue shall be raised by levying a tax by valuation. The court said: "It is simply what it purports to be, a 'license fee,' and is imposed under the police power, and not under the taxing power of the state. Undoubtedly 'dogs' are regarded as a species of property for some purposes, but owing to their habits, which are known to be hurtful sometimes to persons and to some kinds of domestic animals, the keeping of them may be the subject of regulation provided by law." Cole v. Hall, 103 Ill. 30.

In State v. Doe, 79 Ind. 9, 41 Am. Rep. 599, it was 40 L. R. A.

said that specific taxes upon dogs can be upheld only on the ground that they are not revenue measures, but police regulations, and the specific tax levied on dogs in Indiana is a per capita tax on the dogs, and not ad valorem. The court said that "dogs are not by these statutes recognized as subjects of general taxation for revenue purposes, and taxed accordingly."

Indiana act March 2, 1865, entitled, "An Act to Discourage the Keeping of Useless and Sheep-Killing Dogs, and Providing Penalties for the Violation of Any of the Provisions of said Act by Officers and Others, and Also Repealing an Act to License Dogs," did not conflict with Ind. Const. art. 10, § 1, requiring that the general assembly shall provide by law for the uniform and equal rights of assessment and taxation, as the plain purpose of the act is not to provide a revenue, but to discourage the keeping of dogs, and as a measure of internal police the legislature has the power to encourage the rearing of sheep and to discourage the keeping of dogs. The court said it is a matter of no consequence how the sum charged to the owner of the dog may be collected. Mitchell v. Williams, 27 Ind. 62; State v. Cornnall, 27 Ind. 120.

Under a city ordinance requiring the payment of a tax of $2 by the owner of a dog, and providing a fine for the failure to pay for each dog owned, and authorizing the marshal to kill the dog, a conviction fining the owner of a dog could be had. The court said, although called a tax, yet it is not a revenue levy in either purpose or operation; that it was intended as a police regulation for reducing the number of mischievous dogs, and is a license law; $2 the price of license, or a tax for the privilege, and the collar and stamps are passports for the security of registered dogs. Com. v. Markham, 7 Bush, 487.

In Com. v. Markham, 7 Bush, 487, under an ordinance requiring the owner of a dog to pay $2 for license, which was held to be within the police power, it was said: "Had revenue been the object the charter gave ample power by an increase of taxation ad valorem without a fruitless resort to an unauthorized specific tax on dogs, which, moreover, would have violated the statute of 1865, allowing to every citizen of the state two dogs free from taxation."

And a dog tax is not a tax within the meaning of Mich. Const. art. 14, providing for specific state taxes, and is not a double tax, but is an exercise of the police power, and is valid. Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich. 183, 41 Am. Rep. 159.

Under Mich. Comp. Laws, § 2482, exempting a city railway from taxes other than the state specific tax on all the property of the company, a dog was not exempt, as Laws 1877, p. 239, imposes a tax on dogs, not by value, but specifically, of $1 for male dogs, and $3 for female dogs. It was held to be regarded as a license rather than a tax law, imposed on those who chose to keep animals that have caution to prevent accidents to animals on the track.

It was not error in the trial judge to charge that the street-car company must have sufficient employees on its cars to operate them in a careful manner, so as to prevent damages or injuries to persons and animals that might go upon the track, and was liable for a failure to do so; the question of what number would be sufficient being left to the jury, under all the circumstances. It appears that at this time and place the motorman was the only employee on the car, and he was doing duty both as motorman and conductor, the latter having left the car after it passed from the more crowded portion of the track nearer the city.

always been regarded as requiring special regulations different from that applied to others. Hendrie v. Kalthoff, 48 Mich. 306.

Under a charter of a city providing that a city shall have power to tax, regulate, restrain, and prohibit the running at large of dogs or cats, and providing for the impounding or destruction of either, it was held that the power granted was to tax dogs and regulate dogs, and was not limited simply to the power to restrain and prohibit dogs from running at large, and the city could impose a tax per capita upon dogs by way of license, and such power was not precluded by Mo. Const. art 10, § 4, requiring all property to be taxed in proportion to its value. Carthage v. Rhodes, 101 Mo. 175, 9 L. R. A. 352.

In Mowery v. Salisbury, 82 N. C. 175, it was said that "the plaintiff's contention is that, as dogs are property, the power of this municipal body is limited by the Constitution to the imposition of an ad valorem tax, and that for its nonpayment the destruction of the animal is not an authorized remedy. It is difficult to apply the rule to animals that have no standard value, and are not the subject of sale and traffic, in order to put upon them a share of the police burdens. But the sum required to be paid by the owner is not an ad valorem, but a specific tax for the privilege of keeping the dog within the town, with an annexed penalty if he is found running at large without the required badge, the evidence of its payment and the ownership of the dog."

Under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 2754, providing that every dog over three months of age shall be listed by the assessor in the name of the owner without affixing any valuation thereto, but the owner may affix any valuation thereto he wishes without swearing to the valuation, and § 2833, providing that in the tax list there shall be columns for the number of and per capita tax on dogs, and in addition to the property tax on the valuation that may be fixed upon a dog by the owners, which shall be included in the personal-property valuation and taxed therewith, the auditor shall levy $1,—it was held that the per capita tax on dogs was not in conflict with the Constitution, art. 12, § 2, providing that laws shall be passed taxing by uniform rule all real and personal property according to its true value in money, as the exercise of the police power is different from the taxing power and amounted to a license. As to whether dogs were property within the meaning of this constitutional provision was held not necessary to be decided in this case. Holst v. Roe, 39 Ohio St. 340, 48 Am. Rep. 459.

In Griggs v. Dittoe, 52 Ohio St. 601, it was said that Ohio act May 14, 1891, providing that any dog returned for taxation and the tax on which is paid when due shall be regarded as, and shall be, property, was not inconsistent with Rev. Stat. § 7006, authorizing any person to kill a dog at large.

In Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 30 Am. Rep. 40 L. R. A.

The roadway of the street-car company being on the roadway of the turnpike, where persons, horses, and vehicles were constantly passing, and had the right to pass, and on the same grade as the turnpike, were all circumstances for the jury to consider, and they could properly do so under the charge as given. The motorman had also stated that the reason he did not see the dog sooner was because he was looking around at the passengers to see if any desired to get off, so that the charge was called for and appropriate.

It was not error to charge that, inasmuch as the street-car track was laid on the roadway and on the same level with it, the dog was not a trespasser if he went upon the track, in-152, it was said that dogs are not recognized as other property and subject to an ad valorem taxation.

Texas act 1876, exempting to each family one dog, and imposing on all other dogs a tax of $1 per annum under a penalty of $5, is not a tax law, but a police regulation. Ex parte Cooper, 3 Tex. App. 489, 30 Am. Rep. 152.

That the sum exceeded the expenses of issuance did not transcend the licensing power, and make it a tax. Tenney v. Lenz, 16 Wis. 566.

In Jemison v. Southwestern R. Co. 75 Ga. 444, 56 Am. Rep. 476, it was said that "dogs are not generally the subjects of taxation. . . . Dogs are not property in such a sense as makes them assets belonging to the estate of a deceased person, and are never inventoried and appraised, however numerous or valuable, nor are they subject to levy and sale so far as we are informed."

But there are cases holding that the license law is a tax on property which cannot be enforced by fine or imprisonment.

An ordinance of Washington, January 14, 1868, providing that it shall not be lawful for any person to own or keep any dog without obtaining from the city a license for which he shall pay $3 per annum for a male and $5 per annum for a female, and $2, imposing a forfeiture of from $5 to $10 for a male dog, and $10 to $20 for a female, if the owner or keeper fails to obtain a license, is invalid because it declared the owner a criminal and subjected him to arrest, imprisonment, and fine for keeping his property at home unless he first obtained a license. The court said that "the law recognizes property in and to dogs, and the owner thereof is entitled to his remedies for an invasion of his rights of property," and "if dogs are property they may be taxed and the tax assessed to the owner." Washington v. Meigs, 1 MacArth. 53.

In Cranston v. Augusta, 61 Ga. 573, the recorder dismissed a prosecution under an ordinance requiring the owner of a dog annually to purchase a dog collar for $1, under a penalty of $1 to $5, saying "the city has the right to impose special taxes and collect them by execution. But as it has been decided that dogs are property, the city has no more right to fine a citizen for not paying tax on his dog than on other property," and the dismissal was sustained on the ground that the defendant could not be twice tried. The court does not discuss any other question involved in the case.

In some states provision is made for direct tax on dogs as on other property.

South Dakota Laws 1889, chap. 121, imposes a tax on every dog, to be collected in the same manner as other taxes upon personal property. Liberty Twp. v. Hutchinson County, 7 S. D. 530.

And in Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153, it was held that the legislature has made the dog the subject of a direct ad valorem tax, thereby placing it upon the same footing as all other taxable property.

asmuch as the dog was not improperly on the highway.

It was not error to tell the jury that, if after the dog was injured his master killed him, under the honest belief that he was fatally injured, this would not prevent a recovery. The action in this case was for both the injury and killing, and, if the jury should have found that the dog ought not to have been killed, still the plaintiff would be entitled to damages for his injuries.

It is said that the judge should have told the jury that the motorman might rely upon the keen sense of hearing, great alertness, intelligence, and active celerity common to dogs, and they might consider and weigh their own practical knowledge as to the nature, character, and quality of dogs, and consider all these matters in reaching a verdict in the case. The request, we think, is too broad. Unquestionably, the jury might take into consideration common knowledge and observation about the habits and qualities of dogs, but it was going too far to say that the motorman might rely upon the quickness and celerity of the dog and thus absolve himself from all duty and care to prevent the accident, which is virtually what the request implies.

The court sufficiently stated to the jury the rule applicable if the dog appeared so suddenly and immediately in front of the car that it could not be stopped and no precaution

And where a majority of taxpayers was required to obtain a petition for the issuing of railroad bonds, under N. Y. Laws 1869, p. 2303, chap. 907, it was held that persons who paid a tax of 50 cents as the owner of a dog should be counted. The court said that "it is settled at this day in this state that dogs are property." People, Longwell, v. McMaster, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 182.

And in Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132, it was said, referring to a dog, that any article of property which the law subjects to taxation is prima facie an article of value.

So, under Vt. Gen. Stat. chap. 19, § 1, subd. 4, providing that every person of full age who shall reside in any town in this state, and whose ratable estate held in his own right, the percentage of the value of which besides his poll shall be set in the list of such town at the sum of $3 or upwards for five years in succession, shall thereby gain a settlement in such town, a pauper obtained a settlement where his father's list was real estate $2.40, personal property $.30, one dog $1, one poll $2, total, $5.70. Marshfield v. Middlesex, 65 Vt. 545.

In Van Horn v. People, 46 Mich. 183, 41 Am. Rep. 159, it was said: "As the charge laid on the owners of dogs is a pecuniary burden imposed by public authority, it partakes, no doubt, of the character of a tax, and for many purposes might be so spoken of without harm." Referring to this, the court in Longyear v. Buck, 83 Mich. 236, 10 L. R. A. 43, said: "But a constitutional provision for the taxation of property by value will not preclude a per capita tax on dogs. . . . Each person assesses himself in determining how many dogs he will own and keep."

In Bowen v. Tioga County, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 613, it was held that Pa. act June 12, 1878, for the taxation of dogs and the protection of sheep, to take effect upon a majority vote, was contrary to Const. art. 3, § 7, prohibiting local legislation.

Ind. act 1891, p. 199, §§ 47, 53, provided another and antagonistic method of taxation of dogs, differing from the act of March 5, 1891, creating a method for the taxation of dogs. Kerlin v. Reynolds, 142 Ind. 466.

In Wilcox v. State (Ga.) 39 L. R. A. 709, it was said that in Ga. Const. (Civ. Code, § 5883), authorizing the general assembly to impose a tax on such domestic animals as from their nature and habits are destructive of other property, the words "domestic animals" were intended to refer to dogs.

b. Taking property without due process of law.

Some cases hold that a dog is such property that he cannot be summarily killed without notice to his owner, as this would be contrary to the constitutional provision against depriving a person of his property without due process of law. But on this question there is some conflict of authorities.

In an action for damages for the killing of plaintiff's dog by the dog of another person it was said 40 L. R. A.

that, under a statute authorizing any person to kill a dog not having a licensed collar on, "a statute under which a party is, in so summary a manner, to be deprived of his property by having it destroyed, should not be extended by construction. That dogs have a value and are the property of their owner cannot be well denied at the present day, whatever may have been the rule heretofore." Heisrodt v. Hackett, 34 Mich. 283, 23 Am. Rep. 529.

And a city ordinance providing for the killing or selling of unlicensed dogs found running at large without a license check then attached as provided for by the ordinance is contrary to Ohio Const. art. 1, § 19, protecting the "property" of every individual, subject only to the public welfare, and providing for compensation when taken. Archer v. Baertschi, 8 Ohio C. C. 12.

So, under N. Y. Laws 1896, chap. 448, requiring the owner of every dog within the city to procure a yearly license for the dog, and pay to the humane society of the city $1 therefor under penalty, upon refusal, of death to the dog or his confiscation, and vesting the execution of the law and the proceeds of the license or sale of the dog in the society, it was held that such society could not seize or confiscate the plaintiff's dog, as in New York dogs are now regarded as property and within the law for the protection of property, and the plaintiff could not be deprived of his property without due process of law. It was further held that the mere fact of not wearing a licensed collar could not of itself render a dog a nuisance, and thus give the right to kill or confiscate. Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. 25 App. Div. 26.

And under a city ordinance providing that if any dog shall attack a person at any place except on the premises of his owner, the mayor or police justice shall order the owner or possessor of such dog to kill him immediately, and if the owner refuses he shall forfeit, etc., it was held that the ordinance was invalid because it gave no opportunity for the owner of the dog to be heard in his defense, and the court said that under N. Y. Const. art. 1, § 6, "property may not be taken, affected, or destroyed except by due process of law, which requires notice of hearing to the owner, and opportunity to be heard." People, Shand, v. Tighe, 9 Misc. 807.

But under N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 888 (county law, §§ 125, 126), providing that the owner or possessor of any vicious dog who shall neglect to kill him within forty-eight hours after having received an order from the justice of the peace directing such a dog to be killed, shall forfeit, etc., it was held that this statute did not deprive the relator of his property without due process of law, in that the order of the justice directing the relator to kill his dog immediately was made without notice to him, as the relator did not kill his dog and refused to do so, and the statute imposed a money penalty, and the justice did not. It was further held that in the action to recover the penalty the relator would have full could have prevented the accident. The special request on this point was not necessary, nor as made was it correct.

Assignments are made which raise the question of the status of dogs before the law, and on what plane they are to be put, and how regarded. It has been held that the owner of a dog has such property in him as that he may maintain an action for killing or injuring him. Wheatley v. Harris, 4 Sneed, 468, 70 Am. Dec. 258. Also that he is the subject of larceny as personal property. State v. Brown, 9 Baxt. 58. It has also been held that a dog is an animal such as the statute contemplates in providing statutory precautions when they appear upon railroad tracks. Fink v. Evans, 95 Tenn. 416. It is true that at common law a dog was not considered as property, the reason given being that they were base in their nature and kept merely for whims and pleasures. But this rule of law has not found favor in later days, and the reason of the rule is not regarded as well founded. In Mullaly v. People, 86 N. Y. 365, the court said very enthusiastically that "when we call to mind the small spaniel that saved the life of William of Orange and thus probably changed the current of modern history, . . . and the faithful St. Bernards, which, after a storm has swept over the crests and sides of the Alps, start out in search of lost travelers, the claim that the nature of the dog is essentially base, and that he should be left a prey to every vagabond who chooses to steal him, will not now receive ready assent. . . . This common-law rule was extremely technical, . . . [for] while it was not larceny to steal a dog, it was larceny to steal the skin of a dead dog . . . Large amounts of money are now invested in dogs, and they are largely the subjects of trade and traffic." They are the negro's associates, and often his only property, the poor man's friend and the rich man's companion, and the protection of women and children, hearthstones and henroosts. In the earlier law books it was said that "dog law" was as hard to define as was "dog latin," but that day has passed, and dogs have now a distinct and well-established status in the eyes of the law.

Much evidence is given in the case upon the question of the dog's pedigree and ancestry. The objections made are that these matters are attempted to be proven by general reputation, and this is characterized as hearsay. But the question of pedigree and ancestry is a matter of common or general reputation, whether the question concerns horses, cattle, dogs, or men. The matter, from the very nature of opportunity to contest the truth of the complaint upon which the justice made the order, and thus would have due process of law. People, Renshaw, v. Gillespie, 25 App. Div. 91.

In People, Renshaw, v. Gillespie, 25 App. Div. 91, People, Shand, v. Tighe, 9 Misc. 607, was distinguished, the court saying: "We assume that the relator when brought before the police justice had no opportunity to contest the truth of the original complaint, and in that view the case was correctly decided, and thus is clearly distinguishable from the one before us."

And in Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, it was held that La. Laws 1882, p. 160, providing that dogs are personal property, but that no dog is entitled to the protection of the law unless the same shall have been placed upon the assessment roll, and that in a civil action for a recovery for injuries done to dogs, a recovery can only be had to the amount of the value fixed by such owner in the last assessment, was not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, providing that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law.

New Hampshire Rev. Stat. chap. 127, § 5, providing that no person shall be liable by law for killing a dog which shall be found not having around his neck a collar of brass, tin, or leather with the name of the owner carved or engraved thereon, did not conflict with N. H. Const. providing against taking property for public uses, or deprive parties of their property in dogs, but merely regulated the use and keeping of such property, and was a police regulation. Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 373.

A city ordinance authorizing a city marshal to shoot all dogs not muzzled, found in any street, was held to be contrary to Texas Bill of Rights, § 17, providing no person's property shall be taken, damaged, or destroyed for, or applied to, public use without adequate compensation, and § 19, providing that no citizen of this state shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due course of the law of the land. Lynn v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153.

In Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689, it was said that the 5th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property 40 L. R. A.

without due process of law, and dogs being property their owners cannot be deprived of them without due process of law, but it was held that this provision should be construed to sustain a city ordinance providing that a dog at large not registered or collared could be killed, as the protection against dogs justified such police powers.

In an action of quo warranto to oust a city from the exercise of certain powers, claiming that an ordinance requiring a registration fee for each dog, and rendering the person violating the same liable to a fine, and authorizing the killing of a dog, was unconstitutional, it was held that the proposition that dogs are property has seldom, if ever, been questioned, and so far as this case is concerned it will be admitted, but that this would not prevent a statute or ordinance restricting the running at large of dogs, or for their destruction in case they are permitted to run at large in violation of law. It was further held that the license tax was valid because imposed for regulation and restriction, and not merely for revenue. The court said: "Under the almost unbroken current of authority we think that statutes and ordinances may be passed regulating, restricting, or even prohibiting the running at large of dogs in cities, and this, although dogs are unquestionably property; that the owners, keepers, or harborers of dogs in cities may be required to register the same and to pay a registration fee therefor, although this fee may in one sense be a tax, though not a tax within the meaning of Kan. Const. art 11, § 1: "That dogs in cities may be classified and the owners, keepers, or harborers thereof, may be required to register all the dogs of one class and not the dogs of another class, and to pay a greater registration fee for the registration of the dogs of one class than for the registration of the dogs of another class; and such owners, keepers, or harborers of dogs may also be required to put collars around the necks of their dogs, and that any dog found running at large in a city in violation of the statutes or ordinances may be summarily destroyed; and that all this is constitutional and valid and is 'due process of law,' and that by the same no one is denied 'the equal protection of the laws.'" State, Curtis, v. Topeka, 36 Kan. 76, 50 Am. Rep. 529.

things, depends upon reputation or common repute. It is shown that certain books are kept, and in them there is a registration of pedigrees, kept up for the information of the public, not only as to horses, but also as to cattle and dogs. These are shown to be received as satisfactory evidence of pedigree in the same manner and upon the same idea as entries in family records of births, deaths, and marriages are received with regard to the human family. 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 258; Flowers v. Haralson, 6 Yerg. 494; Rogers v. Park, 4 Humph. 480; Swink v. French, 11 Lea, 79, 47 Am. Rep. 277; Morris v. Swaney, 7 Heisk. 591; Ford v. Ford, 7 Humph. 92.

It is true that in family records the entries in the books are usually made by the relatives and friends of the person, but, inasmuch as dogs have no relatives competent to make entries for them, it is allowable for such entries to be made by the owners, friends, and admirers of the dog. Upon the general question as to the admissibility of evidence of the dog's pedigree, and the qualities and performances of his ancestors, we think there can be no doubt but that such evidence is competent. It is certainly competent to show pedigree upon the question of value of horses, cattle, and even sheep and swine,—their different strains of blood; and especially as to horses and cows, it is competent to show the qualities of the sires and dams and more remote ancestry, as these matters enter largely into the question of value. It is a matter of common knowledge that the same questions enter into the consideration of the value of dogs, not only such as are kept for common use, such as guard dogs, shepherd dogs, Newfoundland dogs, but also such as are kept for sporting purposes, such as grey, blood, and fox hounds, bird dogs, and others. There are high and low degrees among dogs as well as among men, and while the common coon dog has his value, it is not the same as that of the trained bird dog or the trained bloodhound. It is a matter of common knowledge and observation that certain strains of blood among horses add materially to, if they do not entirely fix, their values, and so among cows and hogs and sheep, and even among chickens and turkeys. Different strains of blooded horses are valuable because it is found that for generations the achievements of horses of that strain have been noteworthy upon the turf and elsewhere; and, so with dogs, these qualities, as a matter of common observation, are much the same, in the same strain, for generation after generation. We think there is no error in admitting evidence upon these matters of pedigree, and the reputation of this particular dog killed is shown to have had what in dog circles is regarded as "blue blood," and among these he belonged to the inner circles of the "400,"—a member of the "F. F. T.'s," or "First Families of Tennessee." In addition, he was of English descent. His sire was "Champion Tribulation, by imp. Beppo III., out of imp. Champion Lass of Bow," and so on for twenty or more generations. His dam was "Dick's Sue, by Dick, out of Ida Heath," etc., for as many generations. It is fully shown that on both sides the ancestry is traced back to the best of English nobility blood in dog circles. The sire of the dog is shown to have had a remarkable record in field trials and bench shows, and so with the dam. Dogs of the grade of the dog that was killed, and with such pedigree, are shown by the proof to be worth from $500 to $1,000 in the market. It is also shown that this dog had had the distemper, and, under the proof, this added to his value 100 per cent. It is attempted to show that this dog's descent may not have been entirely pure, and it is intimated that he may have had "terrier" blood in him, but the only foundation for this inference is the fact that he "tarried" so long on the track when the car was approaching. But it appears from the record that it is a characteristic of the pointer when he sets to become oblivious to all earthly surroundings, and the bluer his blood the more absent-minded he becomes on such an occasion. The question of pedigree is really important so far only as it bears upon the question of value of the animal killed. But it is evident, on examining the record, that the jury were not influenced by considerations of pedigree in fixing the damages, since they have named an amount below that fixed by any witness who placed a value upon the animal based upon his pedigree, and adopted as their verdict the evidence given by the plaintiff and other witnesses of value without regard to pedigree, and fixed the amount at the smallest sum named by him for the dog, taking in view his qualities, and leaving out of view his ancestry or pedigree. The plaintiff fixes the value of the dog at $250, without any reference to his blood or lineage, and in this he is sustained. He describes him as a handsome dog, very fast, wide ranger, very staunch on his game and to the gun, thoroughly broken, a fine retriever from land or water, with an excellent disposition. He is shown also to have been a valuable, reliable yard and house dog, and to have made himself generally useful, and almost indispensable to the plaintiff's household. With such an eloquent recital of the dog's qualities, the jury could not, perhaps, have given less damages than $250. The defendant company introduced no evidence of value, and no assignment is made that the damages are excessive. Whatever might be our opinion as to the value of a dog is immaterial, as we are controlled by the evidence in the record. While we have not passed seriatim upon the many errors assigned, we have considered them all, and given a general view of such matters as we consider important.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the defendant company was guilty of negligence in the killing of this dog, that his death could have been prevented by the exercise of proper care and diligence, that he was fatally injured by the car, and killed as an act of humanity by his owner, and the company is liable for the killing. As to value, it is placed by the jury at the lowest estimate made by any witness, and evidently without regard to his pedigree or the performances of his ancestors.

We are satisfied with the verdict and judgment, and it is affirmed with costs.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Gurdon CORNING et al.

v.

City of SAGINAW, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

A city is not liable, in the absence of any statutory provision, for an injury to a private barge caused by the failure of a bridge tender reasonably to open a draw in the bridge in response to proper signals, because of the bridge becoming caught, where the city does not derive any benefit from the bridge, but simply maintains it for the public good.

(March 1, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Saginaw County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to their barge by collision with the pier of a bridge maintained by the defendant city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. L. Beach, for plaintiff in error:

There being no statute in this state holding municipal corporations liable for damages, because its agents or servants have failed to repair a bridge out of repair, the city in no way could be responsible in this action.

No court has ever held a municipal corporation liable to individuals for the misfeasance, laches, or unauthorized exercise of power by its officers or agents.

Meechem, Pub. Off. p. 848.

No private action, unless expressly authorized by statute, can be maintained against a city for the neglect of a public duty imposed by statute for the benefit of the public, and from the performance of which the corporation receives no profit or advantage.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs are the owners of the barge King, and recovered a judgment for damages resulting from the colliding of their barge with the pier which supports the draw of what is known as the "Johnson Street Bridge," in the defendant city. The collision occurred on April 13, 1895, while the barge was being towed down stream by a tug; and it is claimed that the immediate cause of it was the failure of the bridge tender to seasonably open the draw in response to properly given signals; that the inability to so open the draw in time was attributable to the sticking or binding of the ends of the draw against the adjoining ends of the bridge. While the declaration contained four counts, yet the case was submitted to the jury upon the fourth count solely, which charged substantially that it was the duty of the defendant to keep the ends of the swing and the adjoining portions of the bridge in repair, so that the draw could not stick or become caught or fastened when it became necessary to open it for the passage of vessels, and that defendant had neglected to perform its duty in that regard. The court charged that the burden was upon the plaintiffs to show either that the city had actual notice that the bridge was out of repair in the manner charged in this fourth count, or that it was so out of repair for such a length of time before the accident that the city, in the exercise of ordinary care, ought to have known it; and, further, that, whether the city received actual notice of its defective condition or only constructive notice, a sufficient length of time must have elapsed after the notice was received in which, in the exercise of ordinary care, the necessary repairs could have been made. Before any witnesses were sworn in the case, the following facts were agreed to: "That, when the collision in question occurred, the city was the owner and in control of the Johnson street bridge; that, a number of years ago, it was built by the city by the permission of the general government and the board of supervisors of Saginaw county; that the bridge tender was in the employ of the city, having been appointed as such bridge tender under the ordinance of the city, and was placed there by the city; that the plaintiffs presented a claim for damages to the council before this suit was brought, and the same was disallowed; that the Saginaw river, at the point where the bridge crosses it, is a navigable stream, and tributary to the Great Lakes." Plaintiffs introduced testimony tending to sustain the claim that the bridge was out of repair in the manner alleged, and that the barge was injured by reason thereof, and that the plaintiffs were in the exercise of due care. The defendant introduced testimony tending to show that the bridge was not out of repair, and that on the day in question the bridge did bind, and that there was a short delay in opening it; that the city had no notice of any such defect. The court instructed the jury that if they found that the bridge was out of repair in the manner alleged in the declaration, and the barge was injured by reason of its being so out of repair, and that the plaintiffs, in handling the tug, were without fault, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. The jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiffs; and, judgment having been entered thereon, defendant brings error.

The defendant requested the court to charge the jury that, there being no statute providing for any action against the city for the negligence complained of, the verdict must be in favor of defendant. This was refused. The plaintiffs contend that the city is liable without any statute expressly creating such liability. The argument in support of this contention is that our state Constitution (art. 18, § 4) forbids the bridging of a navigable stream without authority obtained from the board of supervisors under the provisions of law, and "that no such law shall prejudice the right of individuals to the free navigation of such streams;" that a law was passed in 1851 authorizing the bridging of such streams, but requiring persons or corporations wishing to construct a bridge over a stream which is navigable, like the present, for vessels of 15 tons burden or more, to petition the board of supervisors for authority to do so, and also to give due notice by publication of the application for such authority, as provided by 1 How. Anno. Stat. § 495, which, among other things, states: "Every such petition shall set forth the kind and description of the bridge proposed to be constructed, and, whether the same is to be constructed with a draw, or whether any and what provision is to be made for the passage of vessels or boats; and such board shall have the power to grant or refuse the prayer of such petition, upon such terms as they may deem just and reasonable, and to prescribe what description of bridge may be constructed, or to prohibit the construction of any bridge on the proposed location, as in their judgment the public interest may require." It is therefore contended that, inasmuch as it is admitted that the city built the bridge under the authority obtained from the board of supervisors, it must be presumed that, in obtaining that authority, the requirements of the statute must have been complied with both by the city and board; that on this assumption the petition must have contained provisions for a suitable draw to permit the passage of boats and vessels, and the authority given must have included a like provision, as a draw was actually constructed which was adequate while in repair. It is further contended that the city, after so obtaining authority to construct such a bridge, and after actually constructing and operating it for years, could not permit the draw through negligence to become dangerous or useless without liability to persons navigating the stream who might be injured thereby; that is, that when authority to construct the bridge with a suitable draw was obtained and acted upon, the duty was thereby imposed upon the city to keep it in substantially the same condition as proposed, or, at least, to use ordinary care to prevent it from becoming dangerous to navigation through neglect to repair.

This contention cannot be maintained. It is undoubtedly true that, without the action of the board of supervisors, the bridge could not have been erected, and it would probably never have been permitted without the erection of a draw or swing therein for the purpose of the passage of boats, as the Saginaw river is navigable for craft of the burden mentioned in the act. If not erected in accordance with the requirements of the board of supervisors as provided in the act, or if it impeded the navigation of the river, it could undoubtedly have been abated as a nuisance. 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 926, and cases cited in note; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332. There is nothing in those statutes, however, creating a liability upon the part of the municipality to private persons for injuries occasioned through the failure of the municipality to either construct or maintain a draw, or for failure to keep the draw in repair. Neither has the general statute creating liabilities against municipalities for failure to keep its highways, etc., in repair, any application here. The only question, therefore, is whether there is any common-law liability for the damages occasioned. Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, vol. 2, 4th ed. § 963, says: "According to the prevailing rule, counties are under no liability in respect of torts, except as imposed (expressly or by necessary implication) by statute. They are political divisions of the state created for convenience, and are usually regarded not to be impliedly liable for damages suffered in consequence of neglect to repair a county road or bridge; such liability, unless declared by statute, is generally, but not quite universally, denied to exist." In this state it is the settled rule that it requires legislative action to create any liability to private suit for nonrepair of public ways. Detroit v. Blackeby, 21 Mich. 84, 4 Am. Rep. 450. The rule in the above case has been followed since it was announced in 1870. The statute creating liability for nonrepair of highways has since been passed. But, as we have said, it has no application to the present case, and in fact it is not contended by counsel that it is applicable. Although the English books contain numerous cases of indictments or informations for neglect to repair highways and bridges, in no instance referred to have the English courts sustained a private action against a municipal corporation for such neglect, except under a statute expressly or by necessary implication giving such remedy. Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332, and cases there cited. In French v. Boston, 129 Mass. 592, 37 Am. Rep. 393, it appeared that the statute imposed upon the city the duty of maintaining Warren bridge as a public highway "at its own expense, and in accordance with such ordinances as the city council of said city may establish." The duty thus imposed upon the city was a public duty, from the performance of which it received no profit or advantage. It was said by the court: "It is well settled in this commonwealth that no private action can be maintained against a city for the neglect to perform such a duty, unless it is expressly authorized by statute. Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332, and cases there cited. By statute, the city is liable to a traveler thereon for any defect in the highway of which the bridge is a part; but there is no statute which makes it liable to a private action for a failure to provide a draw of proper width, or for the carelessness of the superintendent of the bridge in delaying vessels which seek to pass through the draw. It follows that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action." In the present case it does not appear that the city derives any benefit from the bridge. It is maintained for the public good by the city in its governmental or public character, and not in its proprietary or private character, and is therefore not liable to private action, as the statute fixes no such liability. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 66. The court below was in error in refusing the defendant's request to charge.

Judgment is reversed, and no new trial ordered.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Alexander T. Fowles, plaintiff's intestate, on the 4th day of February, 1896, was an employee of the Flint & Père Marquette Railroad Company. His employment was that of rear brakeman on a freight train. The defendants, lumber dealers, loaded a flat car with lumber, in their yards in the city of Saginaw, and shipped it over the Flint & Père Marquette Railroad Company, to Toledo, Ohio. The lumber was maple, 11,000 feet, weighing about 33,000 pounds, and piled flat upon the cars in two tiers parallel with the sides of the car. It was put upon this flat car by the defendants three days before the day of the accident. The testimony of the plaintiff tended to show that the railroad crew, of whom the deceased was rear brakeman, were ordered by the railroad company, on the morning of the 4th of February, to make up some freight trains for transportation; and, in the line of their duty, this car load of lumber was shunted at a rate of not to exceed from three to five miles an hour upon a level track, towards a box car. The deceased was upon the ground, and stepped in between the box car and the car load of lumber for the purpose of coupling the two; and, when the car of lumber came in contact with the box car, the lumber shifted 25 inches upon the surface of the flat car, and crushed to death the deceased, by pinning him against the end of the box car.

The plaintiff's declaration declares the several acts of negligence of the defendants to be (1) that they carelessly and recklessly loaded said flat car of said railroad company so as to cause the death of the deceased by the shifting of the lumber while upon said car; that said lumber was so loaded upon said car that it was not safe for an employee of said railroad company to couple it to another car, and that said danger was not apparent to deceased; (2) that it was the duty of said defendants not to ship maple lumber upon a flat car without having the lumber so fastened and staked as to hold it from shifting; (3) that a piece of timber or other material should have been placed crosswise upon the floor, and near the ends of said flat car, under the lumber, for the purpose of elevating the extreme ends of the lumber; (4) that the defendants loaded this lumber upon the deck of said car, while the deck of said car was covered with ice and snow and sleet, and in a slippery condition; and (5) that the lumber should have been placed in a box car, and not upon a flat car. The cause was tried before a jury, and, after the proofs were all in, the trial judge said to the jury that "the evidence failed to show that the defendants violated any legal duty that they owed the deceased. Consequently there is no question of fact to be submitted to you for consideration. Your verdict, therefore, will be in favor of defendants of no cause of action."

The deceased had no contract relations with the defendants, and, if his representative has a right of action based upon defendants' negligence, it must rest upon a duty owed to deceased in common with all other employees of the Flint & Père Marquette Railroad Company, or other road over which the car in question might ultimately be shipped; in short, a breach of duty owing to the public. An accurate statement of this duty is: "If a person undertakes to do an act or discharge a duty by which the conduct of others may properly be regulated and governed, he is bound to perform it in such manner that those who are rightfully led to a course of conduct or action on the faith that the act or duty will be duly and properly performed, shall not suffer loss or injury by reason of his negligence." Whart. Neg. § 438. Yet, as stated by the same author, the confidence must be immediate, or the action fails. In other words, there must be casual connection between the action and the hurt, and such casual connection is interrupted by the interposition between the negligence and the hurt of an independent human agency. Id. § 438. In the present case the defendants owed the railroad company the duty of using ordinary care in loading the car in question; but, before the car came to decedent, it was the duty of the railroad company to provide for the inspection. Here was the intervention of an independent human agency. A leading case is Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109, in which case it was held that the defendant, who had contracted with the postmaster general to provide a mail coach, and keep it in repair, was not liable to an employee of one Atkinson, who had contracted with the postmaster general to provide horses and coachmen for the purpose of carrying the mail.

Y. 351, 1 Am. Rep. 543; Roddy v. Missouri P. R. Co. 104 Mo. 234, 12 L. R. A. 746. In Necker v. Harrey, 49 Mich. 519, the leading cases on this point are cited with approval by Mr. Justice Cooley. Plaintiff seeks to bring this case within a line of cases cited creating an apparent exception to the rule stated; but we think these cases may be all classed as coming under one of three heads: First, as in Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139, where the fault was not keeping defendant's premises in a suitable and safe condition; or, second, as in Roddy v. Missouri P. R. Co. 104 Mo. 234, 13 L. R. A. 746, where the defendant reserves the right to direct the manner of work, or undertakes to supply the instrumentalities. Of this class is also Elliott v. Hall, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 315, relied upon by plaintiff, in which case it was said by the court that "the defendant had entire dominion over the track" which caused the injury.—a fact which distinguishes the case from the present. Cases belonging to a third class, more closely analogous to the case under consideration, have arisen where the shipper of a dangerous substance, the character of which is not made known to the carrier, has been held liable. But liability in this class of cases has been limited to instruments and articles in their nature calculated to do injury. Davidson v. Nichols, 11 Allen, 514. We think the case of Chapman v. Atlantic Refining Co. 38 Hun, 637, and 108 N. Y. 638, which counsel for plaintiff cite as fully sustaining their contention, is clearly distinguishable from the present case. The statement of facts in that case is found in 129 N. Y. 601, from which it appears that the defendant corporation was engaged in constructing some oil tanks on the line of the Lake Erie & Western Railway Company, at a place called Dick's Switch. The employees of defendant left a car of lumber, after it had been delivered to defendant, and partly unloaded, in such unsafe condition that a portion of the lumber fell upon or was blown upon the track of the railroad company, causing the derailment of the engine operated by the plaintiff. It will be seen that the defendant had complete control over the partly unloaded car, and whatever duty was owing was owing by defendant. In the present case the defendant had parted with the control of the car. The railroad company owed the duty to decedent of causing an inspection or of providing a rule for inspection. We think the circuit judge was right in his holding.

Judgment affirmed.

1. With respect to water forming a pond on private property within the limits of a city, but not on, or in dangerous proximity to, a public highway, street, or alley, such city owes no duty to the general public (aside from that of a sanitary character), other than such as devolves on private owners of property similarly situated, even though the city may have created the pond of which complaint is made.

2. Negligence must be fairly inferable from the evidence. Its existence cannot be a mere matter of conjecture, and it must be the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

3. Instructions which assumed that evidence of such overflow of lots by the massing thereon by a city of the water of a running stream as would entitle the lotowners to damages would be proper proof in support of a claim for compensation for personal injury to one who had no interest in the lot itself.—held erroneous.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. E. J. Cornish, for plaintiff in error:

At common law a municipal corporation was not liable in actions like the one at bar for injuries from defective streets, unless made so by the charter creating them, either in express terms, or by imposing a duty, the failure to perform which renders the city liable for resulting injuries.

Mr. Silas Cobb, for defendant in error:

If in grading a street the city is guilty of negligence which is the natural and proximate cause of injury to a property owner, the city may be accountable therefor.

Beatrice v. Leary, 45 Neb. 149.

Why shouldn't the city be liable for its own negligent acts which have caused the death of a little child, whether the fruits of that negligence be upon the city's property or not?

Since the great increase of corporations, and since so much of the business of the world is transacted through their agency, it becomes necessary that courts should meet their expanding powers by an extension of the limits of their liability.

Rhodes v. Cleveland, 10 Ohio, 160, 36 Am. Dec. 82.

Whenever a corporation or individual has become bound by agreement to do certain things, such individual or corporation is liable in case of neglect to a private action "at the suit of every person injured by such neglect."

Conrad v. Ithaca, 16 N. Y. 158.

In the Richards Case the court below said: "It would be immaterial whether said Weston in fact drowned in the water on the street or on property adjacent to said street." This court upheld that instruction, saying: "This language correctly stated the rule of liability as applicable to the case made by the proofs, according to the authorities. It would have been different if the pond had been entirely upon private property and not in close proximity to a street."

Omaha v. Richards, 49 Neb. 244.

Ryan, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought in the district court of Douglas county by Fannie E. Bowman, as administratrix of the estate of Albert D. Bowman, for the recovery of damages sustained by the estate of the intestate by reason of his death. The deceased, it was alleged in the petition, was about seven years of age when he was drowned in a pond of water which plaintiff in error negligently had permitted to accumulate and be and remain in, over, and by the side of Davenport street, in the city of Omaha. There were a verdict and a judgment against the city in the sum of $1,000. The accident happened on June 15, 1892. The evidence showed that about six years before the date just named the city had constructed an embankment on Davenport street, which interfered with the flowing of water from certain lots abutting on said street. The pond in question was caused by this water. The sidewalk was about 7 feet from the water, and quite a distance above the water level. There seems to be no dispute in the evidence that to reach the water from the street it was necessary that a person should cross an intervening strip of private property at least 6 feet in width. A few days before the date of the accident some boys tore up a part of the sidewalk, and launched it upon the pond. Albert D. Bowman and some juvenile friends took possession of this piece of sidewalk, and were using it for a raft, when young Bowman fell off and was drowned. The mere fact that he was thus drowned was alleged in the petition and admitted in the answer. There was no effort to show whether the deceased reached the pond, as he might have done, by passing from his home, near by, over private property, or by way of the street. It is not clear from the petition just what acts and omissions on the part of the city are claimed to constitute negligence on its part. There was charged a failure to place a fence or visible boundary between the street and the private property adjoining. In view of the fact that it was not claimed that the child entered the water from the street, this averment has no bearing on the questions under consideration. The following averments seem to have described the negligence principally, if not entirely, relied upon, and we shall therefore quote them at length: "Plaintiff further states that said pond of water was formed by the water that formerly would have run through a ravine at said place, the same being filled over at said place by said city in constructing and filling up Davenport street at said place, which said water was negligently permitted to accumulate and remain as aforesaid; and the natural outlet for said water being closed and filled up by the defendant city of Omaha a long time previous to the said June 15, 1892, by the city filling up the street at said Davenport, near 28th street and thereabouts, where said death occurred, being filled about 5 feet on the north side and about 15 feet on the south side of said Davenport street, and thereby filling up and stopping a creek or ravine that was wont theretofore to flow along where said street was filled as aforesaid; and although there is, and has been a long time prior to June 15, 1892, a sewer about two blocks away from the place of said death, yet there was no provision made for the drainage of said water by the city or said Moody and Stockdale [the owners of the private property on which the pond was] from said lots; said water thereby being discharged upon said lots in and over and upon Davenport street as aforesaid, and there negligently confined, and negligently by all of said defendants permitted to remain upon said property." In this connection it was alleged that the pond caused in the manner above described had before June 15, 1892, been dangerous and menacing for many years, was very enticing and attractive to children of tender age, many of whom in that locality were in the habit of playing in said pond of water, and that the dangerous, menacing, and enticing condition of the pond had been well known by said Moody and Stockdale and the officers and authorities of the city of Omaha at the time of and before said death.

The defendant in error was permitted to recover upon a theory rather narrower than that above stated, as appears from the following instruction given by the court: "(1) The court charges the jury that if the grade and fill was over and across the ravine, through which, prior to the filling, water from springs and the drainage from the vicinity was accustomed to flow, then it was the duty of the defendant, in making said fill, to provide a passageway for the escape of the water which might reasonably be expected to flow along the course of the ravine." The instruction following that above quoted was in this language: "(2) If by reason of the failure of the defendant, when making the fill in Davenport street, to provide a culvert or other passage for the water naturally flowing in and along the ravine, the pond in question was formed, and you shall so find from the evidence, then that is a fact that you should consider, along with other facts, as hereinafter instructed, in making up your verdict." In the brief for the defendant in error it is insisted that this court in Beatrice v. Leary, 45 Neb. 149, has recognized the applicability of the principles laid down in the above instructions to the facts in this case. In the case just cited there was involved the question of the liability for the diversion of the water from a watercourse by the city, it is true, but this liability was for physically damaging the real property of a private person. The rule is general that the city may not divert the flowage of a running stream from real property, or mass its water on such property, without making compensation for such damage as thereby may ensue to the property rights of the property owner. This principle is in no manner, however, connected with or correlative of the proposition contended for, and that is that the massing of the water of a flowing stream on private property renders the city liable to one who has no interest in such property for whatever personal damages he may sustain from his own voluntary use of such water. It is also urged that these instructions were correctly given in this case in view of the holding of this court in the case of Omaha v. Richards, 49 Neb. 244, and in the opinion on the rehearing on the same case, reported in 50 Neb. 804. In both the opinions there was enforced the liability of the city for damage caused by the drowning of a child. The negligence of the city consisted in permitting water to collect and remain on a traveled street without any precaution being taken to avoid accidents therefrom to the public. The pond which formed was partly in the street and partly on private property, and it was held that the mere fact that the child had fallen off the improvised raft into the water on the private property did not exonerate the city from the consequences of its negligence. Whether the water was that of a flowing stream, or was the accumulation of surface water, was a question of no importance.

As has already, perhaps, been sufficiently indicated, there is presented in the case at bar the question of the liability of a city for the death of a child from drowning in a pond situated on private property. This child is not shown to have used the street in any way, even for the purpose of reaching the pond in which afterwards he was drowned. This question is connected with or modified by no other, as, for instance, the fact that the city had invited the public to go upon, or even in dangerous proximity to, the water. In so far as the facts of this case are disclosed, there is shown nothing of the acts of the child before its presence on the raft. That fact was merely alleged and admitted by the pleadings. The inducement charged was that the water was enticing to a person of the age of this one. This was a statement of a general proposition, applicable to the attraction of any body of water for boyish nature. In what was the city negligent in its duty towards the public, by passively permitting or actively causing the accumulation of this water on private property? We have already pointed out the fact that we are not considering the property rights of the owner of the lots whereon the pond was formed. There is involved no element of damage resulting from loathsome smells or from dangerous sanitary conditions permitted by the city in violation of its duties in that respect. Simply stated, the fact is that the city—so far as the record shows, without any objection from the owner of the lots—overflowed said lots with water. In respect to the public traveling upon its highways, except as above indicated, the city, with respect to the pond formed in the manner indicated, held the same relations as did the owner of the real property submerged. In Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, these relations, with attendant obligations and liabilities, were fully considered, and it was held that a cause of action could arise in none but one of the following classes of cases: "(1) Cases in which the owner of land has made or permitted a dangerous excavation, embankment, or the like, so near a public highway as to injure one in the rightful use thereof. . . . (2) Cases in which the defendant has negligently left exposed dangerous machinery likely to attract children and resulting in their injury. Illustrative of this class, which constitutes a recognized exception to the rule, are the so called Turntable Cases. (3) Cases where the plaintiff was injured while upon the defendant's premises by invitation of the latter, and where the negligence consists in a failure to keep such premises in a reasonably safe condition." This case has been cited with approval in Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 845, in which, as well as in the two opinions of Omaha v. Richards, 49 Neb. 244, 50 Neb. 804, the adjudicated cases are reviewed to sustain the proposition above stated. In an opinion on a rehearing of Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 855, it was pointed out that the principle of the Turntable Cases should not be applied, because a turntable is not only a danger specially created by its owner, but it is a danger differing in kind from those under consideration. "A pond," said Beatty, Ch. J., "although artificially created, is in no wise different from those natural ponds and streams which exist everywhere, and which involve the same dangers and present the same appearance and the same attractions to children. A turntable can be rendered absolutely safe, without destroying or materially impairing its usefulness, by simply locking it. A pond cannot be rendered inaccessible to boys by any ordinary means. Certainly no ordinary fence around the lot upon which a pond is situated would answer the purpose; and, therefore, to make it safe, it must either be filled or drained, or, in other words, destroyed. But ponds are always useful, and often necessary, and, where they do not exist naturally, must be created, in order to store water for stock and for domestic purposes, irrigation, etc. Are we to hold that every owner of a pond or reservoir is liable in damages for any child that comes uninvited upon his premises, and happens to fall into the water and drown? If so, then upon the same principle must the owner of a fruit tree be held liable for the death or injury of a child who, attracted by the fruit, climbs into the branches and falls out." Referring back to the three classes of cases described in Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, it may be said confidently that this case falls within neither. The intestate, uninvited by the city, on private property, took possession of a fragment of a floating sidewalk, from which, accidentally, he fell into the water. Negligence is a fact to be shown by evidence. Its existence cannot be left to mere conjecture. Kilpatrick v. Richardson, 37 Neb. 731, 40 Neb. 478; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Clarke, 39 Neb. 65; Omaha Street R. Co. v. Leigh, 49 Neb. 782. The negligence pleaded and proved must be the proximate cause of the injury of which complaint is made. Brotherton v. Manhattan Beach Improv. Co. 48 Neb. 563.

There was not sufficient evidence to meet the first of the above requirements, and as to the second there was not only a failure of proof, but the instruction hereinbefore quoted proceeded upon the theory that the city could be held liable for the injury of a person on a state of facts showing that the injury, if any, was one to the mere property right of an individual not a party to the suit.

For the errors indicated the judgment of the District Court is reversed.

dor and vendee is silent upon the subject of the place of delivery, then the delivery of the property by the vendor to a carrier for transportation, consigned to the vendee, divests the vendor's title to the property, and the vendee's title from the moment of such delivery to the carrier attaches.

4. In such a case the carrier is, in contemplation of law, the bailee of the person to whom, and not by whom, the goods are consigned.

5. Where a vendor of goods delivers them to a carrier for transit to his vendee, and causes the goods to be consigned in the bill of lading to himself, his agent, or his order, the presumption arises that he thereby intended to retain the title in himself to the goods.

6. Where a vendor of goods delivers them to a carrier for transit, and causes his vendee to be named in the bill of lading as the consignee of the goods, the presumption arises that the vendor by that act intended the title to the goods to vest in the vendee on their delivery to the carrier for shipment.

7. The prepayment of freight by a vendor on goods sold and shipped to his vendee is prima facie evidence of an intention on the part of the vendor to retain the title to the goods while in transit.

8. The contract between a vendor and vendee set out in the opinion construed, and held that the delivery of the property sold took place at the place of its shipment, and that the title to the property vested in the vendee on its delivery by the vendor to the carrier for transit to the vendee.

9. In order that a vendor of goods may exercise the right of stoppage in transitu, it is essential that the goods at the time be in transit from such vendor to his immediate vendee.

10. D., of Omaha, ordered a bill of lumber of S., of Dallas, Texas. S., not having the lumber in stock, sent the order to N. at Waldo, Arkansas, requesting him to ship the lumber to D., at Omaha, on account of S., and send him the invoice and bill of lading. This was done. While the lumber was in transit, S. failed, and N. notified the carrier in possession not to deliver the lumber. The carrier delivered to D., the consignee, and N. sued the carrier for conversion. Held (1) that the transaction amounted to a sale and delivery by N. to S. at Waldo; (2) a resale and delivery by S. at Waldo to D.; (3) that the lumber, when it left Waldo, was not in transit from N. to S., but from S. to D.; (4) that N. was not D.'s vendor, but consignor merely, and could not exercise the right of stoppage in transitu.

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of certain lumber alleged to have been wrongfully delivered by defendant, which had possession of it for transportation. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. S. Churchill, for plaintiff in error:

In many mercantile contracts it is stipulated that the vendor shall deliver the goods "f.o.b.,"

i. e., "free on board." The meaning of these words is, that the seller is to put the goods on board at his own expense on account of the person for whom they are shipped, and the goods are at the risk of the buyer from the time when they are so put on board.

Benjamin, Sales, 6th ed., p. 655.

In the case at bar the contract was f. o. b. at Omaha, Nebraska, and until the lumber was at Omaha, for and on account of the vendee, free of all expense, it was not at his risk, but at the risk of the vendor.

Ogg v. Shuter, L. R. 10 C. P. 159; Stock v. Inglis, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 564.

Until put on board at the place named in the contract, free of expense, they would not be at the buyer's risk.

The contract entered into by the correspondence between Simpson, Perkins, & Co. and the plaintiff was not an executed contract, but was executory.

There were two items in the order which the plaintiff did not have in stock and which were not shipped.

To bind the purchaser to pay for goods forwarded upon his order, the terms of the order must be complied with; and when only part of the goods ordered have been forwarded, there is no express contract between the parties, and no implied promise to pay for them arises until the purchaser has received them.

The bills of lading were retained and held by the plaintiff until the carriers were notified not to deliver the lumber to the consignee named in the bills of lading, when they were turned over to the initial carrier, the St. Louis Southwestern Railroad Company. When the defendant company was notified to hold the lumber, it was also notified by Mr. Key, the agent of the initial carrier, that he held the original bills of lading; so that the defendant company acted with full knowledge of this fact.

When goods which have been shipped are sold and the bill of lading indorsed by the vendors, the title passes by the sale, and not by the indorsement, which if held would certainly indicate that the consignor meant to retain the whole, or a lien upon the cargo for the price.

It was, then, a cash sale, and there was no waiver of this condition. Had the lumber been actually delivered into the manual possession of Simpson, Perkins, & Co. under such circumstances no title would have passed.

The statement in these invoices, if it be held to extend time, was not made until after the lumber was shipped and without consideration.

Billings v. Filley, 21 Neb. 511.

Suppose we say it was at sixty days, then it must be upon the terms stated, viz., "sixty days' acceptance," when delivery is made.

Then the delivery of the lumber and the delivery of the acceptance would have been "interconditional." Then in effect it would have been a conditional sale.

The fact that either payment in cash or sixty days' acceptance was to be given is also evidence tending to show delivery was at Omaha, Nebraska.

Messrs. C. J. Greene and C. V. Miles, for defendant in error:

The railroads were not the agents of plaintiff, but were common carriers, employed to transport the property from consignor to consignee.

King v. Meredith, 2 Campb. 639.

The relation of principal and agent does not exist between shipper and carrier. The carrier is a bailee, not an agent.

A delivery of freight to a common carrier effects a change of possession, and puts an end to the seller's lien, though, unless other facts interfere, his right of stoppage in transitu remains.

"Prices f. o. b. Omaha," the language of the correspondence forming the contract between Neimeyer & Company and Simpson, Perkins, & Company, cannot determine that the common carrier is the agent of the consignor.

When the lumber was delivered to the carrier at Waldo, Arkansas, and consigned to Dietz, plaintiff in error, Neimeyer & Co. parted with its possession, and title passed to Dietz.

Ragan, C., filed the following opinion:

C. N. Dietz is a lumber merchant in the city of Omaha, Nebraska, and will be hereinafter designated as Dietz. The A. J. Neimeyer Lumber Company is a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber at Waldo, Arkansas, and will be hereinafter designated as Neimeyer & Co. Simpson, Perkins, & Co. are lumber merchants in the city of Dallas, Texas, and will be hereinafter designated as Simpson & Co. The Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska is a railway corporation organized under the laws of this state, and will be hereinafter designated as the railway company. About the 1st of January, 1892, Dietz ordered of Simpson & Co. a large quantity of a certain class of lumber. It appears that Simpson & Co. did not have the material ordered on hand, and purchased the lumber to fill the order from Neimeyer & Co., and they, in pursuance of the directions of Simpson & Co., shipped it by rail to Dietz, the bills of lading issued by the initial carrier being made out to Dietz, consignee. Soon after the shipment of this lumber, which consisted of seventeen car loads, Simpson & Co. failed, and Neimeyer & Co. then notified the railway company, into whose possession as a common carrier the lumber shipped had come as the last carrier in the line of transit, of the insolvency of Simpson & Co., that the seventeen cars of lumber belonged to them, Neimeyer & Co., to hold such lumber, and not to deliver it to Dietz. It seems that when the railway company received this notice it had already delivered six car loads of the lumber, and, disregarding the notice of Neimeyer & Co., delivered the other eleven cars also to Dietz; and thereupon Neimeyer & Co. brought this suit against the railway company in the district court of Douglas county to recover the value of the eleven cars of lumber delivered by it to Dietz after receiving notice not to deliver. The railway company had a verdict and judgment, and Neimeyer & Co. have filed here a petition in error to review the same.

1. Neimeyer & Co. contend that, by virtue of the contract existing between them and Simpson & Co., the delivery of the seventeen cars of lumber shipped to Dietz was to take place at Omaha, Nebraska, and that until the lumber reached that place the title thereto remained in Neimeyer & Co., and that the railway company, all the time it had such lumber in its possession, held it as the agent and bailee of Neimeyer & Co. A vendor's title to property sold by him is divested on its delivery to his vendee, and immediately upon such delivery the title to the property vests in the vendee. But where delivery of property sold is to take place is, of course, to be determined by the contract between the vendor and vendee; and if the contract between the parties expressly provides that delivery shall be made at a certain place, then the vendor's title to the property is not divested until delivery is made at such place. But the universal holding of the courts is that, where the contract between the vendor and vendee is silent upon the subject of the place of delivery, then the delivery of the property by the vendor to a carrier for transportation to the vendee of itself then and there divests the vendor's title to the property, and the vendee's title to such property from the moment of such delivery to the carrier attaches. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 528-530; Benjamin, Sales, 2d ed. §§ 181, 682; 2 Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. § 1201; Smith v. Gillett, 50 Ill. 290; Kruller v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 36, 7 Am. Rep. 402, and cases there cited; McKee v. Bainter (Neb.) 72 N. W. 1044; Congdon v. Kendall (Neb.) 73 N. W. 659. In such case the carrier is, in contemplation of law, the bailee of the person to whom, and not by whom, the goods are sent.

Keeping in view these principles, we now proceed to an examination of the contract existing between Neimeyer & Co. and Simpson & Co., which resulted in the former selling to the latter the seventeen car loads of lumber involved in this controversy. The contract existing between these parties is found in certain letters which passed between them. It would seem that prior to the 8th of January, 1892, Neimeyer & Co. had sent out to the lumber dealers of the country statements showing the various kinds of lumber which they manufactured and had for sale; and it was prior to this sale that Dietz had ordered of Simpson & Co. the bill of lumber, which the latter did not have on hand. On this date, January 8, 1892, Simpson & Co. wrote Neimeyer & Co., saying: "We received your stock sheet some time since, and herewith send you two orders, which you will find very nice ones. Please name your figures as low as possible on these orders. . . . Also inclose us your lowest f. o. b. price list." Accompanying this letter were the two orders mentioned therein. These orders, so far as material here, were as follows: "A. J. Neimeyer Lumber Company, Waldo, Arkansas: Ship to C. N. Dietz, Omaha, Nebraska," seventeen cars of certain described lumber. "If for any reason you cannot ship promptly, advise. Please also send bill of lading and invoice to us at Dallas." Neimeyer & Co. at once filled the order of Simpson & Co. by shipping the seventeen car loads of lumber, as already stated, to Dietz, and on the 9th of January, 1892, wrote to Simpson & Co. as follows: "Your valued order of January 8th received and filed for prompt shipment, with the exception of two items. . . . We have filled your order as follows: [Here follow the description and price of the lumber in the seventeen cars.] Prices f. o. b. Omaha, Nebraska." It is to be observed that in the correspondence between Simpson & Co. and Neimeyer & Co. the question of the place of delivery of this lumber was not inquired about nor discussed. The place of the delivery of the lumber was not the subject of the negotiations. The expression in the Neimeyer & Co. letter of January 9th, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha, Nebraska," they insist, affords conclusive evidence that the intention of the parties was that the delivery of this lumber to Simpson & Co. should take place at Omaha, Nebraska. Three witnesses testified on the trial as to the meaning among railroad men and shippers of the expression, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha, Nebraska." One of them said it meant "that the price named in the shipper's invoice is the price at Omaha." Another said it meant "to be delivered at Omaha free on board cars." Neimeyer himself, president of Neimeyer & Co. testified: "If we say f. o. b. Omaha, that means that it is the price delivered at Omaha."

We think the true construction of the contract is the one placed thereon by the district court, and is in line with the explanation of the phrase in the contract under consideration made by the first and last of the witnesses just named. The word "prices," which precedes "f. o. b. Omaha, Nebraska," is of importance in the construction of this contract. By that expression Neimeyer & Co. meant that the prices which they had affixed to the lumber sold Simpson & Co. were to be the prices which the lumber should cost Simpson & Co. at Omaha. Not that the delivery of the lumber to Simpson & Co. should take place at Omaha, but that the price charged Simpson & Co. by Neimeyer & Co. for the lumber was to be its price at Omaha. In other words, that Neimeyer & Co. should pay the freight on this lumber from Waldo, Arkansas, to Omaha, Nebraska; or, what is the same thing, that Simpson & Co., or their vendee, Dietz, might pay the freight, and then remit the purchase price of the lumber less the freight. But the fact that Neimeyer & Co. agreed to pay the freight on this lumber from its place of shipment to its place of destination does not afford conclusive evidence that the delivery of the lumber was to take place at Omaha, Nebraska. To summarize: The contract between Neimeyer & Co. and Simpson & Co. was this: Neimeyer & Co. sold them seventeen car loads of lumber, at the price of $—, at Omaha,—not the delivery at Omaha, but the price at Omaha; and Simpson & Co., by their letter of January 8th, when asking Neimeyer & Co. to inclose "us your lowest f. o. b. price list," were seeking to ascertain from Neimeyer & Co. what the lumber would cost them (Simpson & Co.) at Omaha; and when Neimeyer & Co. answered that letter, and shipped the goods and said, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha, Nebraska," they meant to inform, and did inform, Simpson & Co. what the lumber would cost them in Omaha, Nebraska.

The contract then, between the parties, as evidenced by their correspondence, does not provide that the delivery of this lumber should take place at Omaha. To give that construction to the contract, the expression, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha," would have to be read, "Delivery f. o. b. Omaha." To give the contract this effect would be to put a violent and unnatural construction upon the language used. We have been referred by counsel for plaintiff in error to several cases which, he insists, sustain his construction of this contract. We have carefully examined all these cases, and not one of them, we think, is in point here; and we confidently say that no decision of any court can be found which has construed

"prices free on board" at a named place as equivalent to "delivery free on board" at such place. Among the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff in error is the following: Gates v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 42 Neb. 379. But this case has no bearing whatever on the question under consideration here. It simply holds that a carrier makes delivery of goods to a consignee thereof at its peril, unless at the time of delivery the bill of lading be surrendered. To the same effect is Union P. R. Co. v. Johnson, 45 Neb. 57. And in Shellenberg v. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. 45 Neb. 487, the title to the goods sold never passed to the vendee, as he procured their delivery to him by fraud. Stock v. Inglis, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 564, so far as the same bears upon the question under discussion here, is an authority against the contention of plaintiff in error. In that case a merchant ordered 200 tons of sugar. The vendor shipped 400 tons of sugar, consigned to the city where the purchaser lived. The goods were lost at sea. After the vessel left its wharf the seller sent invoices of 200 tons of this sugar to the vendee, who, upon its receipt, paid the price of the 200 tons of sugar, and obtained the bill of lading for the same. The sugar was insured, and the vendee sued the insurance company for the value of the 200 tons of sugar lost. The insurance company claimed that the title to this 200 tons of sugar never vested in the vendee, because that specific amount of sugar was not set apart and delivered by the vendor to the carrier for the vendee, and that, therefore, he had no insurable interest in the sugar lost. But the court ruled that the action of the seller, after the ship left its wharf, in sending to the vendee an invoice for 200 tons of the 400 tons shipped was a delivery of 200 tons of the 400 tons of sugar shipped, to the vendee at the time of its shipment. This case rests upon the principle that whether the vendor delivered to the vendee 200 tons of the sugar shipped at the time of the shipment was a question of intention, to be gathered from the vendor's conduct, and that his making out an invoice of the 200 tons, and transmitting it to the vendee, after the ship sailed, evidenced his intention of vesting the title of 200 tons of the sugar in the vendee at the time the whole cargo was put on shipboard. Another case cited by plaintiff in error is Miller v. Seaman, 176 Pa. 291. The contract in that case was made in February, 1894, between Miller, of Elmira, New York, and Seaman & Co., of Williamsport, Pennsylvania, and by the contract Miller agreed to sell to Seaman & Co. 406,000 feet of hemlock lumber, belonging to Miller, and then piled in the lumber yard of the Dent Lumber Company at Duboisstown, Pennsylvania, at a price of $8.25 per thousand shipping count, f. o. b. cars Williamsport. The lumber was to be loaded, inspected, and measured as ordered by the purchasers. After a quantity of this lumber had been shipped and delivered to Seaman & Co. a flood occurred and washed away the part of the lumber which had not been shipped, and Miller sought to recover the purchase price of the lumber washed away from Seaman & Co., upon the theory that he had delivered the 406,000 feet of lumber to them on the date of the contract of sale. But the court held that "the title did not pass until measurement inspection, and actual shipment," and then only as to the amount shipped, and that plaintiff, Miller, had to bear the loss of such part of the lumber as, not having been measured, inspected, and shipped, was carried away by the flood. But this case is not an authority for the contention of the plaintiff in error here. It is not a decision that "prices f. o. b. Omaha" is equivalent to "delivery f. o. b. Omaha." The principle upon which the case rests and was decided is that the contract of sale was an executory one, and that no title to the lumber agreed to be sold passed to the vendee until the lumber was measured and inspected.

Plaintiff in error's argument that delivery was to take place in Omaha, because in answer to an inquiry of his vendee the plaintiff in error named the price of the goods at that point, is not sustained by any authority that I have been able to find. On the other hand, the cases in which the question has been presented are against plaintiff in error's contention. One of these cases is Star Glass Co. v. Longley, 64 Ga. 576. In that case it was held that if the seller, upon inquiry, priced goods to the buyer, and thereupon the buyer ordered at that price, and the seller delivered the goods to a common carrier, consigned to the buyer, there was a complete sale at the price named. In Mee v. McNider, 109 N. Y. 500, the vendor resided in London, and the vendee in the city of New York. By the contract between the parties the vendor sold to the vendee 500 bags of cocoa at 59 shillings per hundred-weight. These 59 shillings per hundred-weight, by the terms of the contract, were "to include cost, freight, and insurance;" and it was held that the title of the vendee to the cocoa vested upon its delivery on board ship for transit to New York. There is no difference in principle between this case and the one at bar, so far as regards the terms of the contract under consideration. Here the vendor agrees to sell the vendee lumber for so many dollars, and this price includes the freight from the place of shipment to the lumber's destination, and by the contract the bills of lading are to be sent by the vendor to his vendee, Simpson & Co.

Thus far we have considered whether it was the mutual intention of the parties that the title to the lumber sold should vest in the vendees only upon its arrival and delivery at Omaha; and the contract—the correspondence—between the parties does not afford evidence that such was their intention, but, rather, that the thing specially negotiated about between the parties was the price of the lumber, and the contract does not afford evidence that the parties did intend that the delivery of the lumber should take place at Omaha, but left the delivery to take place in the ordinary manner of the delivery of goods by a vendor when ordered by a distant vendee. But notwithstanding the sale of this lumber by Neimeyer & Co., and its delivery to a carrier consigned to their vendee, Neimeyer & Co. might have exercised the ius disponendi, as it is called in the text-books, over the property sold; that is, Neimeyer & Co. might have retained the title to the lumber shipped, and by exercising this right made the carrier of this lumber their bailee. Schouler, Pers. Prop. 3d ed. § 271, and cases there cited.

The claim of the plaintiff in error here is that it did exercise this jus disponendi, and that, notwithstanding it sold the lumber to Simpson & Co., and at their request consigned it to Dietz, it retained the title, and the carrier held it as its bailee. We know what Neimeyer & Co. did, and the question before us now is whether its conduct in the premises authorizes an inference that notwithstanding the sale and the shipment of these goods it intended to retain title in itself until their arrival in Omaha. Their intention must be found in their conduct, and it is that intention that we are now in pursuit of, and, for the purpose of ascertaining it, it is our duty to follow every trail, however dim and tortuous it may be, which leads in the direction of such intention. If Neimeyer & Co., at the time of the shipment of these goods, intended to reserve in themselves the title thereto until their arrival at Omaha, it must have been because by so reserving the title they desired to make themselves sure of receiving the pay for the goods sold before they should part with them. Certainly they would not voluntarily, and in the absence of a contract requiring them to do so, reserve the title for the purpose of suffering the loss in case the goods should be destroyed in transit. But, by the contract of sale between Neimeyer & Co. and Simpson & Co., these goods were not sold for cash on delivery, but on sixty days' time. If the goods, then, had been consigned by Neimeyer & Co. to Simpson & Co. at Dallas, Texas, the fact that they were sold on sixty days' time would afford a presumption that the seller did not intend at the time he shipped them to reserve title in himself until they were paid for. Again, it is to be remembered that Neimeyer & Co. did not sell these goods to Dietz, their consignee, and it is an unreasonable claim on the part of Neimeyer & Co. to say, in the face of this record, that they sold the goods to Simpson & Co. on sixty days' time, and at their request consigned them to Dietz, and yet all the time intended to retain the title to these goods. Are we to understand from the argument of Neimeyer & Co. that they did not intend that these goods should be delivered to Dietz until sixty days from the date of their shipment? At the time Neimeyer & Co. shipped these goods they might have caused themselves to have been made consignees in the bill of lading, and, had they done this, then their conduct in so doing would have authorized the presumption that they thereby intended to reserve the title to the goods, and that the carrier held them as their bailee. 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 3d ed. § 273, and cases there cited; Usher, Sales, §§ 228-230, and cases there cited; Newmark, Sales, § 147, and cases there cited; Benjamin, Sales, p. 92, where the rule is thus concisely stated: "Where goods are shipped, and by bill of lading the goods are delivered to the order of the seller or his agent, the seller is prima facie deemed to reserve the right of disposal." First Nat. Bank v. Crocker, 111 Mass. 163; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Bangs, 102 Mass. 291; Seeligson v. Philbrick, 30 Fed. Rep. 600. But Neimeyer & Co., at the time they shipped these goods, did not cause them to be consigned to themselves, to their agent, or to their order. On the contrary, they caused these goods to be consigned to Dietz, the vendee of their vendee, and this fact authorizes the inference that it was then and there the intention of Neimeyer & Co. that the title to the goods should pass upon their delivery to the carrier for transit to their vendee's vendee. Upon this subject the cases are all one way.

In Usher, Sales (§ 232), it is said: "If the bill of lading or other written evidence of the delivery to a carrier be taken in the name of the consignee, or be transferred to him by indorsement, this, if not controlled by other evidence, affords the strongest proof of the intention of the seller not to retain his hold on the property after it is taken by the carrier, as security for payment of the price." In Newmark, Sales, § 152, it is said: "For it has been declared to be perfectly well settled that if a consignor in such a case wishes to prevent the property in the goods, and the right to deal with the goods while at sea, from passing to the consignee, he must, by bill of lading, make the goods deliverable to his own order, and forward the bill of lading to an agent of his own. And if he does not do that, though he still retains the right of stopping the goods in transitu, yet, subject to that right, the property in the goods and the right to the possession of the goods is in the consignee."

In 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. 3d ed. § 264, it is said: "Delivery is a circumstance often considered in connection with the appropriation of specific chattels under a contract. It is doubtless well established as the rule, both in England and America, that where—all other things being equal—a seller delivers goods to the buyer, or to a carrier by order of the buyer, the appropriation is determined beyond his power to recall it, for the property has thus presumably vested in the buyer. The rule, however, is subject to the principle of jus disponendi. 'But the delivery of goods to the buyer or his agent, or to some carrier for him, is a palpable act of appropriation and tender by the seller, whose intent, thus evinced, to transfer the title absolutely to the buyer, can hardly be disputed, if the bill of lading be taken out in the consignee's name, or indorsed over to him without restriction.' And the same author, in § 273, uses this language: 'Now, supposing the seller, in sending goods by a vessel or other carrier, to have taken out a bill of lading or similar document, a new circumstance is presented. The rule of presumption becomes this: That the carrier thereby agrees to take the goods as bailee for the person whose name is therein indicated as the one for whom the goods are to be carried; and, this bill being made out to the seller or order, the carrier's engagement is prima facie to carry the goods for and on account of the seller, to be delivered to him in case it should not be assigned or indorsed. . . . On the other hand, taking out the bill of lading in the buyer's name affords presumptive evidence on the seller's part of an intent to transfer the title.'"

In Emery v. Irving Nat. Bank, 25 Ohio St. 360, 18 Am. Rep. 299, it was said: "If the consignment be made by a vendor to a vendee, the question whether the consignor reserved the jus disponendi is one of intention to be gathered from all the facts and circumstances of the transaction. . . . On such question of intention, the terms of the bill of lading are to be taken as admissions of the consignor, and are entitled to great weight, but are not conclusive." To the same effect are Straus v. Wesel, 30 Ohio St. 211; Runney v. Higby, 5 Wis. 62; Finch v. Mansfield, 97 Mass. 89; Kline v. Baker, 99 Mass. 253; Stanton v. Eager, 16 Pick. 467; Prince v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 101 Mass. 542, 100 Am. Dec. 129; *Hullinay v. A. J. Neimeyer, the president of Neimeyer & Co., testified on the trial of this case, and, on the subject of the delivery of the lumber,—that is, whether its delivery to his vendee, Simpson & Co., was to take place at Omaha or at the place of shipment,—said:

Q. Who were you looking to for the payment of this lumber?

A. When the delivery was made,—when we commenced shipping,—we looked to Simpson & Perkins, of course.

Q. Did you consider when you delivered to the railroad company you had complied with the terms of the agreement between you and Simpson under which you sold?

A. We would—

Q. I ask you the simple question, Did you not consider, when you delivered this lumber to the railroad company at Waldo, you had fully performed your contract with Simpson & Co.?

A. As far as delivering the lumber was concerned.

Here, then, is the president of the plaintiff in error admitting on oath that he understood he had complied with his contract with Simpson & Co. when he delivered the lumber they ordered on board the cars at the place of its shipment. In other words, he admits that it was his intention that delivery of this lumber to Simpson & Co. should take place when it was put on board the cars at Waldo. Thus far no act of Neimeyer & Co., in the sale and shipment of this lumber, evinces an intention on their part to retain title to the lumber in themselves until its arrival at Omaha; but every act of theirs authorizes the presumption that they never entertained such an intention, but, on the contrary, intended the delivery of the goods to take place in the usual and ordinary manner of delivery of goods ordered by a party at a distance, namely, by a delivery to a carrier for transit to such a buyer. But by the contract between Neimeyer & Co. and Simpson & Co. the former were to pay the freight on this lumber from its place of shipment to Omaha, and it is insisted that this fact overturns all the other presumptions which Neimeyer & Co.'s conduct raises against them, that the title did pass on delivery to the carrier at Waldo, and affords conclusive evidence that they retained the title in the goods shipped, and that the carrier held them as their bailee. We have been cited to no case, nor do we think one can be found, which holds that the payment of freight by a vendor is conclusive evidence that he thereby intended to retain the title in the goods, or that the delivery of the goods was to take place, not at their point of shipment, but at their destination. It is not doubted that a vendor might, by express contract, agree to deliver goods at their place of destination, and that this contract would control; but it is not claimed that any such express contract exists here. The claim here is that, because the vendor paid the freight, this fact is conclusive evidence that he retained the title. It may be safely conceded that the payment of freight by the vendor is a circumstance which affords some evidence that the vendor intended to retain the jus disponendi of the goods shipped, but it is not conclusive; and there is no case, we repeat, which holds that it is, unless it be a case in Illinois, to be presently noticed. The cases, and all the cases, upon the subject, are to the effect that the payment of the freight by the vendor is evidence of an intention upon his part to retain title in the goods. See the rule stated and the authorities cited in Benj. Sales, p. 87.

In Devine v. Edwards, 101 Ill. 138, it is said in the syllabus: "Where a contract for the sale and delivery of personality . . . expressly provides that it is to be shipped by the seller to the place of business of the purchaser, at the expense of the seller, the place of delivery is the business place of the purchaser, and any loss on the way must fall upon the seller." In that case a seller of milk lived in Dundee, Illinois, and the purchaser lived at Chicago. The seller sued the purchaser to recover for the price of milk which he claimed to have sold and delivered to him. The purchaser interposed a defense to the action and set-off based on this state of facts: He claimed that he had been buying milk from the plaintiff for some five years; that the milk was shipped in what both parties supposed to be eight-gallon cans, but that as a matter of fact the cans did not hold eight gallons; that, in consequence of the mistake as to the capacity of the cans, he had overpaid the milk seller. On the trial the district court refused to give to the jury the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that if they believe, from the evidence, that during the five years immediately prior to the commencement of this suit the defendant purchased milk of the plaintiff by the gallon, to be shipped from Dundee to Chicago, and that the plaintiff agreed to pay the freight on such milk, and that nothing was said by either the plaintiff or defendant in regard to its place of delivery, then the law makes Chicago the place of delivery." The supreme court held that this instruction should have been given, thus ruling in fact that the payment of freight by the seller of the milk made the place of delivery, Chicago, the destination of the milk. We are unable to see how the place of the delivery of this milk was material in that action, as the only two questions litigated were (1) a question of fact as to whether the milk cans were short in capacity; and (2) a question of law, if the cans were deficient in capacity, whether the purchaser could set off overpayments against what he was owing. The court in support of its decision cites Dunlop v. Lambert, 6 Clark & F. 600. But in that case the seller of the property did not pay the freight. The vendee paid it, and the case, therefore, is not authority for the conclusion reached by the supreme court of Illinois. Furthermore, if the Illinois case is to be regarded as holding that the payment of freight by the vendor is conclusive evidence that he retained title to the goods shipped while in transit, or, in other words, that such payment of the freight made the delivery take place at the destination of the goods, then the case stands alone.

A case exactly in point here, and against the contention of plaintiff in error, is Tregelles v. Sewell, 7 Hurlst. & N. 574. In that case the plaintiff sold "300 tons of old bridge iron rails, at £5, 14s. 6d. per ton, to be delivered at Harburgh, cost, freight, and insurance." Payment was to be made for the rails in London, less the freight, upon delivery to the purchaser of the bill of lading for the rails and a policy of insurance; and it was held that the true construction of the contract was that the vendor was not to make delivery of the rails at Harburgh, but only to ship them to that place at his own cost free of any charge to the vendee, and that the property in the rails passed to the vendee on the delivery to him of the carrier's bill of lading and the policy of insurance. In Daves v. Peck, 8 T. R. 380, it was ruled that "if the consignor of goods deliver them to a particular carrier, by order of the consignee, and they be afterwards lost, the consignor cannot maintain an action against the carrier for the loss, although he paid for booking the goods." In King v. Meredith, 2 Campb. 639, the vendor sold a quantity of brandy and wine, and delivered it to a carrier to be conveyed to the vendee, the vendor paying the freight. The goods never reached the vendee. His defense was that the title to the goods remained in the vendor, and that this was evidenced by the fact that he paid the freight. But the court said: "As soon as goods are delivered to a carrier, they are at the risk of the purchaser, although the carrier be paid by the vendor." In McLaughlin v. Marston, 78 Wis. 670, it was ruled that where a customer has a continuing contract with a wholesale merchant to ship on order coffee, freight prepaid, and during the continuance of such contract gives a written order to "ship at once ten cases coffee," which is done, the seller prepaying the freight, and five cases of the coffee are attached by a creditor of the purchaser before delivery to him by the carrier, it is a question for the jury whether the coffee was to be delivered by the seller at the purchaser's place of business or to the carrier only. In Harens v. Grand Island Light & Fuel Co. 41 Neb. 153, the vendor sold to his vendee "... coal at $9.85 per ton, f. o. b. Grand Island;" and it was in effect held that the fact that the price at Grand Island included freight—i. e., the vendor paid freight—was a circumstance affording some evidence that the coal was to be delivered at Grand Island. But the case does not hold that the vendor's paying freight is conclusive evidence of delivery at destination. Wagner v. Breed, 29 Neb. 720, is, however, decisive of the question under consideration, and against the contention of the plaintiff in error. In that case Wagner was a wholesale dealer in beer, and resided in Rock Island, Illinois. Breed was a dealer in beer in Hastings, Nebraska. Wagner sold and shipped to Breed large quantities of beer, and paid the freight from Rock Island to Hastings. He took Breed's note, secured by mortgage, for the beer furnished him, and this suit was brought to foreclose that mortgage. Breed defended the action upon the ground that Wagner had no license to sell intoxicating liquors in the state of Nebraska; that the consideration for the note in suit was beer sold and delivered by him (Wagner) to him (Breed), and that the delivery took place at Hastings, Nebraska; and that, therefore, Wagner could not enforce the note and mortgage. And the district court ruled that the delivery of the beer furnished by Wagner to Breed took place in Hastings, Nebraska; that the note and mortgage were unenforceable, and dismissed Wagner's action. On appeal to this court the decree of the district court was reversed, this court holding that, notwithstanding the fact that Wagner paid the freight on the beer from Rock Island, Illinois, to Hastings, Nebraska, the delivery of the beer took place in Rock Island, Illinois. In this case the only evidence on the subject that the delivery of the beer took place in Hastings was the fact that Wagner paid the freight thereon. This case, then, is a solemn adjudication of this court that the mere fact that a vendor pays the freight is of itself not sufficient evidence to overthrow the presumption that where a purchaser orders goods from a distant seller, and he, in pursuance of the order, delivers the goods to a carrier for shipment to the vendee, such delivery is a delivery to the vendee, and that his title at once attaches. To the same effect is Mee v. McNider, 109 N. Y. 500.

Conceding, then, that Neimeyer & Co.'s paying the freight on the lumber in controversy raises the presumption that they retained title to the lumber while it was in transit, and that its delivery was to take place at Omaha, we think the district court was right in holding that the effect of this presumption was destroyed by the other evidence in the case. Whether the delivery of this lumber took place at Waldo or Omaha was a question of fact for the trial court sitting without a jury. That fact was to be determined from the intention of the vendor, and this intention was to be ascertained from all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case. But, when the district court came to weigh and consider the conduct of the vendor, it had before it a sale and shipment made by a vendor, in the ordinary manner, of goods ordered by a distant buyer, the contract specially referring only to quality, quantity, and price of the goods; the contract containing nothing in reference to the place where the goods were to be delivered; the sale made by one party, and the goods shipped to his vendee; a sale made on 60 days' time; the vendor taking a bill of lading from the initial carrier, in which neither he nor his agent was named as consignee of the goods, and which by his contract was to be sent to his vendee, Simpson & Co., and in which bill of lading the vendee was named as consignee; the evidence of the plaintiff in error that, in so far as delivery of the lumber was concerned, he understood that he had complied with his contract with Simpson & Co. when he delivered the lumber to a carrier at Waldo for transit to their vendee, and that the lumber was sold to Simpson & Co., and the seller looked to them to pay for it. From these facts, and each, one of them, the law raised the presumption that the delivery of the goods took place and the title vested in the vendee when the goods were delivered to the initial carrier. Against all these presumptions stood, and stands, singly, the fact that the vendor paid the freight.

The district court was of opinion, and in that opinion we entirely concur, that the presumption that the title remained in the vendor because he paid the freight was overthrown by the other facts in evidence in the case and the presumptions which flowed therefrom.

2. This brings us to the consideration of the question of Neimeyer & Co.'s right to stop these goods in transitu because of the insolvency of their vendee, Simpson & Co. In order that a vendor may exercise the right of stoppage in transitu of goods sold, they must, at the time, be in the possession of some person intervening between the vendor who has parted with and the purchaser who has not yet received them; that is, they must be in transit from the vendor to his immediate vendee. In the case at bar we have already seen that Neimeyer & Co., the vendors of these goods, delivered them at Waldo, Arkansas, to their vendee, Simpson & Co.; and when the goods left Waldo, Arkansas, for Omaha, Nebraska, they were in transit, not from their original vendors, Neimeyer & Co., to their original vendee, Simpson & Co., but from Simpson & Co., who had become vendors of the goods, to their vendee, Dietz. The sale of these goods by Neimeyer & Co. to Simpson & Co., and their delivery to the latter at Waldo consigned to Simpson & Co.'s vendee, Dietz, was, in effect, the same as if Neimeyer & Co., after selling the goods, had shipped and delivered them to Simpson & Co. at Dallas, Texas, and they had then sold and shipped them to Dietz. So that the question is, May a vendor of goods exercise the right of stoppage in transitu after they have been received and sold by his immediate vendee and are in transitu to that vendee's vendee? We think that all the authorities answer this question in the negative. In 1 Jones, Liens, § 870, it is said: "The right [that is, to stop goods in transitu] can be exercised only by one who holds the relation of vendor to the consignee. If one buys goods and directs his vendor to consign them to a customer of his own with whom the vendor has no privity, and the vendor accordingly ships the goods to such third person, he cannot stop them in transitu to him upon the insolvency of his immediate purchaser." A case precisely in point here is Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Freed, 38 Ark. 614. In that case Freed was a merchant at Dardanelle, and ordered of Walker Bros. & Co., at St. Louis, a bill of goods. The latter transmitted the order to Lehman & Co., at New Orleans, with directions to ship the goods to Freed, and send the invoice and bill of lading to them (Walker Bros.). This was all done. While the goods were in transitu from New Orleans to Freed, Walker Bros. & Co. failed, and Lehman & Co., claiming to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu, demanded and received from the carrier the goods. Freed then sued the railway company for the value of the goods, claiming that he was the vendee of Walker Bros. & Co., and not the vendee of Lehman & Co., but merely their consignee, and that there was no privity of contract between him and Lehman & Co., and therefore, as against him, they had no right to stop the goods in transit. And the court held the railway company liable to Freed for the value of the goods. To the same effect are Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 306, 23 Am. Dec. 607; Eaton v. Cook, 32 Vt. 58; Noble v. Adams, 7 Taunt. 59. We think, therefore, that the insolvency of Simpson & Co. did not invest Neimeyer & Co. with the right to stop these goods in transit, nor render the railway company liable to Neimeyer & Co., for delivering them to Dietz, the consignee thereof, since Dietz was not the vendee of Neimeyer & Co., but their consignee merely; he was the vendee of Simpson & Co. The only transit of these goods that took place, as between Neimeyer & Co. and Simpson & Co., was the transit that occurred of the goods between the lumber yard in Waldo, Arkansas, and the railway cars at that station; and when the goods were delivered to the carrier there, and billed to Dietz, it was the same as a sale and delivery of the goods at that place to Simpson & Co., and a resale and redelivery of the goods there by Simpson & Co. to Dietz.

3. But it is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that this judgment must be reversed because of the condition of the pleadings. This we will now proceed to notice. Neimeyer & Co. in their petition alleged "that on or about the 8th day of January, 1892, the plaintiff agreed to sell unto Simpson, Perkins, & Co., of Dallas, Texas, seventeen car loads of lumber of the plaintiff's manufacture at its mills in Waldo, Arkansas, to be delivered at Omaha, Nebraska, free of freight on board the cars at Omaha, Nebraska, for the sum of $3,432.96, less the freight from Waldo, Arkansas, to Omaha, Nebraska." The railway company, answering this allegation of the petition, used the following language: "It admits that the plaintiff agreed to and did, on the date stated, sell to Simpson & Co., of Dallas, Texas, seventeen car loads of lumber as therein alleged." Now, it is said by the plaintiff in error that the railway company, by this answer, has admitted that the delivery of the lumber in controversy was to take place in Omaha, Nebraska. If the foregoing quotation from the pleadings was all they contained upon the subject, we should feel obliged to reverse this case because of this admission in the answer. But the answer of the railway company, in addition to the admission just quoted, sets out the contract between Simpson & Co. and Neimeyer & Co. in full; and Neimeyer & Co., in their reply to this answer, admit that the contract between them and Simpson & Co., pleaded by the railway company in its answer, is the actual contract made between those parties. Neimeyer & Co., by their reply, have admitted that the contract existing between them and Simpson & Co. was not the contract which they pleaded in their petition, but the contract set up in the railway company's answer; and the question litigated in the district court was as to the proper construction of the contract pleaded in the answer and admitted to be the contract by the reply. Under these circumstances, we do not think this judgment should be reversed because of the admission made by the railway company in its answer.

The judgment of the District Court is right, and is affirmed.

Harrison, Ch. J., and Sullivan, J., and Irvine and Ryan, CC.:

We concur in the conclusion reached by Commissioner Ragan, on the ground that, conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the use of the expression, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha," might of itself afford a presumption that the delivery was to be made at Omaha, and that title should there pass, the other evidential facts were sufficient to ground an inference that title should pass at the place of shipment, and the question being one of fact, the finding is sustained by the evidence.

Norval, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the judgment just rendered. There is no controversy as to the material facts. Simpson, Perkins, & Co. were wholesale dealers in lumber at Dallas, Texas, from whom said Dietz, without plaintiff's knowledge, before January 8, 1892, ordered twenty cars of lumber, to be delivered to himself at Omaha. Simpson, Perkins, & Co. thereupon sent a letter, inclosing order for the twenty cars of lumber, to the plaintiff, the A. J. Neimeyer Lumber Company, at Waldo, Arkansas. The letter is as follows:

Dallas, Texas, Jan. 8, 1892.

A. J. Neimeyer Lumber Company, Waldo, Ark.—

by E. B. Eckhard.

Plaintiff, in compliance with the contract contained in the foregoing letters, sold to Simpson, Perkins, & Co. seventeen of the twenty cars of lumber so ordered, and shipped the same from Waldo, Arkansas, consigned to C. N. Dietz, at Omaha, on different dates between January 15, 1892, and January 21, the same year. The cars of lumber were delivered for shipment to the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company at Waldo, Arkansas, by which company they were delivered to a connecting carrier, and by the latter delivered to the defendant company, to be transported to Omaha, this state, for delivery to the consignee, Dietz. Invoices of the lumber were made by plaintiff, and sent to Simpson, Perkins, & Co., Dallas, Texas. After the delivery of cars for shipment, and before they had reached their destination, Simpson, Perkins, & Co. failed without having paid for the lumber. Thereupon plaintiff notified the initial carrier to stop the delivery of the cars to Dietz, and the defendant likewise received similar notice after a portion of the lumber had been received by the consignee, but before at least eleven cars had reached their destination. Plaintiff demanded from defendant that the remaining cars of lumber be delivered to it, with which request the company refused to comply, but delivered the same to Dietz. Thereupon this suit was brought for the value of the lumber, less freight. The bills of lading were issued by the initial carrier to plaintiff; which were retained by the latter, and were never sent or delivered to either the consignee or to Simpson, Perkins, & Co. The shipments already mentioned constituted the only transactions between said firm and plaintiff. The latter knew nothing about the deal between Simpson, Perkins, & Co. and Dietz, and had no knowledge as to how or why the lumber was to be sent to Dietz, except that the orders so directed the shipping to be made.

A. J. Neimeyer, president and manager of plaintiff's company, testified, on direct examination, concerning the meaning of the words, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha," as used in the correspondence above set out, that the "initials 'f. o. b.' have a well understood meaning among railroad men and shippers. They mean 'free on board at the point of delivery.' If we we say 'f. o. b. Omaha,' that means that is the price delivered at Omaha." The witness on cross-examination further testified that:

Q. Now, this "f. o. b." means simply the price at the place named, does it not?

A. We agree to deliver the lumber at that price at the point of destination.

Q. Do you agree to ship the lumber to the consignee at your own risk?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You assume the risk?

A. We assume the risk. If there is any damage in transit, we look to the railroad company.

Q. That is your understanding of those terms?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Isn't it your understanding, Mr. Neimeyer, that "f. o. b." simply means the price to the consignee or the purchaser at a certain place?

A. No, sir.

Q. It is a form of expression of where the delivery shall be made,—is that your understanding?

A. That is our understanding; and the price, of course, attached to it.

Q. Don't you know, as a matter of fact, that in railroad parlance the term "f. o. b." has no reference to the question of delivery, but purely the question of price?

A. In railroad parlance.

Q. And in business parlance?

A. We do not consider it so.

Q. What does the general public consider it?

A. Men in similar business do not consider it so either.

Q. I ask you the simple question, Did you not consider, when you delivered to the railroad company at Waldo, you had fully performed your contract with Perkins, Simpson, & Co.?

A. As far as delivering the lumber was concerned.

Q. Whatever the contract was?

A. We had not fulfilled our contract until we did what we agreed to do.

Q. I want to know— You say you had not — You would not consider you had?

A. No, sir; I would not consider I had.

Q. When would you consider you had fulfilled your contract?

A. When the lumber arrived at destination all satisfactory.

Q. When it arrived at its destination?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then that consideration is based upon what? What terms or writing or expression in the contract do you base the construction?

A. On simply the reason that we agreed to deliver it at Omaha.

Q. What expression?

A. Free on board cars at Omaha.

Q. Then because that letter said f. o. b. at Omaha, 22 cent rate, you interpret it as meaning you had not performed your contract with Simpson, Perkins, & Co. until the goods reached Omaha.

A. That would be our interpretation of it.

John A. Sargent, the assistant general freight agent of the Kansas City, Ft. Scott, & Memphis Railway Company, testified by deposition, inter alia, that he had been engaged in railroad business about seven years. Knew the meaning of the initial letters "f. o. b.," as used in commercial and railroad transactions, and that the expression "f. o. b. at Omaha" means "to be delivered at Omaha free on board cars." The foregoing testimony of the two witnesses named stands uncontradicted in the record.

The chief question presented in this case is, In whom was the title to the lumber while being transported by the carrier to Omaha, the final place of destination? If the title passed from plaintiff upon the delivery of the lumber to the railroad company for carriage at Waldo, Arkansas, as the defendant asserts, then there can be no recovery in this action. Ordinarily, in the absence of an agreement, express or implied, to the contrary, personal property is deliverable at the place where it is when sold. Where, however, a different place of delivery is fixed by the contracting parties, that will govern. In this case there is no claim that the delivery of the lumber was to be made at plaintiff's mills in Waldo, or that the title passed there. The correspondence between Simpson, Perkins, & Co. and plaintiff, which constitutes the contract of sale, discloses that the lumber was sold and purchased for the purpose of being shipped to Omaha, and that plaintiff was to make delivery elsewhere than at its mills. The lumber was to be selected by plaintiff, and placed on the cars for transportation, and the contract price was a certain sum per 1,000 feet, varying according to the kind of lumber, "f. o. b. Omaha." The authorities unite in stating that the delivery of goods by a seller to a common carrier for conveyance to the buyer, when the transportation is to be made in that manner, and the contract is silent on the subject, is delivery to the purchaser, and prima facie the title to the property at once vests in the latter, subject to the exercise by the vendor of the right of stoppage in transitu, since the carrier is regarded as bailee or agent of the vendee, and not of the vendor. But, if the contract requires the seller to make the delivery at a distant point, the carrier is his bailee or agent, and usually the title does not pass until the property has been delivered at the point designated by the parties. Sneathen v. Grubbs, 88 Pa. 147; Braddock Glass Co. v. Irwin, 153 Pa. 440; Hanauer v. Bartels, 2 Colo. 514; Benjamin, Sales, § 1040.

R. M. Benjamin, in his work on the Principles of Sales, at page 87, states: "If it appear that the seller undertakes to deliver the goods at the place of their destination, assuming the risk of their transmission, the carrier is the bailee of the seller, and the property in the goods does not vest in the buyer until they are delivered at such a place." The author, at page 145, in speaking of the general doctrine that the delivery of goods to a carrier by a vendor for the purpose of transportation to the vendee is prima facie delivery to the latter, says: "The rule does not obtain when it appears that the seller undertakes to deliver the goods at the place of destination. In such case the carrier is the agent of the seller." In Newmark, Sales, § 166, the author says: "The general rule is that title will not pass until delivery, if it is a part of the contract of sale that the seller shall deliver the property sold at some place specified, and receive payment on delivery. . . . And that if by the terms of the contract the seller engages to deliver the thing sold at a given place, and there be nothing to show that in the meantime the thing sold was to be at the risk of the buyer, the contract is not fulfilled by the seller unless he delivers it accordingly." Boyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75; Devine v. Edwards, 101 Ill. 138; Suit v. Woodhall, 113 Mass. 391; Weil v. Golden, 141 Mass. 364; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 528-530. McNeal v. Braun, 53 N. J. L. 617, was an action to recover the contract price of a quantity of coal shipped by plaintiff from Philadelphia to the defendant at Burlington, under a contract fixing the price at $4.10 a ton, delivered at Burlington. The coal was shipped in a barge selected by the seller, and, reaching in the evening the last named place, was moored alongside of defendant's wharf for the purpose of unloading. During the night the barge sank, and the coal was lost. The court in the opinion say: "Under a contract of this sort, delivery of the coal on board the barge was delivery to the master as the plaintiff's bailee or agent to perform for him the act of delivery in execution of his contract. 1 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. § 556. Meanwhile, and until delivery was consummated in such a manner as to be effectual as between vendor and purchaser, the coal was at the plaintiff's risk. . . . But the plaintiff, instead of being an agent to procure transportation, had himself contracted to deliver the coal, and these instructions ignore the fact that under a contract of that sort the undertaking to deliver is absolute and unqualified, and delivery of the goods is a condition precedent to the right of the vendor to sue for the contract price. If the goods be lost or destroyed before delivery is consummated, the vendor must bear the loss. Under such a contract the carrier selected by the vendor is his agent to perform the contract to deliver, and the vessel in which the goods are carried is pro hac vice the vendor's vessel. For the negligence of the one and the condition of the other, and, indeed, for failure to make delivery of the coal according to contract for any cause not due to the fault of the purchaser, the responsibility is upon the vendor." A. Westman Mercantile Co. v. Park, 2 Colo. App. 545, was to recover the contract price of two cars of hay shipped by plaintiff to defendant at Denver. It was held the delivery was complete, and the title to the hay passed to the buyer, when the cars containing the hay were left in the general receiving yards of the carrier at the final place of destination.

It is argued that the place of delivery of this lumber was on board the cars at Waldo, and that the title passed when the lumber was put on the cars for shipment. The soundness of this contention depends upon the construction given to the clause in the contract, "Prices f. o. b. Omaha," as there is no other provision relating to the subject of delivery. The initial letters "f. o. b." in contracts of sale, when the property is to be transported, mean "free on board" the cars at a designated place, whether that be the initial point of shipment or place of final destination. They imply that the buyer shall be free from all the expenses and risks attending the delivery of the property at the point named in the contract for such purpose. This contract should be interpreted precisely the same as if it read, "Prices free on board cars at Omaha," and the plain and obvious meaning of those words is that plaintiff was required to pay all freight and expenses, assume all risk of transportation, and that the title did not pass from the seller until the lumber arrived at Omaha. Had the contract named, "Prices f. o. b. Waldo," then delivery to the carrier at Waldo would have been delivery to the purchasers, and title would at once have passed. Congdon v. Kendall (Neb.) 78 N. W. 659. But the contract before us reads "f. o. b." place of destination, which is materially different from a clause which provides for the delivery of property at the initial point of transportation. Had this lumber been lost while in transit, plaintiff could not have recovered the purchase price from the vendee, since the sale was not complete without delivery of the property free on board the cars at Omaha. This is the construction placed on the contract by plaintiff and defendants in the pleadings, as a reference thereto will show. Each party has pleaded in hæc verba the correspondence which constitutes the contract under which the consignments were made. The petition avers that the lumber was sold "to be delivered at Omaha, Nebraska, free of freight on board the cars at Omaha," and the answer expressly admits the sale of the lumber as alleged in the petition. Each party, therefore, has construed the contract as calling for the delivery of the lumber at Omaha, and not Waldo, and the court is certainly justified in adopting the construction which the parties themselves have admitted to be the proper one. That the delivery was not to be made in Omaha is emphasized by the following averment in the answer: "The defendant, further answering, alleges that before the time mentioned in the petition, and before Simpson, Perkins, & Co. had purchased the lumber referred to from the plaintiff, they had entered into an agreement with the said C. N. Dietz of Omaha, to sell and deliver to him at said city, at certain agreed prices, a large quantity of lumber of the kind described in the petition, and that the said Simpson, Perkins, & Co., to carry out the agreement, purchased of the plaintiff the lumber aforesaid, and at the same time requested the plaintiff to promptly ship it to C. M. Dietz; that the plaintiff, in compliance with such request, delivered the lumber to the said St. Louis & Southwestern Railroad Company, to be transported by it and other connecting carriers to Omaha, and there deliver to C. N. Dietz." This is an admission that Omaha was the place of delivery of the lumber. The delivery to a carrier is regarded as delivery to the buyer only when and as it is in accord with the terms and intention of the shipment. In the case at bar the carrier was the bailee or agent of plaintiff, and not of Simpson, Perkins, & Co., and the title to the lumber did not vest in them until its arrival in Omaha free of expense of transportation to the purchasers. This conclusion is not without abundant support in the authorities.

In Benjamin, Sales, 6th ed. § 682, the author says: "In many mercantile contracts it is stipulated that the vendor shall deliver the goods 'f. o. b.,' i. e., 'free on board.' The meaning of these words is that the seller is to put the goods on board at his own expense, on account of the person for whom they are shipped, and the goods are at the risk of the buyer from the time when they are so put on board." At § 693 it is stated: "If, however, the vendor should sell goods, undertaking to make the delivery himself at a distant place, thus assuming the risks of the carriage, the carrier is the vendor's agent."

In Knapp Electrical Works v. New York Insulated Wire Co. 157 Ill. 456, it was held that a contract for the consignment of goods "f. o. b." place of shipment implies that the consignee is to pay the freight to the place of destination.

In Miller v. Seaman, 176 Pa. 291, the facts were these: February 21, 1894, one Miller contracted for the sale to the defendants of eleven piles of lumber in the yards of the Dent Lumber Company at Duboisstown, Pennsylvania, marked "A. G. M.," and numbered and mentioned in a schedule annexed to the contract, "at and for the price of $8.25 per 1,000 shipping count, f. o. b. cars, Williamsport, to be loaded, inspected, and measured, as ordered by said purchasers, by Mr. Sam Aurand for the sellers." The contract further stipulated for inspection and measuring all lumber not loaded on cars prior to June 1, 1894, and the same to be paid for on that date at $8 per 1,000 feet, less 2 per cent discount, the expenses of the inspection and measurement of lumber in yard on said date to be borne by the purchasers. Before June 1st a portion of the lumber was destroyed by flood, and Miller brought suit to recover the value of the lumber thus lost. A nonsuit was entered, the trial court holding that the title did not pass from Miller, under the contract, until the lumber was measured and inspected, and delivered at his expense f. o. b. cars Williamsport, to the purchasers. The judgment was affirmed, the court in the opinion saying: "It is clear that the defendants had no right to take possession of these piles, as piles of lumber. If they had attempted it, Miller could have proceeded either by replevin or trespass against them. They could not have sold the lumber in a lump, and delivered it to a purchaser. They could only take or sell in accordance with their contract. Their title to each shipment vested on its delivery f. o. b. to them at Williamsport. The lumber swept away by the flood had not been ordered by the purchaser; it had not been inspected, measured, or loaded by the seller and delivered at Williamsport for the buyer. . . . The title had left the plaintiff only as orders had been filled and shipped, and, as to all that remained on the yard, it had never left him."

In Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Hull Coal & Coke Co. 101 Ala. 446, there was under consideration a contract containing a provision for the sale and purchase of "Flat Top coke at $5 10 per net ton (2,000 lbs.), f. o. b. cars Sheffield, Ala.," which was the place of destination of the coke. The court, in discussing the meaning of the letters "f. o. b." in contracts of sale, observed: "They import that the purchaser shall be free from all expense which may have attended the shipment and transportation to the point named. Had the provision related to the initial point of the transportation, the buyer would have been entitled to the shipment at that place free from all expense incident to loading the cars,—all expense, indeed, incurred in the premises up to and including the loading of the cars. Then it would have been upon the buyer to pay the freight—the costs of transportation—to the final destination of the consignment. The provision here having relation to the point of final delivery, it can mean nothing else than that the seller is to pay all costs and charges up to that point, and that the buyer is entitled to receive the consignment free from all such costs and expenses."

Capehart v. Furman Farm Impror. Co. 103 Ala. 671, was an action by a consignor against a carrier to recover damages for loss and injury sustained in the transportation of certain goods which were purchased by Scott & Ray from plaintiff, to be shipped from Atlanta, Georgia, to Guntersville, Alabama, consigned to purchasers. The contract of sale provided the goods were to be "delivered f. o. b. at Guntersville, Ala." The court in the opinion says: "It is admitted that 'f. o. b.' means 'free on board.' Indeed, we judicially know the fact. Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Hull Coal & Coke Co. 101 Ala. 446. The effect of the stipulation is that the consignor will place the goods, loaded on the car or vessel wherein transported, at the designated point of destination, free of all expense to the consignee. Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Hull Coal & Coke Co. 101 Ala. 446. When, therefore, the plaintiff paid the freight charges and caused the boat to be landed at Guntersville, with the goods safely thereon, properly consigned to Scott & Ray, it completely fulfilled its contract. The carriers ceased to be its agents for the custody and care of the goods, and immediately became the agents of the consignees. The relations of the parties then became precisely the same, in effect, as if the contract of the plaintiff had been to deliver f. o. b. at Atlanta, and the loss or injury had occurred en route, before reaching Guntersville. In such case, the carriers would have been regarded as the agents of the consignees, and the delivery to them f. o. b. at Atlanta would have passed the title to the consignee. This contract is not susceptible of any other construction."

There is no question that, under the contract, plaintiff was required to pay the freight on the lumber from Waldo to Omaha, which fact raises the presumption that the intention was that delivery was to be made by the seller, and at its risk, at Omaha, and that the title did not vest in the vendees until the lumber arrived in that city.

In Murray v. J. J. Nichols, 34 N. Y. S. R. 62, glassware was shipped by plaintiff in Connecticut for delivery to defendant in New York, the seller paying the freight. It was ruled that the risk of transportation was on the latter, and no recovery could be had for the goods broken before their arrival at place of destination.

Devine v. Edwards, 101 Ill. 188, was an action to recover a sum alleged to be due for a quantity of milk shipped by plaintiff to defendant from Dundee, Illinois, to Chicago, under a contract whereby plaintiff was to pay the freight. There was evidence tending to show that some of the milk spilled from the cans while on the cars, and one of the questions was who was to stand this loss. The decision of the court is expressed in the second subdivision of the syllabus, as follows: "Where a contract for the sale and delivery of personalty, such as milk, expressly provides that it is to be shipped by the seller to the place of business of the purchaser, . . . and any loss on the way must fall upon the seller."

In Suit v. Woodhall, 118 Mass. 891, a traveling salesman for plaintiffs, who were wholesale liquor dealers in Louisville, Kentucky, took the order of the defendants at Lawrence, Massachusetts, for a quantity of liquors, at a stipulated price, subject to the order of plaintiffs. It was agreed that there should be deducted from the price all sums which defendants should pay for freight upon the liquors from Louisville to Lawrence. The liquors were delivered to the carrier for transportation as agreed, and it was held that the title remained in the vendors during the course of transportation, and the sale was not completed until the delivery of the liquors at the place of destination in Lawrence. To the same effect, as to completion of sale at place of delivery, is Weil v. Golden, 141 Mass. 364.

The third and fourth paragraphs of the syllabus in Julius Winkelmeyer Brewing Assn. v. Nipp, 6 Kan. App. 730, are as follows: "(3) Ordinarily, a delivery of merchandise to the carrier is a delivery to the purchaser, but when the seller pays the freight the carrier is his agent, and the delivery is made at the place of its destination. (4) Where the freight charges are to be paid in the first instance by the purchaser, but are to be charged to the seller, and deducted from the price of the merchandise, held, that the seller pays the freight."

It is asserted that Wagner v. Breed, 29 Neb. 720, is decisive of the question, against the contention of plaintiff, and that it was therein solemnly adjudicated: "The mere fact that a vendor pays the freight is of itself not sufficient evidence to overthrow the presumption that, where a purchaser orders goods from a distant seller, and he, in pursuance of the order, delivers the goods to a carrier for shipment to the vendee, such delivery is a delivery to the vendee, and that his title at once attaches."

This doctrine was not announced in that case, as an examination of the decision will disclose. The suit was to foreclose a real-estate mortgage given for the purchase price of beer sold and shipped by Wagner, a wholesale dealer in liquors in Rock Island, Illinois, to one Breed, the mortgagor, at Hastings, this state. The defense interposed was that the sale was made in Nebraska, and therefore void, inasmuch as Wagner had no license to sell intoxicating liquors here. The beer was shipped to Breed from Rock Island to Hastings in carload lots by a common carrier of his own selection and designation, and the vendee uniformly paid freight on the shipment, which was afterwards credited back to him in his account by plaintiff, for the purpose of reducing the price of the beer to conform to the usual price then obtaining. The court in the opinion say: "These sales of beer by the plaintiff to the defendant, William Breed, upon which the indebtedness sued on arose, were made and concluded at Rock Island, in the state of Illinois." That case is not an authority for the proposition that the title of this lumber passed from the vendor at the place of shipment, because it was shipped under an agreement requiring the plaintiff therein to pay the freight to Omaha, who selected the carrier, and contracted to deliver the lumber free of expense on board cars at that point. The beer was not shipped under a contract containing any such provisions. In that case the vendee, and not the vendor, designated the carrier and paid the freight, and the court properly held that the sales were made in Illinois, and not in this state.

Of the cases decided by this court, the one which more nearly fits the one at bar is Havens v. Grand Island Light & Fuel Co. 41 Neb. 153. That was an action to recover the contract price of a car of coal shipped by plaintiff from Omaha to defendant at Grand Island. One of the defenses was that the quantity of coal sued for was not received at the place of destination. Plaintiff insisted that the title of the coal vested in the fuel company upon the delivery to the carrier at Omaha, and, if a less amount of coal was received by purchasers than was delivered to the carrier, the loss must be borne by the defendant. The court held the evidence supported by the findings of the jury that the coal was to be delivered at Grand Island, saying: "The general rule doubtless is that the delivery of goods to a carrier consigned to the purchaser is a delivery to the purchaser, and that the title of the goods so delivered to the carrier at once vests in the purchaser; but this rule is by no means universal, and whether applicable in any case depends upon the facts, circumstances, and the contract between the seller and the purchaser in the case. . . . It is not stated in any of the pleadings in the case at what place this coal was to be delivered, and if the jury found from the evidence that the coal was to be delivered at Grand Island, we think the evidence ample to sustain that finding. By the letter of October 16, written by Havens & Co. to the fuel company, it is stated: 'We have your favor of the 15th, and have entered your order for two cars of grate coal at $9.85 per ton, f. o. b. Grand Island,' . . . and it also appears from the record that Havens & Co. accepted from the fuel company, as part payment of the other car of coal shipped with the one in suit, the freight bills for the coal turned over by the carrier to the fuel company. To adopt the contention of counsel that by the terms of the contract the fuel company was to pay $9.85 a ton for the coal at the place of delivery, and that that place of delivery was Omaha, would make the coal cost the fuel company in Grand Island about $16 per ton, as the evidence shows that the carrier's charges amounted to about $6 per ton."

Tregelles v. Sewell, 7 Hurlst. & N. 543, is distinguishable from the case at bar. That was an action to recover damages for the nondelivery of a quantity of bridge rails purchased under a contract whereby the buyer agreed to pay therefor "£5.14s. 6d. per ton, to be delivered at Harburgh, cost, freight, and insurance, payment by net cash in London, less freight, upon handing bill of lading and policy of insurance." The seller delivered the rails on boat at London, received the usual bill of lading, making the shipment deliverable at Harburgh; procured at his own expense a policy of insurance on the shipment, which, with the bill of lading indorsed in blank, was delivered to the buyer, and the latter then paid the contract price of the iron, less the amount of the freight payable under the bill of lading. It was decided that the seller was not required to make delivery at the final place of destination, and that the title passed on the delivery of the bill of lading and policy of insurance to the vendee. That case is in many respects unlike the one before us. There the vendee was to and did pay the purchase money on delivery of the iron to the carrier, and the vendor then paid the freight to the buyer, and delivered the bill of lading to him, so that there was nothing left for the seller to do to vest the title in the other party. In the present case the purchase money was not paid, nor the freight on the lumber, and the consignor retained possession of the bills of lading. The contract, therefore, had not been fully performed by the plaintiff.

It is urged that inasmuch as the lumber was not consigned to the plaintiff or its order, and that the bills of lading were taken in the name of the consignee, the inference may be drawn therefrom that it was the intention of plaintiff that the title to the lumber should pass immediately upon delivery to the carrier at Waldo. This argument is not tenable, because the bills of lading were never surrendered to the consignee or purchaser, but at all times remained in the possession of plaintiff. Although, ordinarily, the rule is, when not rebutted by evidence to the contrary, that the title to goods prima facie passes to a vendee upon their delivery by the vendor to a common carrier for transportation to the buyer, yet where a bill of lading is taken in the name of the seller it is presumptive evidence of his intention to retain control of the property, and that delivery to the carrier is not a delivery to the buyer, but that the carrier is the bailee or agent of the vendor. Newmark, Sales, § 147; Benjamin, Sales, § 899. On the other hand, if the bill of lading, by direction of vendor, is issued in the name of the consignee, and is sent or delivered to him, this is evidence of an intention to transfer the title to the purchaser. "But the fact that the bill of lading is taken in the buyer's name, if it is not delivered, creates no presumption of an intention to transfer the property unconditionally." Newmark, Sales, § 150; Sheridan v. New Quay Co. 4 C. B. N. S. 618; Usher, Sales, § 238; Bank of Rochester v. Jones, 4 N. Y. 497, 55 Am. Dec. 290; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 243, 244; Thomas v. First Nat. Bank, 66 Ill. App. 56; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Phillips, 60 Ill. App. 190.

In 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 242, it is said: "Where goods are consigned without reservation on the part of the consignor, the prima facie legal presumption is that the consignee is the owner. The fact of consignment does not vest an absolute title in the consignee. His title is not complete until the bill of lading comes into his hands."

Lord Denman, in Mitchel v. Ede, 11 Ad. & El. 888, with reference to a bill of lading, says: "As between the owner and shipper of the goods and the captain, it fixes and determines the duty of the latter as to the person to whom it is (at the time) the pleasure of the former that the goods should be delivered. But there is nothing final or irrevocable in its nature. The owner of the goods may change his purpose, at any rate before the delivery of the goods themselves or the bill of lading to the party named in it, and may order the delivery to be to some other person, to B instead of to A."

It is obvious that the true construction of the contract of purchase and sale involved in the present case is that plaintiff's agreement was not performed until the delivery of the lumber free on board the cars in Omaha, and that the title was not divested until the shipment arrived in that city. Plaintiff, therefore, without regard to the solvency or insolvency of Simpson, Perkins, & Co., had the undoubted right to stop the delivery of the lumber at any time during the course of transportation, which right was duly exercised before at least eleven cars had arrived at the place of their final destination. The defendant, however, delivered the lumber to the consignee, Dietz, notwithstanding it had received timely notice not to do so. Such delivery was, therefore, at the risk of the carrier, and it is liable as for conversion. Gates v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 42 Neb. 379; Shellenberg v. Fremont, E. & M. Valley R. Co. 45 Neb. 487.

The judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Laura GERNERD

v.

Charles A. GERNERD, Appt.

(185 Pa. 238.)

1. A wife can maintain an action against one who has wrongfully induced her husband to leave her, where she is freed from common-law disabilities and entitled to sue in her own name and right for torts done to her.
2. Advice to a son as to separating from his wife, given in good faith and with a proper motive, will not render the parent liable to her, unless it was clearly unjustifiable.

(March 28, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lehigh County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for inducing plaintiff's husband to leave her. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Evan Holben and R. E. Wright, for appellant:

Damages are sought to be recovered for words uttered by the defendant. The charge is denied. The action is founded upon alleged injurious words spoken by the defendant. The gist of the action is the special damage that followed in consequence of the speaking and publication of the alleged injurious words.

Phillips v. Hoefler, 1 Pa. 62, 44 Am. Dec. 111; Pollock, Torts, p. 162; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 589.

If the words spoken by the defendant had the legal and natural result complained of, then the cause of action was complete when the plaintiff left her husband.

Pollock, Torts, p. 164.

The action was not brought within a year after the plaintiff had left her husband.

Com. v. Haas, 57 Pa. 445.

The statutes of limitation, which enact that actions shall not be brought after the lapse of certain periods from the time when the cause of action accrued, bar actions brought after the time so limited, though the cause of action was not discovered, or practically discoverable, by the injured party when it accrued, or was even fraudulently concealed from him by the wrongdoer until after the time limited by the act had expired.

Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, p. 18.

The defendant had a right to speak, and even if he did call plaintiff vile names he cannot be held in damages for having done so. The simple fact that there has been some casual bystander cannot alter the nature of the transaction. The business of life could not be well carried on if such restraints were imposed upon this and similar communications, and if, on every occasion in which they were made, they were not protected unless strictly private.

NOTE.—As to wife's right of action for inducing her husband to leave her, see Tucker v. Tucker (Miss.) 82 L. R. A. 623, and authorities in footnote thereto. See also Brown v. Brown (N. C.) 38 L. R. A. 242.

Smith, Mast. & S. pp. 410, 411, 460, 461.

The special damage alleged must be the natural and probable result of the defendant's wrongful conduct.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 446.

Messrs. E. J. Lichtenwalner and Edward Harvey, for appellee:

It was a fiction of the common law that by marriage the husband and wife became one legal person. It was also assumed that the wife lost her identity by marriage and became merged in her husband. This fiction was unknown to the civil law.

Story, Eq. § 1867.

There is no doubt that at common law a husband had a right of action against another for enticing away his wife and for depriving him of her consortium. And it is by no means clear that the same law denied a remedy to the wife if deprived of the support and association of her spouse.

Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577.

Under the act of April 11, 1856 (Pub. Laws, 815), she can, under certain limitations, sustain an action of slander or libel or for the recovery of her separate earnings. And she can, under this last act, maintain a suit against her husband.

May v. May, 62 Pa. 206.

For personal injuries she may maintain an action in her own name.

Carr v. Easton, 142 Pa. 139; Kelley v. Mayberry Twp. 154 Pa. 440.

A married woman has a pecuniary interest in the life of her husband. She may insure his life and recover the loss because of her interest in his life. She may maintain an action for damages for any injury causing the death of her husband, and her pecuniary interest in the damages recovered is measured by the rules of distribution under the intestate laws.

At common law the right of action for a tort committed upon a married woman belonged to her.

Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co. v. Evans, 176 Pa. 28.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court: The right of a husband to maintain an action against one who has wrongfully induced his wife to separate from him seems not to have been doubted since the case of Winsmore v. Greenback (decided in 1745) Willes Rep. 577. The right of a wife to maintain an action for the same cause has been denied, because of the common-law unity of husband and wife, and of her want of property in his society and assistance. There was certainly an inconsistency in permitting a recovery when her husband was a necessary party to the action, and she had no separate legal existence or interest, and the damages recovered would belong to him, but the gist of the action is the same in either case. There is no substantial difference in the right which each has to the society, companionship, and aid of the other, and the injury is the same whether it affects the husband or the wife. Where the wife has been freed from her common-law disabilities, and may sue in her own name and right for torts done her, we see no reason to doubt her right to maintain an action against one who has wrongfully induced her husband to leave her. Generally, this right has been recognized and sustained in jurisdictions where she has the capacity to sue, notably in the cases of Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L. R. A. 553; Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 4, 6 L. R. A. 829; Seater v. Adams, 66 N. H. 142; Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397; Haynes v. Nowlin, 129 Ind. 581, 14 L. R. A. 787; Warren v. Warren, 89 Mich. 128, 14 L. R. A. 546; Bassett v. Bassett, 20 Ill. App. 543; Price v. Price, 91 Iowa, 693, 29 L. R. A. 150; Clow v. Chapman, 125 Mo. 101, 26 L. R. A. 412; Mehrhoff v. Mehrhoff, 26 Fed. Rep. 13. The New York and Indiana cases cited overrule the earlier cases in those states in which a different conclusion had been reached. The only decisions in which we find the right denied are Duffles v. Duffles, 76 Wis. 374, 8 L. R. A. 420; and Doe v. Roe, 82 Me. 503, 8 L. R. A. 833. Of late years, the right of the wife to sue has generally been maintained by text-writers. It is said in Bigelow, Torts, 158: "To entice 40 L. R. A.

away or corrupt the mind and affection of one's consort is a civil wrong, for which the offender is liable to the injured husband or wife." And in Cooley, Torts, 228: "We see no reason why such an action should not be supported, where, by statute, the wife is allowed, for her own benefit, to sue for personal wrongs suffered by her." In 1 Jaggard, Torts, p. 467, many of the cases on the subject are referred to, and the conclusion is thus stated: "On the other hand, it has been insisted that in natural justice no reason exists why the right of the wife to maintain an action against the seducer of her husband should not be co-extensive with the right of action against her seducer. The weight of authorities and the tendency of the legislation strongly incline to the latter opinion." The same proposition is stated in 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 166, and in 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1358. The defendant in this action was the father of the plaintiff's husband, and the case was one to be carefully guarded at the trial. The intent with which he acted was material in determining his liability. It was his right to advise his son, and in so doing, in good faith and with a proper motive, he should not be regarded in the same light as a mere intermeddler. A clear case of want of justification on the part of the parents should be shown before they should be held responsible. Cooley, Torts, 265; Hutcheon v. Peck, 5 Johns. 196; Bennett v. Smith, 21 Barb. 439; Huling v. Huling, 32 Ill. App. 519; Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148, 10 L. R. A. 468; Fratini v. Caslini, 44 Am. St. Rep. 850, note (66 Vt. 273). On the trial the plaintiff was held to distinct and clear proof that the defendant wrongfully and maliciously caused her husband to abandon her. Every right which the defendant could properly claim in this regard was carefully stated in a very clear and adequate charge. The claim that the action was, in effect, an action for words spoken, and consequently barred by the statute of limitations, cannot be sustained. It was not either in form or in substance an action of slander, and the words proved were only one of the many means employed by the defendant to effect his purpose.

The judgment is affirmed.

(184 Pa. 588.)

A custom or usage of carpet making which would give the color mixer an exclusive title as against his employer to the various combinations and shades of color devised by him for use in the manufacture of carpets in his employer's mill is unreasonable, and cannot be sustained.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for unlawful detention and copying of plaintiff's color books. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. Carroll Brewster and George W. Harkins for appellant.

Mr. Richard P. White, for appellees:

Usage is never admissible to oppose or alter a general principle of law, and upon a fixed state of facts to make the legal rights or liabilities of the parties other than they are at common law.

Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. 384, 19 L. ed. 987; Rapp v. Palmer, 3 Watts, 178.

Nothing should be more pertinaciously resisted than these attempts to transfer the functions of the judge from the bench to the witness-stand, by evidence of customs in derogation of the general law, that would involve the responsibilities of the parties in rules whose existence, perhaps, they had no reason to suspect before they came to be applied to their rights.

Bolton v. Colder, 1 Watts, 363; Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Dougl. 201; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. pt. 2, pp. 928-954.

The recipes prepared by the color-mixer for the use of his employers in the manufacture of their carpets belonged to them, so far, at least, as to give them the right to continue the use of the various colors and shades produced by them.

Dempsey v. Dobson, 174 Pa. 122, 32 L. R. A. 761; Makepeace v. Jackson, 4 Taunt. 770.

Vindictive damages could not be allowed, no injury was shown, and for a bare technical right to nominal damages this court would not reverse.

Where an employee uses his own books to make entries in the course of his employment, which it was his duty to make and to keep for his employers' information, the books so used become the property of the master.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was in this court in 1896, and is reported in 174 Pa. 122, 32 L. R. A. 761. A verdict and judgment had been obtained in the court below against the defendants, from which they appealed. We reversed the judgment, holding that a color mixer could not assert, as against his employer, an exclusive title to the various combinations and shades of color devised by him for use in the manufacture of carpets in his employer's mill. But we awarded a venire facias de novo, because of an allegation that violence had been used by the defendants in the detention of the plaintiff, and in preventing him from carrying away from the mill his color books. A new trial has now been had. The charges of the use of unlawful violence do not seem to have been pressed, but the plaintiff attempted on the trial to prove a custom or usage prevailing in the business of carpet making, by which the results of the color mixer's skill and labor in the service of his employer are recognized as belonging exclusively to the employee, the color mixer; the employer, the manufacturer, for whose use the colors were devised, having no title whatever to them. The several assignments of error relate to the rejection of the evidence offered to establish such a custom. It is one of the requisites of a good custom that it must be reasonable. Another is that it must not be contrary to law. The custom sought to be set up was an unreasonable one. The color mixer, like the designer and the weaver, is employed because of his supposed ability to serve his employer in the particular line of labor which he is expected to follow. First comes the work of the designer, who prepares, or invents, it may be, the pattern after which the carpet is to be made. Then comes the color mixer, who is to mix his employer's colors in such proportions as to produce the necessary shades required by the pattern that has been adopted. Finally come the application of the colors and the weaving. The services of each and all these mechanics are requisite to the production of the carpet. The employer has an equal right to the faithful service of each, and is equally, so far as his own business is concerned, entitled to the results of the labor of each. It a color mixer could at his pleasure carry off the recipes and color books from his employer's factory, and refuse to permit their further use except upon his own terms, it would be in his power to inflict enormous loss on the manufacturer at any moment, and not merely to disturb, but to destroy, his business. Such a custom would not be reasonable, and could not be sustained. But it is against the law. The courts of the United States, of this state, and, so far as I have been able to examine, of all the states in the Union, recognize the rule laid down when this case was here in 1896, that "the designs and recipes so made for him [an employer] are, as between his employees and himself, his, for the purposes of his own manufacturing business. Even if his employee had obtained letters patent for his formula, protecting himself thereby against the public, still the employer's right to continue its use [in his own business] would be protected by the United States courts." Solomons v. United States, 187 U. S. 342, 34 L. ed. 687. To the same effect are Stemmer's Appeal, 58 Pa. 155, 98 Am. Dec. 243; Dempsey v. Dobson, 174 Pa. 122, 32 L. R. A. 761.

The several offers made for the purpose of showing the existence of the alleged custom were properly rejected. In the absence of proof of the alleged acts of violence, we fully concur with the learned judge of the court below that there was nothing shown by the evidence on the part of the plaintiff sufficient to sustain a verdict against the defendants, and that the case was a proper one for a compulsory nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed, and judgment is now entered in favor of the defendants.

Re Estate of Susan E. DU PLAINE, Deceased.

(185 Pa. 332.)

A mortgage for one half the trust estate, obtained for himself alone by one of the cestuis que trust from the trustee in a joint trust to pay one half of the income to such cestui que trust and the other half to his sister, will inure to the benefit of his sister as well as himself, where he obtained the mortgage by pressure when the trustee was financially embarrassed, but concealed these facts from his sister, although it is not shown that any of the trust funds went into the mortgaged property.

(April 4, 1898.)

A PPEAL by Benoni C. Du Plaine from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Philadelphia County adjudging his sister Helen Augusta C. Childs entitled to the benefit of securities which he had obtained for his share of a trust estate which had been left to the brother and sister, but which was in danger of loss because of the financial embarrassment of the trustee. Affirmed.

The opinion of the orphans' court, which was adopted by the supreme court, is as follows:

"The petitioner and respondent are brother and sister. Their mother by her will gave all the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate to a trustee in trust to manage the same, and collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and 'pay in semiannual instalments one full one half part of net rents, income, interest, dividends, and profits unto my son, Benoni C. Du Plaine, for and during all the term of his natural life,' etc. And the 'said trustee shall pay the remaining one half part of the said net rents, interest, income, dividends, and profits, in semiannual instalments, unto my said daughter, Helen Augusta C. Childs, for and during the full term of her natural life,' etc. In the case of the death of either of the said life tenants, the principal was to go to their children, with, however, a power of disposition otherwise by will; and, in default of children or a will, then cross remainders from one to the other. The brother had accidentally learned that the trustee was in an embarrassed condition financially, and went to him, and insisted upon a settlement for his one half of the principal sum which was in his hands as trustee, and under pressure of threatened arrest, etc., received from him a mortgage upon some real estate for exactly one half of the trust estate. The brother for several years concealed all knowledge of the insolvent condition of the trustee from his sister, and also the fact that he had tried to protect himself by securing this mortgage. This he now claims he holds for his own benefit alone, and that his sister has no interest therein. Such are, briefly stated, the facts.

"It is hard to find language sufficiently strong to condemn the conduct of a brother who would thus try to secure himself and leave his sister in the lurch, and, after he supposed he was himself secure, not to give her the knowledge by which she might have been able to secure herself, also; but the case is not to be decided upon any sentimental considerations, but upon the law as applicable to the facts as they are presented. It will be observed that the trust is a joint one, and although the trustee, in an account filed, divided the fund in half, and stated that he held one half for one, and the other half for the other, of the cestuis que trust, there was no distribution so decreed; and in fact there could not be any separation of this fund, under the will of the testatrix, until one or the other of the cestuis que trust died, when other interests might intervene. The mother gave all her residuary estate to this trustee, to pay one half of the income to the son, and one half of the income to the daughter. She did not give one half of the principal, to be held for each, but it all is to be held jointly in trust for both. In Aubert's Appeal, 119 Pa. 52, and in Wilen's Appeal, 105 Pa. 121, the supreme court laid down the law that, where an estate is so given for two persons, it is to remain intact until the time for distribution arrives, because 'we cannot say,' to use their language, 'that a moiety of the income of the whole may not be more valuable to the surviving life tenant than the whole of the income of a moiety.' The time for the distribution of this fund has not arrived, and therefore there can be no distribution or division of it; and in case of a devastavit, as has here happened, anything that the vigilance of either of the cestuis que trust, or anyone else, has rescued from the wreck, must inure to the benefit of both of them. It has been settled that where there is a community of interest there is a community of duty: each of those interested must be faithful to himself, and equally as well to all the others interested. He can secure no advantage over the others because he has found out something they do not know, or because perhaps he is in a better position to protect himself than are they. The rule of law as stated in Keech v. Sandford, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 4th Am. ed. 64, has been followed in numerous cases in this state. 'Whenever one person is placed in such relations to another, by the act or consent of that other, or by the act of a third person, or by the law, that he becomes interested for him, or interested with him, in any subject of property or business, he is prohibited from acquiring rights in that subject antagonistic to the person with whose interest he has become associated.' This doctrine was enforced in Weaver v. Wible, 25 Pa. 270, 64 Am. Dec. 696, the syllabus of which is as follows: 'When several persons have a joint or common interest in an estate, one cannot purchase an encumbrance or an outstanding title, and set it up against the rest, for the purpose of depriving them of their interests.' Chief Justice Lewis, in delivering the opinion, said: 'Community of interest produces community of duty. . . . A conveyance to one of several tenants in common, or a deed to one of two devisees of the same land, shall inure to the benefit of all who came in under the same title, and are holding jointly or in common. . . . Where several persons have a joint or common interest in an estate, it is not to be tolerated that one shall purchase an encumbrance or an outstanding title, and set it up against the rest, for the purpose of depriving them of their interests. Chancellor Kent, with great truth, remarked that such a proceeding would be 'repugnant to a sense of refined and accurate justice, and would be immoral, because it would be against the reciprocal obligation to do nothing to the prejudice of each other's equal claim, which the relationship of the parties created.' It is the duty of all to deal candidly and benevolently with each other, and to cause no harm to their joint interests." To the same purpose, see Lloyd v. Lynch, 28 Pa. 419, 70 Am. Dec. 137; Gibson v. Winslow, 46 Pa. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 552; Kennedy v. Borie, 166 Pa. 360; McOutcheon v. Smith, 173 Pa. 101; Powell v. Lantzy, 178 Pa. 543.

The fact which was so urgently pressed at the argument, that it was not proved that any portion of these trust funds went into the particular property upon which the mortgage was given, can make no difference. Whether they did or did not is immaterial. The only claim the respondent had upon the trustee was as a cestui que trust under this will. He was not a creditor in any other way. When this mortgage was given to him, the consideration passing was that the trustee owed this trust-estate money. Therefore anything that he received upon that account must, in law, equity, morals, and common decency, be held by him in trust for his sister as well as himself. The petition in this case is granted.

Mr. B. F. Fisher for appellant.

Mr. William C. Hannis for appellee.

Per Curiam:

There is no substantial error in the findings of fact in this case, and on the facts thus established the decree complained of is free from error. The questions involved were well considered and correctly decided by the orphans' court, and on its opinion the decree is affirmed, and appeal dismissed, at appellant's costs.

IV. Miscellaneous matters.

I. Exact sciences.

a. General rule as to admissibility.

The books which are admitted before a jury as primary evidence are those which relate to science deemed exact, or such as by long use in the practical affairs of life have come to be accepted as standard and unvarying authority in determining the action of those who use them. Tucker v. Donald, 60 Miss. 460, 45 Am. Rep. 416.

Books of exact science in which conclusions from certain and consistent data are reached by processes too intricate to be elucidated by a witness, when shown to have been accepted as standards upon the particular subject under examination, are admitted in evidence. Shover v. Myrick, 4 Ind. App. 7.

Almanacs, astronomical calculations, tables of logarithms and the like, and tables of life expectations in matters of insurance, are among the exact sciences which are admissible as prima facie evidence. Tucker v. Donald, 60 Miss. 460, 45 Am. Rep. 416.

When the scientific work is concededly recognized as a standard authority by the profession, statistics of mechanical experiments and tabulations of the results thereof may be read in evidence by an expert witness in support of his professional opinion, where such statistics and tabulations are generally relied upon by experts in the particular field of the mechanic arts with which such statistics and tabulations are concerned. WESTERN ASSUR. CO. v. J. H. MOHLMAN CO.

b. Tables of expectancy of life.

1. Admissibility generally.

A table showing the expectancy of life in healthy persons of different ages, printed in books of general acceptance and authority in the courts, such as the Carlisle and Northampton and other tables of expectancy, is admissible in evidence in cases where such evidence is applicable. Sellers v. Foster, 27

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendants' negligence. Reversed.

Before Sanborn and Thayer, Circuit Judges, and Lochren, District Judge.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John N. Baldwin, for plaintiffs in error:

Under common-law procedure it was not competent to read books of science to a jury as evidence, because the statements therein contained were not only wanting in the sanctity of an oath, but were made by one who was not present and was not liable to cross-examination. For that reason they were excluded, notwithstanding the opinion under oath of scientific men, that they were books of authority.

In Peck v. Hutchinson, 88 Iowa, 320, Wells' Treatise on the Eye was introduced.

On rehearing.

If we find that the supreme court of Iowa has adopted a radically different canon of construction than that of the California court, such canon of construction is obligatory upon this court. Such is the case.

with Johnson's New Universal Encyclopedia, and that it was his impression that it was a standard work, is sufficient to identify it as a standard authority for the purpose of rendering it admissible in evidence to show the expectancy of life in an action against a railroad company for a personal injury causing death. Gorman v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 78 Iowa, 509.

So, the expectation of human life is a matter of experience, about which it is not error for the judge to instruct the jury in an action in which it is material. Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 Duer, 633.

A book containing tables of expectancy of life, however, which is not one of those standard works which courts take judicial notice of and recognize as authority, is not admissible in evidence in the absence of proof of its correctness. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Arispe, 81 Tex. 517.

But the admission in evidence of an excerpt in the form of a table of expectation of life which contains no intrinsic evidence of authenticity, in an action against a saloonkeeper under the civil damage act, is not reversible error where it was more favorable to the party excepting than were the Carlisle tables as contained in a law book which was properly admitted in evidence. Sellers v. Foster, 27 Neb. 118.

The American table of mortality has superseded the Carlisle tables in America, and should be resorted to by the courts as a basis for the calculation of annuities dependent upon the probability of human life. Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232, 49 Am. Rep. 818.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Horace W. Yates, the defendant in error, sued the Union Pacific Railway Company and its receivers, who are the plaintiffs in error, for injuries sustained in a railway collision which occurred on November 22, 1892, near the town of Alda, in the state of Nebraska, on the line of the Union Pacific Railroad. The plaintiff below was a mail agent in the service of the United States, and he was riding in that capacity on one of the trains at the time of the collision. The injuries which the plaintiff sustained in consequence of the collision, to all outward appearances, were not serious. One of his arms and one of his legs were bruised, but not broken, and his left ear was cut, but beyond this his body appears to have borne no visible marks of injury. It was contended at the trial, however, that the plaintiff sustained a severe shock, which affected the nerves of the spine, and had produced a dangerous and progressive disease of the spinal cord, which had permanently disabled him, and was liable to prove fatal. In support of this contention, the plaintiff offered in evidence, and was allowed to read to the jury, over the objection of the defendant company, certain extracts from a book or monograph, which was written by Dr. John Eric Erichsen, entitled "On Concussion of the Spine and Nervous Shock and Other Obscure Injuries to the Nervous System, in Their Clinical and Medico-Legal Aspects" (London, 1875). The material parts of the extracts thus read were as follows:

"It is well known to every surgeon of experience that no injury to the head is too trifling to be despised. This observation made of old by Hippocrates may be applied with equal, if not greater, justice to injuries of the spine; for, if the brain is liable to suffer serious primary lesion and protracted secondary disease from the infliction of slight, and perhaps, at the time, apparently trivial, injuries to the head, the spinal cord is at least equally prone to become functionally disturbed and organically diseased from injuries sustained by the vertebral column. My object in these lectures will be to direct your attention to certain injuries of the spine that may arise from accidents that are often apparently slight, from shocks to the body generally, as well as from blows inflicted directly upon the back, and to describe the train of progressive symptoms that lead up to the obscure, protracted, and often dangerous diseases of the spinal cord and its membranes, that sooner or later are liable to supervene thereon. These injuries of the spine and spinal cord occur not unfrequently in the ordinary accidents of civil life, in falls, blows, horse and carriage accidents, injuries in gymnasiums, etc., but in none more frequently or with greater severity than in those which are sustained by persons who have been subjected to the violent shock of a railway collision. And if, in these lectures, I speak more of the injuries of the spine arising from this than from any other class of accidents, it is not because I wish to make a distinction in injuries of the spine according to their causes, and still less to establish anything like a specialty of 'railway surgery,' but rather because injuries of the nervous system of the kind we are about to discuss have become of much practical importance from the great frequency of their occurrence, consequent on the extension of railway traffic, and because they are so frequently the cause of litigation. There is also a special and painful interest attaching to them

But it detracts nothing from the value of a table of expectancy properly admitted in evidence that other tables are also recognized. Boettger v. Scherpe & K. Architectural Iron Co. 136 Mo. 531.

And the admission in evidence, in an action for personal injury resulting in death, of Dr. Farr's Tables, constructed from the official records of the registrar general for England and Wales, known as the English Tables, is not reversible error as against the defendant, though they differ from the tables based upon the American experience and recognized by statute, as they show a less number of years than that shown by the American experience. Cooper v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 281.

2. In accident cases.

The Carlisle and Northampton tables are standard tables on the subject of duration of life, and they are admissible in evidence in an action for damages for alleged negligence causing death, as tending to show the probable duration of the life of the person injured if such injury had not happened, as an element of damages. Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 18 Iowa, 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391; Worden v. Humeston & S. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 310; Chase v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 675; *Duval v. And the American Experience Table, which is a standard table and has been long recognized both by statute and by courts, is admissible in evidence in an action for a personal injury causing death, to show the expectancy of a deceased person's life. Boettger v. Scherpe & K. Architectural Iron Co. 136 Mo. 531.

And the mortuary tables contained in How. (Mich.) Stat. § 4245, are admissible in evidence in an action for a personal injury, as tending to show a person's expectancy of life at a certain age. Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. 78 Mich. 513, 7 L. R. A. 500.

So, a witness in an action for a personal injury resulting in death may testify as to the probable period of the natural life of the person injured, by reference to the recognized American life table. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Mahoney, 7 Bush, 236.

And a witness may be permitted to testify in such an action from tables prepared by the American Legion of Honor, showing estimates of the probable duration of lives of men at different ages, where it is not claimed that they were not approved or correct tables. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Bennett, 78 Tex. 151.

from the distressing character of the symptoms presented by the sufferers. Moreover, in these cases there is always a peculiar difficulty, which is often greatly increased by the absence of evidence of outward and direct physical injury, by the obscurity and insidious character of the early symptoms, the slowly progressive development of the secondary organic lesions, and the functional derangements entailed by them, and the very uncertain nature of the ultimate issues of the case. Thus, they constitute a class of injuries that often tax the diagnostic skill of the surgeon to the very utmost. [Lecture 1, pp. 1, 2.] I wish particularly and very specially to impress upon you that, although I shall have frequent occasion to speak of 'shocks' to the nervous system arising from railway accidents, I do not consider that these injuries stand in a different category from accidents occurring from other causes in civil life; and it will be one of the main objects of these lectures to show you that precisely the same effects may result from other and more ordinary injuries. It must, however, be evident to you all that in no ordinary accidents can the shock, physical and mental, be so great as those that occur on railways. The rapidity of the movement, the momentum of the persons injured and of the vehicle that carries them, the suddenness of its arrest, the helplessness of the sufferers, and the natural perturbation of mind that must disturb the bravest, are all circumstances which necessarily greatly increase the severity of the resulting injury to the nervous system, and which have led surgeons to consider these cases as somewhat exceptional and different from ordinary accidents. There is, in fact, much the same difference between these and the more ordinary injuries of the nervous system as there is between a gunshot wound and other contused and lacerated wounds of the limbs. The cause is special, and the results are peculiar; but, though peculiar, they are not so unlike those arising from other accidents as to justify us in regarding them as being in any essential respect distinct and different. The peculiarity of those obscure injuries of the nervous system caused by railway shocks is sufficiently great, however, to warrant us in grouping them together and considering them as a whole in a separate chapter in the great book of surgery. Perhaps the one circumstance which more than any other gives a peculiar character to a railway accident is the thrill or jar—the 'ébranlement' of French writers; the sharp vibration, in fact—that is transmitted through everything subjected to it. It is this vibratory shock or jar which by some is compared to an electric shock, by others to setting the teeth on edge, that causes a carriage to be shattered into splinters, and occasions the sharp, tremulous movement that runs through every fiber of its occupants, and that constitutes the shock. In addition to this, the body of the traveler is thrown to and fro often five or six times without any power of resistance or self-preservation. [pp. 5, 6.] In considering these injuries, I shall adopt the following arrangement: (1) The effects of severe blows directly applied to the spine, but without obvious lesion of the bone or ligament. (2) The consideration of the effects of slight and apparently trivial injuries applied directly to the spine. (3) The effects that injuries of distant parts of the body, or that shocks of the system unattended by any direct blow upon the back, have upon the spinal cord. (4) The effects produced by sprains, wrenches, or twists of the spine. [Lecture 2, pp. 14, 15.] My object in the present lecture is to direct your attention to a class of cases in which the injury inflicted upon the back is either very slight in degree, or in which the blow, if more severe, has fallen

And an accountant may give evidence in such an action, in which the deceased was under a covenant to pay his mother an annuity of £200 during their joint lives, after referring to the Carlisle tables, as to the average duration of life of two persons of the age of the mother and son respectively, and as to the price for which an annuity for the mother's life could be bought. Rowley v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. 221, 42 L. J. Exch. N. S. 153, 29 L. T. N. S. 180, 21 Week. Rep. 899.

It has been held, however, that the Carlisle tables are immaterial and inadmissible in evidence in an action for injuries not resulting in the death of the person injured. Nelson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 564.

And that annuity tables are not admissible in evidence in an action for a personal injury, to show the probable duration of the life of the person injured in order to show how long she is likely to live to endure the pain and suffering caused by the injury. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jounson, 36 Ill. App. 564.

But in Chase v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 675, Nelson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 564, supra, was said to have been overruled.

And the general rule would seem to be that the competency of standard life expectancy tables is not confined to a case of death of one sustaining personal injury by another's negligence, but that they are also admissible to show the probable duration of life of one suing for a personal injury, on the question of compensation for permanent injury. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Miller, 141 Ind. 533; Simonson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 87; McDonald v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 124, 96 Am. Dec. 114; Lincoln v. Smith, 28 Neb. 762; Friend v. Ingersoll, 39 Neb. 717; Kraut v. Frankfort & S. P. City Pass. R. Co. 160 Pa. 329.

And that tables of life expectancies are admissible in evidence in an action for a personal injury on the question of damages, though death did not result. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Miller, 141 Ind. 533; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Hissong, 97 Ala. 187; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hurt, 101 Ala. 34; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Lundin, 8 Colo. 94; Campbell v. York, 172 Pa. 205; Kraut v. Frankfort & S. P. City Pass. R. Co. 160 Pa. 329; Mississippi & T. R. Co. v. Ayres, 16 Lea, 725.

And that a physician and surgeon who attended the person injured may testify as to the expectation of life of a healthy man of such injured person's age, as shown by the Carlisle mortality tables, in an action for alleged negligence causing such injury, where he has testified that the injuries were of a permanent character. McCue v. Knoxville, 146 Pa. 580; Steinbrunner v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. 146 Pa. 504.

Thus, standard mortality tables are admissible in evidence to show the probable duration of life of a healthy person sustaining personal injury by the negligence or wrongful act of another, where the injury has practically destroyed his earning capacity. Townsend v. Briggs (Cal.) 32 Pac. 307.

Or, where the injury was permanent and incaupon some other part of the body than the spine, and in which, consequently, its influence upon the cord has been of a less direct and often of a less instantaneous character. Nothing is more common than that the symptoms of spinal mischief do not develop for several days after heavy falls on the back. The symptoms arising from these accidents have been very variously interpreted by surgeons, some ignoring them entirely, believing that they exist only in the imagination of the patient, or, if they do admit their existence, they attribute them to other conditions of the nervous system than any that could arise from the alleged accident. And when their connection with and dependence upon an injury have been incontestably proved, no little discrepancy of opinion has arisen as to the ultimate results of the case, the permanence of the symptoms, and the curability, or not, of the patient. [Lecture 4, pp. 77, 78, 79.] I have often remarked that in railway accidents those passengers suffer most seriously from concussion of the nervous system who sit with their backs turned towards the end of the train which is struck. Thus, when a train runs into an obstruction on the line, those who are sitting with their backs to the engine will probably suffer most; whilst if a train is run into from behind, those who are facing the engine will most frequently be the greatest sufferers. Those who are facing the engine are in the first instance thrown suddenly and violently forward off their seats against the opposite side of the compartment; hence they will frequently be found to be cut about the head and face, and more especially across the knees and legs, by coming in contact with the edges of the opposite seats. They then rebound, and in the rebound may sustain that concussion of the spine which they escape in the first shock. Those, on the other hand, who are sitting with their backs to the engine, being carried backward, when the momentum of the carriage is suddenly arrested, are struck at once, and, if traveling rapidly, are jerked violently against the backs of their seats, and thus suffer, in the first instance and by the first shock, from concussion of the spine. The force with which they strike the partition between the compartments with their shoulders or loins is greatly augmented by their opposite fellow travelers being thrown upon them. In the oscillation and to and fro movements to which the carriage is subjected, they are apt to be thrown forward, and, rebounding, to be struck again about the posterior part of the body. They are more helpless than those who are facing the engine, who frequently have time to stretch out their hands in order to save themselves, or to clutch hold of the sides of the carriage when in the act of being thrown forward. When a carriage is run into from behind, the reverse of this takes place, and the carriage is driven, as it were, against those passengers who have got their backs turned towards the hind part of the train. In the violent oscillations that take place, a passenger is thrown backward and forward by a kind of shuttlecock action, and frequently, coming in contact with others on the opposite side, may become seriously injured, especially by contusions about the head. The oscillations to which the body is subjected in these accidents are chiefly felt in those parts of the vertebral column that admit of most movement, viz., at the junction of the head and neck, of the neck and shoulders, and of the trunk and pelvis. Hence it is that the spine so frequently becomes strained and injured in these regions by railway injuries." Lecture 5, pp. 121, 122.

The admission of the aforesaid extracts from the writings of Dr. Erichsen constitutes the chief error that has been assigned. We pacitated the person injured from earning compensation which he otherwise would have received. Knapp v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 41.

They are competent evidence to show the duration of the earning capacity and ability to labor of the person injured. Greer v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 94 Ky. 169.

And will be admitted as an aid in determining the amount of the verdict, where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the injuries sustained are permanent. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Garner, 91 Ga. 27; Blair v. Madison County, 81 Iowa, 313.

Or where there was some evidence tending to show that the injuries received were of a permanent character. Northeastern R. Co. v. Chandler, 84 Ga. 37; McDonald v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Iowa, 124, 96 Am. Dec. 114.

So, tables of mortality containing by common consent the most accurate estimate of the probable duration of human life under given conditions when the subject is in reasonably good health may be read in evidence in an action for damages for personal injuries, though it is shown that the plaintiff's condition and health were below the average, and that in fact he was not an insurable risk. Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Griffith, 63 Ark. 491.

And standard life tables in common use in this country are admissible in such an action, for the purpose of showing the probable duration of life of the person injured, though he was engaged in extra hazardous and dangerous undertakings. Coates v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 62 Iowa, 486. 40 L. R. A.

And though when injured he was engaged in a more hazardous employment than persons with reference to whom the tables were compiled, that being merely a circumstance to be considered by the jury as tending to show that his expectancy of life was less than the tables indicate for one of his age. Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Wilmer, 97 Ala. 165.

And tables proved to have been used by life insurance companies, and the testimony of an insurance agent touching such tables, are admissible in evidence to show the probabilities of the duration of life in such an action, though the agent does not claim to be an expert as to the tables. Central R. Co. v. Richards, 62 Ga. 306.

But standard life tables in evidence in an action for a personal injury are to be taken subject to the peculiar conditions surrounding the person injured, such as the existence of diseases tending to shorten life, the particular member of his body of the use of which he is deprived, and the extent to which he is disabled from supporting himself. Greer v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 94 Ky. 169.

And they are not admissible in evidence to show the expectancy of life of a person suing for a permanent injury until the proper foundation has been laid by proving his age or introducing evidence from which his age may be inferred or approximated. Atlanta Consol. Street R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 93 Ga. 6; Macon, D. & S. R. Co. v. Moore, 99 Ga. 229.

And they are not proper evidence and instructions as to their use are inappropriate unless there think that the evidence in question was clearly incompetent when judged by common-law rules of evidence. The authorities, both English and American, are practically unanimous in holding that medical books, even if they are regarded as authoritative, cannot be read to the jury as independent evidence of the opinions and theories therein expressed or advocated. One objection to such testimony is that it is not delivered under oath; a second objection is that the opposite party is thereby deprived of the benefit of a cross-examination; and a third, and perhaps a more important, reason for rejecting such testimony, is that the science of medicine is not an exact science. There are different schools of medicine, the members of which entertain widely different views, and it frequently happens that medical practitioners belonging to the same school will disagree as to the cause of a particular disease, or as to the nature of an ailment with which a patient is afflicted, even if they do not differ as to the mode of treatment. Besides, medical theories, unlike the truths of exact science, are subject to frequent modification and change, even if they are not altogether abandoned. For these reasons it is very generally held that when, in a judicial proceeding, it becomes necessary to invoke the aid of medical experts, it is safer to rely on the testimony of competent witnesses, who are produced, sworn, and subjected to a cross-examination, than to permit medical books or pamphlets to be read to the jury. Collier v. Simpson, 5 Car. & P. 73; Ashworth v. Kittridge, 12 Cush. 193, 59 Am. Dec. 178; Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 42, 56, 57; Stute v. O'Brien, 7 R. I. 336, 338; People v. Hall, 48 Mich. 482, 490, 42 Am. Rep. 477; Gallagher v. Market Street R. Co. 67 Cal. 13, 56 Am. Rep. 713; Epps v. Stute, 102 Ind. 539, 549, 550; Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray, 337; Melvin v. Easley, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 386, 62 Am.

Dec. 171; Payson v. Everett, 12 Minn. 217 (Gil. 137); Fowler v. Lewis, 25 Tex. Supp. 380; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Jones (Tex.), 14 S. W. 309, 810; Lawson, Ev. pp. 169-171, and cases cited.

In the following cases, to wit, Bowman v. Woods, 1 G. Greene, 441; Stoudenmeier v. Williamson, 29 Ala. 558, 566, 567, and Merkle v. State, 37 Ala. 139, 141, certain medical works of standard authority were received in evidence, and were held to be admissible. But, so far as we have been able to ascertain, these cases are at variance with the well-settled rule which prevails elsewhere. In this connection it should be observed that while the prevailing rule is, as above stated, that medical books cannot be read as independent evidence of the opinions which they contain, yet, under some circumstances, such books may be referred to. For example, a physician is sometimes allowed, while testifying, to fortify an opinion which he may have expressed, by referring to medical works of standard authority on which his opinion is in part predicated; and, when a medical expert has thus indicated the source of his opinion, the books themselves may be offered subsequently, for the purpose of showing that they do not support the opinion expressed, or that they contradict it. Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 619; Pinney v. Cahill, 48 Mich. 584. In some states, also, the practice prevails of permitting counsel, while addressing the jury, to read extracts from law books and from scientific works as a part of their argument. This latter practice is approved in some jurisdictions, and strongly condemned in others, while in some jurisdictions the practice in this respect is regarded as a matter which rests entirely in the sound discretion of the trial judge. Reg. v. Courvoisier, 9 Car. & P. 362; State v. Hoyt, 46 Conn. 330; Lawson, Ev. pp. 178, 179. All the authorities agree, be some evidence as to the value of such person's services or of his capacity to earn money. Macon, D. & S. R. Co. v. Moore, 99 Ga. 229.

Nor are mortality tables showing the expectancy of life of the person killed admissible in evidence in an action brought by such person's father for the killing, as it would be the expectation of life of the one who would soonest die in the ordinary course of nature, which should be made the basis of an award of damages. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crudup, 68 Miss. 291.

And the mortality tables found in Howell's Ann. Stat. p. 1084, are not admissible in evidence in an action to recover for the death of a person caused by alleged negligence, where such person was but five years of age, and the table gives no expectancy of life for any age under ten years. Rajnowski v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 74 Mich. 20.

But the Carlisle life tables are not rendered inadmissible in evidence in an action for a personal injury, for the purpose of showing the expectancy of life of the person injured, by the fact that such person was an infant at the time, and nothing could be recovered for the services of such person until such time as he would have arrived at his majority. Walters v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 71.

3. In other cases generally.

The Northampton tables are admissible as evidence tending to show the probable duration of the life of the plaintiff in an action on a contract to support her during life. Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 508.

And the damages to which a policy holder is entitled as against an insurance company, for becoming insolvent and failing to keep on hand funds required by law and to keep the policy in life, is the value of the policy, and in ascertaining it resort may be had to tables used in life insurance showing the average expectancy of life. People v. Security Life Ins. & Annuity Co. 78 N. Y. 114, 34 Am. Rep. 522; McDonnell v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. 85 Ala. 401.

So, the standard and recognized mortality or life tables, and the evidence of experts as to computations based thereon, are competent, in connection with other evidence, to show the expectancy of life and the present value of a life estate or annuity, in estimating damages to a remainderman, resulting from a change of grade of a street, whether before a jury or in an action in equity. Joliet v. Blower, 155 Ill. 418.

Courts, as matter of law, have adopted the American Life Annuity tables, and by consulting them they determine the present value of life estates when the person upon whose life the estate depends is of ordinary health and vigor for one of that age, subject, however, to be varied on account of unusual vigor or frailty which may either lengthen or shorten the probable duration of the life estate. Alexander v. Bradley, 3 Bush, 667.

And Wigglesworth's tables for estimating life estates may be used by the jury in computing damages under proper instructions as to such use, in an action for a breach of covenants of seisin, where the plaintiff proves an outstanding life estate as we believe, that standard works which deal with the exact sciences, including herein interest and annuity tables, and tables compiled from well-established data showing the average duration of human life, are receivable in evidence to establish the facts to which they relate. Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 598; Mills v. Catlin, 22 Vt. 98; Munshower v. State, 55 Md. 11, 39 Am. Rep. 414; Green v. Cornwall, 1 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 11.

We can perceive no reason why the truths of exact science to which all intelligent persons assent, and well-established historical facts, should not be proved by the writings of competent authors, and all courts agree that they may be so proved. But beyond this the rule does not extend of allowing a contested issue of fact to be established by the unsworn declarations of third parties.

It is contended, however, that in the state of Iowa the practice is approved of permitting medical books to be read to the jury as independent evidence of the opinions therein contained, and that the practice in that respect which prevails in the state courts of Iowa is obligatory upon the Federal courts sitting in that state. Reference is also made to a recent statute of the state of Iowa which reads as follows: "Historical works, books of science or art, and published maps or charts, when made by persons indifferent between the parties, are presumptive evidence of facts of general notoriety or interest." McClain's Code (Iowa) § 4903.

We concede it to be the law that the Federal courts sitting within a state must enforce the provisions of a local statute prescribing rules of evidence, in the trial of civil cases at common law, unless the local statute is in conflict with some law of the United States regulating the same subject. M'Niel v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. 84, 88, 89, 9 L. ed. 1009, 1011;

Wright v. Bales, 2 Black, 535, 17 L. ed. 264; Potter v. Third Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 163, 165, 26 L. ed. 111, 112; United States v. Reid, 12 How. 361, 13 L. ed. 1023. But the decisions of the courts of a state construing common-law rules of evidence are not obligatory on the Federal courts. Such decisions are merely persuasive authority, and, while the Federal courts will follow them when the question at issue is balanced with doubt, yet they will not be governed by such decisions when they appear to be at variance with the great weight of authority. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 372, 37 L. ed. 772, 775; Ryan v. Staples, 40 U. S. App. 427, 76 Fed. Rep. 721, 727, 23 C. C. A. 541; Northwestern P. R. Co. v. Hogan, 27 U. S. App. 184, 63 Fed. Rep. 102, 11 C. C. A. 51. The decision above referred to in Bowman v. Woods, 1 G. Greene, 441, was a decision construing the common law, and, for the reasons last stated, we do not feel compelled to follow it.

With reference to the statute of Iowa, above quoted, it is only necessary to say that, by its express provisions, "books of science or art" are only made "presumptive evidence of facts of general notoriety or interest;" and we are unable to find that it has ever been held that the provision in question was intended to cover medical works of all kinds, and to make them independent evidence of whatever medical opinions or theories are therein expressed or formulated. In Broadhead v. Wiltse, 35 Iowa, 429, the statute in question was referred to, but it was simply held that the statute was not intended to render inadmissible proof which before was admissible. In Quackenbush v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 458, 462, a passage appears to have been read from a medical work on diseases of the throat and nose, which passage was objected to on the such breach, and gives evidence as to the age and general state of health of the tenant for life, and the annual value of the premises. Mills v. Catlin, 22 Vt. 98.

So, judicial notice of the existence and contents of the American tables of mortality may be taken in estimating the value of a wife's inchoate right of dower. Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232, 49 Am. Rep. 813.

And the mortality tables published in Michigan Compiled Laws are unaffected by any consideration as to the person's present condition of life, but are made up by averaging lives by the actual mortality of the strong and sick alike, and may be used in calculating the probabilities of life for the purpose of computing an estate of a doweress. Brown v. Bronson, 35 Mich. 415.

And in Wager v. Schuyler, 1 Wend. 553, an approved table of life annuities was adopted in an action for the breach of a covenant of quiet enjoyment, on a recovery by a tenant in dower, for the purpose of measuring the damages, which are the present value of an annuity equal to the interest on one third of the consideration money received by the defendant, for the time that the tenant in dower has a probable expectation of life.

So, standard tables showing mortality rates and expectancies of human lives at certain ages and under certain conditions, and probable longevity, as well as the present worth of annuities, etc., may be used as evidence under proper instructions in the trial of causes with relation to annuities and estates depending upon future contingencies. Shover v. Myrick, 4 Ind. App. 7.

But the Carlisle tables are not authoritative as to the value of a husband's life interest as tenant by the curtesy, where the disproportion of his interest to the whole, reckoned under such tables, is manifest. Shippen's Appeal, 80 Pa. 391.

In Steinbrunner v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. 146 Pa. 504, supra, I. b. 2, which was a personal injury case, Shippen's Appeal, 80 Pa. 391, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that that was a contest between a life tenant and a remainderman, in which the Carlisle tables would not serve as an authoritative guide.

So the Carlisle tables of expectancy are admissible in evidence in an action by a married woman and children against a liquor seller, under the civil damage act, to aid in estimating damages, where the husband to whom liquor was sold is shown to have been a strong robust man. Roose v. Perkins, 9 Neb. 304, 31 Am. Rep. 409.

And the jury in such an action has a right to consult the annuity tables in determining the probable duration of the joint lives of the plaintiff and her husband. Hall v. Germain, 37 N. Y. S. R. 320.

In Rafferty v. Buckman, 46 Iowa, 195, however, it was said that it may well be doubted whether the Carlisle tables of mortality are admissible in evidence in an action under the civil damage act, where the habits of the person to whom liquor was sold were such that he did not have the ordinary prospect of life; but the case turned upon the ground that it was "too indefinite;" but the court ruled that the objection, on the ground stated, was not well taken. In another Iowa case (Peck v. Hutchinson, 58 Iowa, 820), a medical work which was read in evidence was objected to, for the reason that it was an old edition, and therefore incompetent. The court ruled that, if an error was committed in reading passages from the book in question, it was not prejudicial to the complaining party, and therefore declined to reverse the judgment. On the other hand, § 1936 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California (3 Deering's Anno. Codes and Statutes), the statute similar to the one now under consideration, received a definite construction by the supreme court of California in the case of Gallagher v. Market Street R. Co. 67 Cal. 13, 56 Am. Rep. 713, and it was there held that the statute does not authorize standard medical works to be read in evidence for the purpose of establishing the probable effects of a physical injury. It was further held that the expression "facts of general notoriety or interest" means "historical facts, facts of the exact sciences, and literature or art," all of which, when relevant to a case in hand, may be proved by the production of books of standard authority, rather than by the mouths of living witnesses. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the authorities which have been invoked by the defendant in error are insufficient to establish such a settled construction of the Iowa statute as would justify a ruling that the evidence complained of in the case at bar was properly admitted under the provisions of that statute, the evidence being, in our judgment, clearly inadmissible under the common law.

Only one medical expert who testified at the trial pronounced the book of Dr. Erichsen, from which the foregoing excerpts were taken, to be a standard work, and so recognized by the medical profession. The same witness admitted, however, that some of the greatest physicians and surgeons in the world had disputed the theories of Dr. Erichsen, as contained in the book in question. Five other medical experts who were sworn testified, in substance, that the monograph written by Dr. Erichsen was not regarded by the profession as a modern or standard work, and some of them stated that it was not regarded as an authority on the subject of which it treats. We think that a work of that kind, concerning the merits of which there is such a wide difference of opinion among members of the medical profession, should not be accepted in a court of justice as competent evidence to establish the fact that a certain ailment from which the plaintiff below appeared to be suffering was the result of a nervous shock sustained some years previously in a railway collision. The case disclosed no apparent necessity for resorting to testimony of such a doubtful and uncertain character. The fact alleged is susceptible of proof by the opinions of competent living physicians, who may be subjected to a careful cross-examination, and compelled to state in the presence of the jury, in an intelligible way, the reasons upon which their opinions are founded; and we think that the defendants were entitled to insist that it should be so established.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

Rehearing denied.

point that the objection was not raised in the court below.

4. Conclusiveness and effect.

Standard life and annuity tables are admissible in evidence for personal injuries, for the purpose of assisting the jury in making an estimate of damages, but the jury is not to be absolutely controlled by them. Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545, 30 L. ed. 257; Joliet v. Blower, 155 Ill. 418.

They are admissible as furnishing data on which the jury may act, and as a circumstance to be weighed by them, but they are not conclusive. Central R. Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 737, 58 Am. Rep. 463; Scheffler v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 32 Minn. 518; Friend v. Ingersoll, 39 Neb. 717.

Jurors are permitted, but not required, to make use of them. Savannah, A. & M. R. Co. v. McLeod, 94 Ga. 530.

The Carlisle or other tables of expectancy are not necessary evidence for the purpose of estimating the expectation of life in an action for a personal injury. The jury may make their estimation from the age, health, habits, and physical condition of the person at the time of his death. Deisen v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 43 Minn. 454; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hughes, 55 Kan. 492.

But mortality tables are competent evidence on the question of damages sustained by a railway employee by the company's negligence, to be weighed with other evidence, such as his physical condition, general health, vocation, habits, and the like. Mary Lee Coal & R. Co. v. Chambliss, 97 Ala. 171; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hughes, 55 Kan. 492.

Mortality tables are binding, however, as to the expectancy of life, in an action involving that question, in the absence of any other evidence from which the jury can intelligently judge. Nelson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 104 Mich. 582.

c. The almanac.

The almanac is regarded and held as a part of the law of the land, and is governed by the ordinary rule applicable to all general laws, and need not be specially pleaded. Finney v. Callendar, 8 Minn. 41; Tutton v. Darke, 5 Hurlst. & N. 647, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 271, 6 Jur. N. S. 983, 2 L. T. N. S. 561.

Thus, an almanac for the year in question is admissible in evidence to prove at what hour the moon rose on a designated night in such a year, where that question is material to the issue. Munshower v. State, 55 Md. 11, 39 Am. Rep. 414.

And an almanac may be admitted in evidence upon a trial for burglary, for the purpose of showing when the sun set on the day on which the crime was committed, not strictly as evidence, but to refresh the memory of the court and jury, the matter being one of which the court will take judicial notice. State v. Morris, 47 Conn. 179.

So, the court will take judicial notice on what day a certain feast occurs, and the almanac is legal evidence of it. Brough v. Perkins, 6 Mod. 81.

And courts will take judicial notice of the coincidence of the days of the month with those of the week as shown by the almanac. Sprowl v. Lawrence, 33 Ala. 674; Allman v. Owen, 31 Ala. 167.

But dates and other matters of which judicial notice is taken need not be put in evidence, the almanac in such case being used as the statutes, not strictly as evidence, but for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the court and jury. Wilson v. Van Leer, 127 Pa. 372.

(Second Circuit.)

WESTERN ASSURANCE COMPANY OF TORONTO, Pf. in Err.,

J. H. MOHLMAN COMPANY.

(51 U. S. App. 577; 83 Fed. Rep. 811.)

1. A stipulation that in case of the fall of the building all insurance by this policy shall immediately cease is a condition subsequent, and not an exception, and the burden of showing that it became operative before loss is upon the insurer,—especially where it is not in the descriptive part of the policy, but is among the proviso; and it is immaterial that the clause "except as hereinafter provided" is inserted in the descriptive part of the policy.
2. Insurance of property "while contained in brick building" does not cast upon the insured the burden of showing the integrity of the building at the time of the fire, if a clause is inserted in the policy to cover the case of its fall.
3. The burden of showing that the building did not fall before the fire is not thrown upon the insured by his allegation that the fire did not happen by reason of any of the excepted clauses, where liability for loss following the fall of the building is removed by a condition subsequent in the policy.
4. Refusal to charge the jury that the burden of showing that the loss was caused by fire was upon the one seeking to recover under a fire insurance policy is not error where that fact was fully proved, with no question as to the accuracy of the proof.
5. Requested instructions which have been fully covered by the general charge need not be given.
6. Expert witnesses may, in support of

And refusal to permit counsel to refer to an almanac to show in support of his argument against the truth of the testimony of a witness that a certain date fell upon Sunday is error, as dates do not require to be proved, but judicial notice will be taken of them without evidence. Wilson v. Van Leer, 127 Pa. 372.

So, the court in a criminal prosecution will take judicial notice of the time the sun rose on the morning of the alleged offense, if material, and that fact need not be proved, but the admission in evidence of an almanac to establish it is not error. People v. Chee Kee, 61 Cal. 404.

And while an almanac is not competent evidence to prove when the moon rose on any particular day, its admission is not prejudicial error, as judicial notice will be taken of the time when the moon rises and sets on the several days of the year, as well as of the succession of the seasons, the difference of time in different longitudes, and the constant and invariable course of nature. Case v. Perrew, 46 Hun. 57.

And while it may be that the time at which the moon rose on the night in question, if material in an action for damages, was a matter of judicial knowledge, and that the presiding judge informing himself by reference to standard almanacs should have charged the jury of that fact, the introduction of the almanac before the jury cannot be deemed injurious to the defendant, since the presumption is that the time of the rise of the moon was correctly stated therein and that the jury found accordingly. Mobile & B. R. Co. v. Ladd, 92 Ala. 237.

So, reading from an almanac in an argument before the jury is not subject to objection as having their professional opinions, read in evidence statistics of mechanical experiments and tabulations of the results thereof, where the scientific work containing them is concededly recognized as a standard authority by the profession, and when such statistics and tabulations are generally relied upon by experts in the particular field of the mechanic arts with which such statistics and tabulations are concerned.

7. Lapse of time after the fall of a building before persons who testify as experts as to whether it fell before or after a fire saw it will not wholly exclude their opinions if timbers upon the condition of which the opinions were largely formed were still lying in the ruins when their inspection was made.

8. Answers should not be permitted to hypothetical questions from which an element "probably the most important" has been left out.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

Before Peckham, Circuit Justice, and Lacombe and Shipman, Circuit Judges.

Statement by Lacombe, Circuit Judge:

This case comes here on a writ of error to review a judgment of the circuit court, southern district of New York, in favor of defendant in error, who was plaintiff below. The action was brought to recover loss under a policy of fire insurance issued by the plaintiff in error, who was defendant below. The relevant parts of the policy are as follows:

been brought forward at so late a stage of the case as to deprive the opposing party of the benefit of an argument, for, like any other argument or illustration, it may be made by counsel at the end of the case. Wilson v. Van Leer, 127 Pa. 372.

In Tutton v. Darke, 5 Hurlst. & N. 647, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 271, 6 Jur. N. S. 983, 2 L. T. N. S. 381, however, it was held that an almanac is not evidence of the time the sun rises on a particular day.

And while the court will take judicial notice of the dates in the calendar, it will not of the hours; and the fact that a designated hour in a certain month would be after sunset, if material, must be proved. Collier v. Nokes, 2 Car. & K. 1012.

A party objecting to the admission in evidence of an almanac to show the time the sun rose on a particular day must specify the ground of his objection. People v. Chee Kee, 61 Cal. 404.

II. *Inexact sciences.*a. General rule as to admissibility.

The weight of current authority is decidedly against the admission of scientific books in evidence before a jury, although in some of the states they are admissible. Bloomington v. Shrook, 110 Ill. 219, 51 Am. Rep. 679, dictum.

And the majority of the cases hold that scientific books are inadmissible as evidence in chief. Forest City Ins. Co. v. Morgan, 22 Ill. App. 198; Epps v. State, 102 Ind. 539; State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1; Whiton v. Narragansett P. & M. Ins. Co. 109 Mass. 24; People v. Millard, 53 Mich. 63; Foggett v. Fischer; 23 App. Div. 207; Melvin v. Easley, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 387, 62 Am. Dec. 171.

Though they are standard works on the subject to which they relate. Epps v. State, 102 Ind. 539.

This company shall not be liable

Scientific books are not evidence of any facts stated in them, though they are admissible for the purpose of showing, when material, the state of invention, the course of composition, the meaning of words, and the theories or opinions which prevailed in the age in which they were written. State v. Brown, 4 R. I. 523, 70 Am. Dec. 163.

And a statement by the judge that a scientific book which had been read by counsel to the jury was entitled to as much authority as a witness who had been examined as an expert on the question involved is a clear violation of 1 N. C. Rev. Stat. chap. 31, § 136, forbidding the judge to express an opinion on the facts of the case. Melvin v. Easley, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 387, 62 Am. Dec. 171.

So, the statements of a medical book are not admissible in evidence as authority on medical subjects. People v. Millard, 53 Mich. 63; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328; *State v. And a witness cannot be allowed to read from his own published works to support his own testimony, any more than he can be allowed to read from any other author, even if approved and accepted as authority. Mix v. Staples, 44 N. Y. S. R. 399.

And a book on medical jurisprudence was not admissible in evidence in a case in which the question of the existence of paralysis caused by hysteria was at issue, to show that the symptoms testified to by one of the witnesses were common in hysteria, and that this was one of the existing causes of paralysis. Huffman v. Click, 77 N. C. 55.

Nor are extracts from Copeland's Medical Dictionary, referring to paralysis, admissible as primary evidence. Tucker v. Donald, 60 Miss. 460, 45 Am. Rep. 416.

for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war, or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority, or by theft, or by neglect of the insured to use all reasonable means to save and preserve the property at and after a fire, or when the property is endangered by fire in neighboring premises, or (unless fire ensues, and, in that event, for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind, or lightning; but liability for direct damage by lightning may be assumed by specific agreement hereon. If a building, or any part thereof, fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease. This company shall not be liable for loss to accounts, bills, currency," etc.

By a rider attached to the policy on or about April 22, 1895, the insurance was transferred to cover similar described property while contained in brick building Nos. 98-40 North Moore street and 156 Franklin street. On April 30, 1895, the property insured was destroyed by fire. At or about the time of the fire the building fell, and the issue of fact in the case was whether the fall preceded the fire, or was itself the result of the fire. Upon this issue the testimony was conflicting, and the verdict of the jury was adverse to the insurance company. The questions presented by the writ of error are solely legal ones, consisting of alleged errors in the charge of the court as given to the jury, in the court's refusals to charge as requested, and in its admission of and refusal to admit evidence.

Messrs. Michael H. Cardosa and Edgar J. Nathan, for plaintiff in error:

The trial court erred in deciding and charging the jury that the burden of proof rested upon the plaintiff in error (the defendant below) to show by a preponderance of evidence that the fire which damaged the property followed the fall of the building in which the property was contained.

The complaint alleges that "the said fire did not happen by the action or procurement of the plaintiff or of any of its officers, agents, or servants, or by reason of any of the causes excepted by the terms of the said policy."

And the answer denied any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to this allegation of the complaint.

This condition of the pleadings left with the plaintiff the duty, not alone imposed by law, but self-imposed under the allegations of its complaint, of negating by evidence the exceptions contained in the contract of insurance.

Whillatch v. Fidelity & C. Co. 149 N. Y. 45. The court clearly erred in refusing to charge the jury that "the burden upon the whole case is upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the damage sustained was caused by fire, for this is the only risk it was insured against under the policy."

Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Seifke, 144 N. Y. 354; Powers v. Russell, 13 Pick. 69.

The court clearly erred in refusing to charge the jury that, "even though the jury find that the fire in the building preceded the fall they cannot award the plaintiff any amount for loss following the fall, unless they find that the fall was the result of fire."

Beakes v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 143 N. Y. 402, 26 L. R. A. 267; Pelican Ins. Co. v. Troy Co-operative Asso. 77 Tex. 225.

The court erred in permitting the witness Bowman to read in evidence extracts from scientific books and government reports.

Scientific books cannot be read in evidence.

1. The reasons for the rule are that such cannot be asked to name the circumstances of a case they have read where violence accompanied hysterical mania, as such an examination, if allowed, would be in effect the introduction of the medical works containing such case in evidence. People v. Golden, 70 Cal. 328.

And refusal to permit a witness who had given his opinion as to the sanity of another to answer the question whether he had read an article in a journal on insanity in which designated statements were made, and whether the same accords and agrees with his knowledge and experience on the subject, is not an abuse of discretion, as the answer would have been but a reiteration in another form of the opinion he had expressed already. State v. Winter, 72 Iowa, 627.

So, the fact that an expert witness in a prosecution for homicide read passages in a work on medical jurisprudence to which on cross-examination he was referred, and with relation to which he answered questions, does not render the book itself admissible in evidence. State v. O'Brien, 7 R. I. 336.

Nor is it rendered admissible by the fact that counsel for the accused in a prosecution for homicide ceased to cross-examine a medical witness upon the ground that he might afterwards quote it against him. State v. O'Brien, 7 R. I. 336.

Iowa Rev. Stat. § 8996, providing that historical works, books of science or art, etc., when made by persons indifferent between the parties, are presumptive evidence of facts of general notoriety or interest, does not make inadmissible any evidence which before was admissible; and whether there is a difference among medical or surgical authorities as to the mode of treatment or proper course to be pursued in a designated case may be shown by the evidence of competent physicians or surgeons, and they are 40 L. R. A.

also competent to testify as to who are standard authors and as to what treatment they prescribe. Brodhead v. Wiltse, 36 Iowa, 429.

But evidence of a medical expert as to whether delusions or transitory mania is a condition recognized by medical authorities, offered for the purpose of proving that the theory in question is taught by the authorities, is not admissible, as the works themselves would be the only competent evidence of what they teach; but perhaps it would be admissible on cross-examination to test the accuracy of his knowledge. State v. Winter, 72 Iowa, 627.

And extracts from a book which is a standard scientific authority on the subject treated therein, with relation to appliances for stopping trains and the devices required therefor, are not admissible in evidence on the question of negligence in stopping a train, where the negligence was not claimed to be in the equipment of the train, and the extract did not give the size of the train, the pressure applied to the brakes, or the character of the grade, and it did not appear what the conditions were under which the trains were stopped; and where such evidence is admitted remarks of the court in disparagement of its value cannot be deemed to have been prejudicial. Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106.

So, facts of general notoriety and interest, which, under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1936, may be proved by books of science or art, made by persons indifferent between the parties, refer to facts of a public nature not existing in the memory of man, as contradistinguished from facts of a private nature existing within the knowledge of living men, and as to which they may be examined as witnesses. Gallagher v. Market Street R. Co. 67 Cal. 13, 56 Am. Rep. 713.

An objection that books offered to be read in evidence is hearsay, secondary, wanting in the sanctity of an oath, and the writer is not present to be subjected to the truth test of cross-examination.

2. There are no authorities adverse to the position for which we here contend.

Messrs. John S. Sheppard, Jr., and Treadwell Cleveland, and Evarts, Choate, & Braman, for defendant in error: The court below correctly held, at the trial of this case, that the burden of proof upon the question whether the building fell as a result of fire, or the fire preceded the fall, was upon the defendant.

evidence are immaterial only, however, and not that they are incompetent or wholly inadmissible, is not sufficient to raise the question of their admissibility on appeal. Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 614.

And an objection that a standard medical work produced by an expert witness, which is offered in evidence after he has given evidence to the same effect as the statements in such book thus offered, and that the question whether he knew what records of the medical profession and medical authorities taught upon the subject were immaterial, is insufficient to present any question on appeal. State v. Sexton, 10 S. D. 127.

But though statements of medical books are inadmissible in evidence, their admission is not a ground for reversal on appeal, where both parties introduced and had the benefit of such evidence, and the question was not raised in the trial court by proper and specific objections. Kreuziger v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 73 Wis. 158.

And a verdict in a prosecution for rape will not be vitiated by the fact that certain books on the subject of rape which had been inadvertently left on the table were consulted by the jury during their deliberations, though it was an irregularity, in the absence of evidence as to their contents or that they influenced the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. People v. Draper, 1 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 139.

But the jury in an action in which passages from a scientific work have been read as evidence cannot be permitted to take the book with them into the jury room when they retire for deliberation, where the portions read have not been marked. State v. Gillick, 10 Iowa, 98.

b. Reasons for the rule.

The reasons for the non-admissibility of scientific books in evidence are, first, that experiment and discovery are so constantly changing the theories 40 L. R. A.

Jones v. Aizen, 1 Ld. Raym. 119; Elliott v. Blake, 1 Lev. 88; Hotham v. East India Co. 1 T. R. 638; Cage v. Acton, 1 Ld. Raym. 515; Gray v. Gardner, 17 Mass. 188; Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Orient Mut. Ins. Co. 108 N. Y. 56.

Under similar clauses in the standard fire insurance policy, the courts of various jurisdictions have held that the burden of proof was on the defendant who sets up one of these defenses under the clauses exempting the company from liability.

Clark v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 9 Gray, 148; Portsmouth Ins. Co. v. Reynolds, 82 Gratt. 613; Young v. Newark F. Ins. Co. 59 Conn. 41; Bittinger v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 24 Fed. Rep. 549; Russell v. Fidelity F. Ins. Co. 84 Iowa, 93; Oshkosh Pkg. & Provision Co. v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 200.

This same question has arisen many times where a defense under one of the clauses limiting liability is set up to an action on a life insurance policy, and the decisions have been uniform in placing the burden of proof on the defendant insurance companies.

on scientific subjects that the books of last year may contain something which this year everybody rejects as absurd. Secondly, the book may be a compilation of a compilation, and be thus hearsay evidence of the most extreme kind; and thirdly, that the authors do not write under oath, and cannot be cross-examined as to the reasons and grounds for their opinions. Johnston v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 95 Ga. 685.

Medicine is not to be considered as an exact science, but rather as an inductive science, based on data subject to change from year to year, and medical books are therefore inadmissible as evidence of the opinions contained in them. Gallagher v. Market Street R. Co. 67 Cal. 13, 56 Am. Rep. 713.

And extracts from a medical work, however high its character, are no more than written statements of the opinion of the author. Tucker v. Donald, 60 Miss. 460, 45 Am. Rep. 416.

They are no more than hearsay. People v. Millard, 53 Mich. 63; Reg. v. Taylor, 13 Cox. C. C. 77.

And they lack the sanction of an oath, and are not admissible in evidence for that reason. State v. O'Brien, 7 R. I. 386; State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1; Boehringer v. A. B. Richards Medicine Co. 9 Tex. Civ. App. 284.

They are not the statement of any witness under oath, or of any documentary evidence permitted or required by law to be received as such, but simply the theory of a writer concerning medical science. Boehringer v. A. B. Richards Medicine Co. 9 Tex. Civ. App. 284.

So, the benefit of cross-examination would be lost by allowing the admission of such evidence. Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 42; State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1.

Scientific or expert testimony must be given by living witnesses who can be cross-examined concerning their means of knowledge, and can explain in language open to general comprehension what is necessary for the jury to know, and resort cannot

The contention on the part of the defendant that the policy has been avoided by the fall of the building prior to the fire, so far as the question of the burden of proof is concerned, raises exactly the same issue as the defense that the contract of insurance had been terminated by the parties before the loss in accordance with some clause in the policy. In such a case there can be little or no doubt that the burden would be on the insurance company to prove such termination.

c. The contrary rule.

City Hall Rec. 11, supra, IV., were distinguished upon the ground that they were cases at nisi prius, and passed by with little examination. And Atty. Gen. v. Cast Plate Glass Co. 1 Anstr. 39, infra, IV., was distinguished upon the ground that the question there was on the proper construction of a word in a statute, and the court held that it was a question of law with which the jury had nothing to do, and hence it was improper to read books to the jury to explain the term used.

In UNION P. R. Co. v. YATES, however, in construing McLean's (Iowa) Code, § 4903, making books of science or art, etc., made by indifferent persons, presumptive evidence of facts of general notoriety or interest, the court refused to follow Bowman v. Woods, 1 G. Greene, 441, upon the ground that that was a decision construing the common law.

And in State v. West (Del.) Houst. Crim. Rep. 371, it was held that scientific works on medical jurisprudence, although admissible and allowed to be read in a criminal prosecution before the court and jury, have not the weight of legal authorities except so far as the views expressed in them on the subject in question have been recognized and sustained by judicial ruling and decision.

d. Opinions founded on books.

Though scientific and medical books are not deemed admissible in evidence, expert witnesses may give their opinions and the grounds therefor, though they may in some degree be founded on books as a part of their general knowledge. Melvin v. Easley, 48 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 387, 62 Am. Dec. 171; Carter v. State, 2 Ind. 617; Collier v. Simpson, 5 Car. & P. 74; State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1.

Lacombe, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial judge charged the jury that the burden of proof rested upon the defendant (the insurance company) to show by a preponderance of evidence that "the fall preceded the fire," and that "this building did not fall as the result of fire." Exceptions to the charge and to refusals to charge the converse of this proposition sufficiently present the question of the correctness of this ruling. It will not be necessary to repeat the text either of the charge or of the requests. The trial judge construed the clause referring to a fall of the building as a proviso or condition subsequent defeating any claim of the insured. If it be such, no one here disputes the proposition that the burden of proving the happening of the subsequent condition would rest upon the insurer. The defendant here, however, contends that the clause is an exception to the general liability assumed by the insurance company, and that, therefore, it was for the insured to show that the loss did not come within the terms of the exception. The general rule is well expressed by Earl, J., in Slocovich v. Orient Mut. Ins. Co. 108 N. Y. 56: "Where there is an insurance against a loss by fire, and it is proved or admitted that the property insured has been destroyed by fire, the loss is brought literally cal authority is substantially repeated, is not thereby rendered objectionable. Tompkins v. West, 56 Conn. 478.

And a scientific witness may refresh his recollection by reference to standard authorities prepared by persons of acknowledged ability. State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1; Huffman v. Click, 77 N. C. 55.

But the opinion which he gives must be his own, independent of those of the author of the work used. State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 1; Huffman v. Click, 77 N. C. 55.

So, the court will take judicial notice of the meaning of a compound word found in a statute, and a standard authority like Webster's Unabridged Dictionary may be used before the court or jury to refresh the memory of the court, and the definition in such dictionary may be given in evidence to the jury. Adler v. State, 55 Ala. 16.

And a witness may use an engraving, however made, to illustrate his meaning, in an action for malpractice in unskillful surgery; but when offered as a part of a medical book or as the work of some distinguished medical man, it should be excluded, as this would give it undue importance to the jury. Ordway v. Haynes, 50 N. H. 150.

And while no part of the book called "Modern Pocket-Hoyle" can be used as evidence in itself of what constitutes the game of faro, a page of it containing a pictorial representation of faro may be used in a prosecution for dealing and playing the game of faro, as a diagram by which a witness illustrates his testimony. People v. Gosset, 93 Cal. 641.

f. Use to sustain or discredit expert.

Books referred to by a medical expert as furnishing a basis for his opinion cannot be referred to in order to support his testimony. Gallagher v. Market street R. Co. 67 Cal. 13, 56 Am. Rep. 718.

And the contents of medical books cannot be ina convenient way of expressing the fact that the insured under such a policy would not be liable for all losses by fire. This seems clearly indicated by the sentence from 11 N. Y. 518: "Hence, a loss occasioned by invasion, insurrection, riot, and the like, has usually been found excepted in such policies; and although in this, and perhaps in policies generally, the exception in this respect is in terms of losses by fire, the clause would be equally definite and intelligible if those words were omitted in the clause stating the exception."

The academic distinction between an exception and a proviso is thus stated in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, sub titulo, Provisio: "An exception exempts absolutely from the operation of an engagement or an enactment; a proviso defeats their operation conditionally. An exception takes out of an engagement or enactment something which would otherwise be part of the subject-matter of it; a proviso avoids them by way of defeasance or excuse." It may not be always easy to apply this distinction in practice (witness the conflicting decisions supra), but no especial help to the solution of the problem is to be derived from cases holding, as do some of those cited on the brief, that, when the insurance is against "perils of the sea," the burden is upon the insured to show that such perils caused the loss; or that, where insurers engage to be responsible for partial loss only if it amounts to 5 per cent, or the ship be stranded, the insurer must show loss to the specified percentage, or that the ship was stranded; nor that, under bills of lading providing that the carrier should not be liable for loss by fire while in transit, plaintiff, if he seeks to recover for a fire resulting from the carrier's negligence, must show that negligence affirmatively; nor that under a policy insuring against injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means the burden is upon the plaintiff to show from all the evidence that the death was caused by external, violent, and accidental means. Baker v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 12 Gray, 603; Paddock v. Commercial Ins. Co. 104 Mass. 521; Union Ins. Co. v. Shaw, 2 Dill. 14; The Neptune, 6 Blatchf. 193; Whitworth v. Erie R. Co. 87 N. Y. 413; Kaiser v. Latimer, 9 App. Div. 87; Claffin v. Meyer, 75 N. Y. 260, 31 Am. Rep. 467; Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 46 N. Y. 271, 7 Am. Rep. 327; Travellers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. ed. 308.

A pertinent case cited on the brief of plaintiff in error is Sohier v. Norwich F. Ins. Co. 11 Allen, 336. The policy in that case insured Sohier, in the language of the opinion, "against loss or damage by fire, to the amount of $2,500 on his brick and slated building known as the National Theatre, situate on Portland street, Boston, Mass. This policy not to cover any loss or damage by fire which may originate in the theatre proper."

Some provisos against liability for loss by fire which happens by invasion, riot, and the bases his opinion upon medical treatises read by him, to test his knowledge, great care should be taken by the court to confine it within reasonable limits, and see that the quotations read to the witnesses are so fairly selected as to present the author's views on the subject of the examination. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Ellis, 89 Ill. 516.

It is not competent to ask an expert witness upon cross-examination whether he is acquainted with a certain scientific work, and upon his answering in the affirmative and that it is a standard authority, to read at length from the book and inquire of the witness whether he agreed with the author as to the parts read, where the object is not the contradiction of the witness as to something asserted by him, but simply to prove a contrary theory. Bloomington v. Shrook, 110 Ill. 219, 51 Am. Rep. 679.

And a witness who on his direct examination gives certain medical opinions and supports them by the assertion that they conform to the authority of medical works cannot be asked on cross-examination to read statements from medical works, and then asked if he agrees with the authors where the extracts do not contradict his evidence and are evidently intended to sustain the theory of the cross-examining party. Fisher v. Southern P. R. Co. 89 Cal. 399.

So, a medical witness in a prosecution for murder, who states that a certain medical work draws a distinction between an autopsy and an external examination, distinguishing the latter as an examination of the body, cannot be handed the book of such author on cross-examination, and asked to refer to that part of it in which such an examination was so distinguished. Davis v. State, 38 Md. 15.

And refusal to permit medical witnesses to answer questions as to whether certain medical works, naming them, were standard authorities, is not error where no previous mention of them has been made. Fox v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works, 84 Mich. 676.

h. Use of, in argument.

The prevailing rule would seem to be that scientific and medical works cannot be read to the jury by counsel in argument, though they are standard works of established authority.

This is the rule laid down in Ashworth v. Kittridge, 12 Cush. 193, 59 Am. Dec. 178; Washburn v. Cuddihy, 8 Gray, 430; Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 69; Com. v. Sturdivant, 117 Mass. 130, 19 Am. Rep. 401; Huffman v. Clinek, 77 N. C. 55; Burt v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 39 L. R. A. 305; Re Mason, 60 Hun, 46.

Thus counsel for a person accused of crime, who sets up insanity as a defense, has no right in his address to the jury to quote the opinions of medical men as given in their works. Queen v. Crouch, 1 Cox, C. C. 94; Burt v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 39 L. R. A. 305.

And a book considered as authority on railroad injuries, and extracts from such book, cannot be read by counsel in summing up to the jury as part of his argument. Robinson v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (U. S. C. C. N. Y.) 24 Alb. L. J. 357.

And failure to restrain counsel, who in his address to the jury reads and comments on a book of science as evidence in the cause, is not a waiver of the error, as it is the duty of the judge in his instructions to present the case to them properly, and correct any errors into which counsel may have fallen. Melvin v. Easley, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 387, 62 Am. Dec. 171.

Extracts from books containing the opinions or acquisitions of learned or scientific witnesses upon a point in issue, which are inadmissible in evidence, and which are offered during the introduction of testimony by the parties, should not be permitted to be read to the jury at any time. Jones v. Doe, Little Blue River Regular Baptist Church, 1 Smith (Ind.) 47.

But it will be presumed on appeal that medical works read in evidence against objection were read for some legitimate purpose, where the bill of ex-like are in a later part of the policy. The clause in italics is written in the policy, the rest of the parts quoted being printed.

The opinion proceeds (the italics infra being our own): "The first question raised by the bill of exceptions is whether the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show a loss by fire which did not originate in the theatre proper. This depends upon the construction given to the clause, 'this policy not to cover any loss or damage by fire which may originate in the theatre proper.' If that clause can be regarded as a proviso, that is, a stipulation added to the principal contract, to avoid the defendants' promise by way of defeasance or excuse, then it is for the defendants to plead it in defense, and support it by evidence. But if, on the other hand, it is an exception, so that the promise is only to perform what remains after the part excepted is taken away, then the plaintiff must negative the exception to establish a cause of action. It is not always easy to determine to which class, whether of provisos or exceptions, a particular stipulation belongs; and this one is certainly very near the line. But after a careful consideration the court are of opinion that this was an exception to the subject of the contract, that it put the burden of proof on the plaintiff. . . . The qualification of the contract to which the parties agreed is not inserted with any technical formality or precision. But it is found between the statement of what is insured, and the prom- ise to pay in case of loss, in close connection with, and qualification of, the description of the subject-matter of the insurance. The provisos are set forth in a different part of the instrument. It thus seems to be a direct limitation of the risk against which insurance is effected. The difference would only be a formal one, if, instead of the phraseology actually used, the language of the policy had been, 'do insure against loss or damage by fire not originating in the theatre proper.' It would illustrate the operation of the phrase in question, and show its effect as an exception, if we suppose it applied to the building insured. If the clause in the policy had been, 'this policy not to cover any loss or damage by fire to the part of the building used as a theatre proper,' . . . this would manifestly have been an exception from the subject-matter of the insurance. And it is in like manner an exception to the risks taken by the defendants, when, in the same part of the policy in which they insure the risk of fire, and in the same connection, they state, in substance, that it is only fire which does not originate in the theatre proper against which they insure."

A similar question has been before the courts in actions upon policies of life insurance, where the contract sued upon contained a clause that it was to be void if insured died of a disease induced or aggravated by intemperance, or was to be null and void if he should die in, or in consequence of, a duel, or in violaceptions does not purport to contain all the evidence. Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 614.

The reason for the rule is that when books are thus offered they are in effect used as evidence, and are statements wanting the sanction of an oath. Ashworth v. Kittridge, 12 Cush. 193, 59 Am. Dec. 178.

Quotations from medical books are not admissible as evidence when offered independently or when read by witnesses, and it follows that counsel ought not to be allowed to read them to the jury, especially when they are not proved to come from works of standard authority in the profession, as the opinions of medical experts are in the nature of facts to be established by living witnesses, and not to be proved by hearsay alleged to have come from those not present, and not even shown to be competent to give them. People v. Wheeler, 60 Cal. 581, 44 Am. Rep. 70.

In People v. Wheeler, 60 Cal. 581, 44 Am. Rep. 70, supra, Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 619, supra, II. f, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case a medical expert had stated that the treatise sustained his conclusion, and the book was admitted as evidence in the nature of impeaching testimony to show that the witness was mistaken; and Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 516, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that the court in that case supposed that any evil that might arise would be overcome by the direction of the jury to discredit the extract as evidence, but that in the case at bar the court did not so instruct the jury, but it was said that it was not thought that that case was well decided; and Merkle v. State, 37 Ala. 139, and Stoudenmeier v. Williamson, 29 Ala. 596, supra, II. e, were distinguished upon the ground that the question there considered was not whether an expert could read from medical works, but whether such books themselves could be introduced in evidence.

In some states, however, the practice prevails of permitting counsel while addressing the jury to read extracts from law books and from scientific works as a part of their argument. UNION P. R. CO. v. YATES.

And in Wade v. De Witt, 20 Tex. 398, it was said that the privilege of counsel in their address to the jury to read from legal authors or from works of general science extracts pertinent to the case in support of their argument is a valuable one, though susceptible of abuse, and ought not to be abridged.

Thus, extracts from medical works which have been accepted by the profession as authority may when pertinent be read to the jury by counsel as a part of their argument. State v. Hoyt, 46 Conn. 230; State v. Coleman, 20 S. C. 441.

Counsel has the right in the argument of a cause before the court or jury, by way of argument or illustration, to read from a book a pertinent quotation or extract from a work on science or art or other publication, adopting it and making it a part of his own address to the jury. Legg v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 286.

Extracts from scientific books, which are merely argumentative and contain no opinions or acquisitions of learned or scientific witnesses which could be regarded as proper matters of evidence, may be read or adopted as argument subject to the instructions of the court as to the law of the case. Jones v. Doe, Little Blue River Regular Baptist Church, 1 Smith (Ind.) 47.

The rule that matters gathered from books or newspapers cannot be used as testimony does not prohibit counsel from using quotations as mere illustration. Baldwin v. Bricker, 86 Ind. 221.

But they cannot be used as evidence. Legg v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 286.

It would be an abuse of privilege to make the right thus to do the pretense of getting improper matter before the jury. Legg v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 287.

And scientific works on insanity read from by counsel for the accused in a criminal prosecution in argument cannot be considered or regarded as tion of the laws of any nation, state, or province; or, where the clause read, "The self-destruction of the person [insured], whether voluntary or involuntary, and whether he be sane or insane at the time, is not a risk assumed by the company in the contract." In each of these cases it was held that the clause contained a condition, and that it was for defendant to show its breach by a fair preponderance of proof. Van Valkenburgh v. American Popular Life Ins. Co. 70 N. Y. 605; Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 286; Goldschmidt v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 628. And a similar rule of construction has been applied in cases of accident insurance, where the contract provided that the insurance should not extend to cover accidental injuries or death caused by fighting or voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, nor while the insured was under the influence of intoxicating drinks. See Jones v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. 92 Iowa, 652, where the court says: "Not one of these conditions was to happen prior to the time the contract between the assured and the company should become binding. . . . The situation, then, is this: That there was a valid contract of insurance when the policy issued, but it might thereafter, upon the happening of some of these conditions, cease to be enforceable. . . . They were each and all matters of defense available to the defendant; but, not constituting a part of the plaintiff's case, the burden did not rest upon him to either plead or prove the absence of them in the first instance."

And in Coburn v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 145 Mass. 226, where there was a similar ruling, the court uses this language: "Stipulations added to a principal contract, which are intended to avoid the defendant's promise by way of defeasance or excuse, must be pleaded in defense, and must be sustained by evidence. They are in the nature of provisos. Exceptions which leave the defendant liable to perform that which remains after the part excepted is taken away are to be negatived."

Some remarks of the court in Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572, are most pertinent to the case at bar. The policy insured against bodily injuries "effected through external, violent, and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of this contract and the conditions hereunto annexed." After the principal clause followed five provisos and eight conditions. The second proviso was: "Provided, always, that this policy is issued and accepted subject to all the provisions herein contained or referred to." The third proviso was: "That this insurance shall not extend to any bodily injury . . . when . . . injury may have happened in consequence of . . . voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." The first condition was: "The party insured is required to use all due diligence for personal safety," etc. The last condition provided: "The provisions and con-legal authorities in the case except so far as the views expressed in them are sanctioned and supported by judicial rulings and decisions in the trial of cases. State v. West (Del.) Houst. Crim. Rep. 371.

So, where counsel reads from medical books to the jury in his argument the court should instruct them that such books are not evidence, but simply theories of medical men. Yoe v. People, 49 Ill. 410.

And the reading by the attorney for the people in a criminal prosecution of extracts from medical works which have not been introduced in evidence or proved to be of authority is error unless the court instructs that such books are not evidence but simply theories of medical men. Yoe v. People, 49 Ill. 410.

But permitting counsel to read extracts from a work on medical jurisprudence during his argument before the jury in a criminal prosecution was not error where the court informed the jury that they could not be regarded as evidence, but were read simply as part of the argument. Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 516; Cory v. Silcox, 6 Ind. 39.

And the reading in evidence by a counsel, as a part of his argument, of an essay of his own on dueling, and an extract from a book on duels and dueling, in a prosecution for homicide, is not such an abuse of the privilege of counsel as will require a reversal and setting aside of a verdict of guilty, where the evidence is such as to demand such a verdict. Cavanah v. State, 56 Miss. 300.

So, counsel should not be permitted to read medical authorities to the jury in his argument, where they are not read by way of illustration, but to give the jury a clear view of what such medical writers lay down as evidence on the question in hand. Boyle v. State, 57 Wis. 472, 46 Am. Rep. 41.

And refusal to permit counsel to read extracts from a work on science or arts as part of his address to the jury is not reversible error where the bill of exceptions does not show that such extracts had any relevancy to the cause on trial, or came within the purport and legitimate scope of argument. Legg v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 236.

In some jurisdictions the practice of permitting counsel while addressing the jury to read extracts from scientific works as a part of their argument is regarded as a matter which rests entirely in the sound discretion of the trial judge. Union P. R. Co. v. Yates; Wade v. De Witt, 30 Tex. 396; Cross v. State, 11 Tex. App. 84; Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 32 Am. Rep. 568.

And one which the appellate court will not revise unless it is made to appear that such discretion has been abused. Cross v. State, 11 Tex. App. 84; Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 32 Am. Rep. 568.

And refusal to permit counsel to read from medical books to the jury is a matter within the discretion of the court, and not the subject of a writ of error. Luning v. State, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 177, 2 Pinney, 215, 52 Am. Dec. 153.

III. Law.

Judicial opinions and opinions of counsel are to be excluded as evidence of the law in the trial of a cause, but may be read and are entitled to consideration as argument. Steiner v. Coxe, 4 Pa. 12.

Counsel may read and comment on the law to the jury in argument in a criminal case, and invoke the opinion of the judge upon any principle of law therein. Powell v. State, 65 Ga. 709.

While it is the duty of the jury in criminal cases to receive and accept the law as given them by the court, counsel in their argument may read law to the court in the hearing of the jury, or the jury in the hearing of the court, subject to the correction of the court in its charge. McMath v. State, 55 Ga. 303.

And the reading by the court, as a part of its charge to the jury, of the law as announced by the appellate court on a former appeal in the same case, is not error where the passages read seem to be the law. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Hiscox, 97 Ala. 187.

So, the counsel for the prosecution in a criminal ditions aforesaid, and a strict compliance therewith during the continuance of this policy, are conditions precedent to the making of this contract." The question presented on appeal was whether the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the insured used "all due diligence for personal safety and protection." The court says: "The rule of pleading in declaring upon a contract which contains an exception, or a proviso, or a condition, is stated in Com. v. Hart, 11 Cush. 130, 134, as follows: 'If such an instrument contain in it, first, a general clause, and afterwards a separate and distinct clause, which has the effect of taking out of the general clause something that would otherwise be included in it, a party relying upon the general clause, in pleading, may set out that clause only, without noticing the separate and distinct clause which operates as an exception; but if the exception itself be incorporated in the general clause, then the party relying on it must, in pleading, state it, together with the exception.' It is a general rule of the law of evidence, that it is necessary for a party to prove the substantive facts which he is required affirmatively to aver in his pleading. It is true that the policy in the case at bar only insures against bodily injuries effected by the means described 'within the intent and meaning of this contract, and the conditions hereunto annexed,' but this does not change the nature of the conditions. They shall take effect as conditions, and the insertion of these words in the principal clause of the contract does not vary the legal effect of the contract. The condition we are considering is essentially an executory stipulation, in the form of a condition, that Murray shall use all due diligence for his personal safety and protection, and it is the breach of this condition by Murray which the defendant sets up as a defense. We are not aware that it has ever been held that the introduction of the words we have quoted, or of other similar words, into the principal clause of a policy of insurance, incorporates into this clause the conditions of the policy, within the meaning of the rule of pleading we have stated; and in some of the decisions, where it has been held that the defendant must plead, or that the burden of proof was on him to show, that a representation was false, or that a stipulation contained in a condition had not been complied with, the policy contained these or similar words in the principal clause. . . . In an action upon a policy which contains many provisos and conditions, there is a practical wisdom which courts have recognized, in compelling the insurance company to allege and prove the want of compliance with any particular proviso or condition on which it relies."

Examined in the light of these authorities, the clause providing what shall happen in the event of a fall is not difficult of construction. It is not in that part of the policy which insures the risk, nor "in close connection with and qualification of the description of the sub-case has the right, in opening, to read to the jury the general observations of a learned judge, made in a case previously tried, on the nature and effect of circumstantial evidence, where he adopts them as his own opinions and makes them a part of his own address to the jury. Reg. v. Courvoisier, 9 Car. & P. 362.

And in reading to the jury a case from the regular law reports of the state he is not confined to the opinion of the court upon the question of law therein, but may read, in connection therewith, the statement of the facts of the case, and comment thereon. State v. Hoyt, 46 Conn. 330.

So, the use by counsel for the accused in a criminal prosecution of Phillip's Remarkable Cases of Circumstantial Evidence in argument before the jury is not objectionable. Jones v. State, 65 Ga. 506.

The general rule is that permission to counsel to read legal authorities in argument of a cause before the court and jury rests in the sound discretion of the court, and is not subject to revision on appeal except in a clear case of abuse of the discretion. Hines v. State, 3 Tex. App. 483; Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 32 Am. Rep. 593; Cross v. State, 11 Tex. App. 84; Wade v. De Witt, 20 Tex. 398; Curtis v. State, 36 Ark. 284; People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65.

And the manner of reading them as part of the argument also rests in the discretion of the court. Curtis v. State, 36 Ark. 284.

But it is the province of the court to determine whether the law proposed to be read is applicable to the facts of the case. Curtis v. State, 36 Ark. 284.

And it is its duty to check promptly any effort on the part of counsel to induce the jury to disregard the instructions or take the law from the books rather than from the court. People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65.

But where counsel for the prosecution in a criminal case reads an instruction to the jury which has been sanctioned by the supreme court as a proper charge, permitting counsel for the defense in reply to read the facts in such case and comment upon the difference in the two cases to show the applicability of the charge to the one and its inapplicability to the other, is not an abuse of discretion. Cross v. State, 11 Tex. App. 84.

And refusal of the court to stop the attorney for the people in a criminal prosecution from reading, in the course of his argument to the jury, extracts from books of law and reports of judicial decisions on matters of law, is not error where the court instructs the jury that it is their duty to decide the case according to the law as it is given by the court, regardless of any law which has been read from the books by any of the counsel. People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226.

So, refusal to permit counsel for the defense in a criminal prosecution to read in his argument cases previously decided in the supreme court is not an abuse of discretion, where the court declines to hear them on the ground that it is sufficiently advised on the law of the case. Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 32 Am. Rep. 593.

And it is not error for the court to refuse to permit counsel to read from a law book in his opening speech to the jury. Hall v. Com. (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 183.

And a remark by the state's attorney that Phillip's Remarkable Cases of Circumstantial Evidence, which had been used by the counsel for the accused in a criminal prosecution in his argument, was a mere romance or fiction, is not objectionable; but if the judge should have reason to believe that the jury were likely to be misled thereby, it would be his duty to state to them what principles applicable to the case were to influence and guide them. Jones v. State, 65 Ga. 506.

So, refusal to permit counsel in his argument to the jury in a prosecution for felony to read the statement of facts made on a former appeal of the same cause, and the decision thereon of the supreme court holding the evidence insufficient, for the purpose of deducing therefrom the insufficiency of the

tion of the laws of any nation, state, or province; or, where the clause read, "The self-destruction of the person [insured], whether voluntary or involuntary, and whether he be sane or insane at the time, is not a risk assumed by the company in the contract." In each of these cases it was held that the clause contained a condition, and that it was for defendant to show its breach by a fair preponderance of proof. Van Valkenburgh v. American Popular Life Ins. Co. 70 N. Y. 605; Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 236; Goldschmidt v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 628. And a similar rule of construction has been applied in cases of accident insurance, where the contract provided that the insurance should not extend to cover accidental injuries or death caused by fighting or voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, nor while the insured was under the influence of intoxicating drinks. See Jones v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 92 Iowa, 652, where the court says: "Not one of these conditions was to happen prior to the time the contract between the assured and the company should become binding. . . . The situation, then, is this: That there was a valid contract of insurance when the policy issued, but it might thereafter, upon the happening of some of these conditions, cease to be enforceable. . . . They were each and all matters of defense available to the defendant; but, not constituting a part of the plaintiff's case, the burden did not rest upon him to

And in Coburn v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 145 Mass. 226, where there was a similar ruling, the court uses this language: "Stipulations added to a principal contract, which are intended to avoid the defendant's promise by way of defeasance or excuse, must be pleaded in defense, and must be sustained by evidence. They are in the nature of provisos. Exceptions which leave the defendant liable to perform that which remains after the part excepted is taken away are to be negatived."

Some remarks of the court in Freeman v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 572, are most pertinent to the case at bar. The policy insured against bodily injuries "effected through external, violent, and accidental means, within the intent and meaning of this contract and the conditions hereunto annexed." After the principal clause followed five provisos and eight conditions. The second proviso was: "Provided, always, that this policy is issued and accepted subject to all the provisions herein contained or referred to." The third proviso was: "That this insurance shall not extend to any bodily injury . . . when . . . injury may have happened in consequence of . . . voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." The first condition was: "The party insured is required to use all due diligence for personal safety," etc. The last condition provided: "The provisions and con-

legal authorities in the case except so far as the views expressed in them are sanctioned and supported by judicial rulings and decisions in the trial of cases. State v. West (Del.) Houst. Crim. Rep. 371.

So, where counsel reads from medical books to the jury in his argument the court should instruct them that such books are not evidence, but simply theories of medical men. Yoe v. People, 49 Ill. 410.

And the reading by the attorney for the people in a criminal prosecution of extracts from medical works which have not been introduced in evidence or proved to be of authority is error unless the court instructs that such books are not evidence but simply theories of medical men. Yoe v. People, 49 Ill. 410.

But permitting counsel to read extracts from a work on medical jurisprudence during his argument before the jury in a criminal prosecution was not error where the court informed the jury that they could not be regarded as evidence, but were read simply as part of the argument. Harvey v. State, 40 Ind. 516; Cory v. Silcox, 6 Ind. 39.

And the reading in evidence by a counsel, as a part of his argument, of an essay of his own on dueling, and an extract from a book on duels and dueling, in a prosecution for homicide, is not such an abuse of the privilege of counsel as will require a reversal and setting aside of a verdict of guilty, where the evidence is such as to demand such a verdict. Cavanah v. State, 56 Miss. 300.

So, counsel should not be permitted to read medical authorities to the jury in his argument, where they are not read by way of illustration, but to give the jury a clear view of what such medical writers lay down as evidence on the question in hand. Boyle v. State, 57 Wis. 472, 46 Am. Rep. 41.

And refusal to permit counsel to read from medical books to the jury is a matter within the discretion of the court, and not the subject of a writ of error. Luning v. State, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 177, 2 Pinney, 215, 52 Am. Dec. 153.

III. Law.

Judicial opinions and opinions of counsel are to be excluded as evidence of the law in the trial of a cause, but may be read and are entitled to consideration as argument. Steiner v. Cox, 4 Pa. 13.

Counsel may read and comment on the law to the jury in argument in a criminal case, and invoke the opinion of the judge upon any principle of law therein. Powell v. State, 65 Ga. 708.

While it is the duty of the jury in criminal cases to receive and accept the law as given them by the court, counsel in their argument may read law to the court in the hearing of the jury, or the jury in the hearing of the court, subject to the correction of the court in its charge. *McMath v. And the reading by the court, as a part of its charge to the jury, of the law as announced by the appellate court on a former appeal in the same case, is not error where the passages read seem to be the law. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Hinson, 97 Ala. 187.

ditions aforesaid, and a strict compliance therewith during the continuance of this policy, are conditions precedent to the making of this contract." The question presented on appeal was whether the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the insured used "all due diligence for personal safety and protection." The court says: "The rule of pleading in declaring upon a contract which contains an exception, or a proviso, or a condition, is stated in Com. v. Hart, 11 Cush. 180, 184, as follows: 'If such an instrument contain in it, first, a general clause, and afterwards a separate and distinct clause, which has the effect of taking out of the general clause something that would otherwise be included in it, a party relying upon the general clause, in pleading, may set out that clause only, without noticing the separate and distinct clause which operates as an exception; but if the exception itself be incorporated in the general clause, then the party relying on it must, in pleading, state it, together with the exception.' It is a general rule of the law of evidence, that it is necessary for a party to prove the substantive facts which he is required affirmatively to aver in his pleading. It is true that the policy in the case at bar only insures against bodily injuries effected by the means described 'within the intent and meaning of this contract, and the conditions hereunto annexed,' but this does not change the nature of the conditions. They shall take effect as conditions, and the insertion of these words in the principal clause of the contract does not vary the legal effect of the contract. The condition we are considering is essentially an executory stipulation, in the form of a condition, that Murray shall use all due diligence for his personal safety and protection, and it is the breach of this condition by Murray which the defendant sets up as a defense. We are not aware that it has ever been held that the introduction of the words we have quoted, or of other similar words, into the principal clause of a policy of insurance, incorporates into this clause the conditions of the policy, within the meaning of the rule of pleading we have stated; and in some of the decisions, where it has been held that the defendant must plead, or that the burden of proof was on him to show, that a representation was false, or that a stipulation contained in a condition had not been complied with, the policy contained these or similar words in the principal clause. . . . In an action upon a policy which contains many provisos and conditions, there is a practical wisdom which courts have recognized, in compelling the insurance company to allege and prove the want of compliance with any particular proviso or condition on which it relies." Examined in the light of these authorities, the clause providing what shall happen in the event of a fall is not difficult of construction. It is not in that part of the policy which insures the risk, nor "in close connection with and qualification of the description of the sub-case has the right, in opening, to read to the jury the general observations of a learned judge, made in a case previously tried, on the nature and effect of circumstantial evidence, where he adopts them as his own opinions and makes them a part of his own address to the jury. Reg. v. Courvoisier, 9 Car. & P. 362.

And in reading to the jury a case from the regular law reports of the state he is not confined to the opinion of the court upon the question of law therein, but may read, in connection therewith, the statement of the facts of the case, and comment thereon. State v. Hoyt, 46 Conn. 330.

So, the use by counsel for the accused in a criminal prosecution of Phillips's Remarkable Cases of Circumstantial Evidence in argument before the jury is not objectionable. Jones v. State, 65 Ga. 506.

The general rule is that permission to counsel to read legal authorities in argument of a cause before the court and jury rests in the sound discretion of the court, and is not subject to revision on appeal except in a clear case of abuse of the discretion. Hines v. State, 3 Tex. App. 483; Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 32 Am. Rep. 593; Cross v. State, 11 Tex. App. 84; Wade v. De Witt, 30 Tex. 308; Curtis v. State, 36 Ark. 284; People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65.

And the manner of reading them as part of the argument also rests in the discretion of the court. Curtis v. State, 36 Ark. 284.

But it is the province of the court to determine whether the law proposed to be read is applicable to the facts of the case. Curtis v. State, 36 Ark. 284.

And it is its duty to check promptly any effort on the part of counsel to induce the jury to disregard the instructions or take the law from the books rather than from the court. People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65.

But where counsel for the prosecution in a criminal case reads an instruction to the jury which has been sanctioned by the supreme court as a proper charge, permitting counsel for the defense in reply to read the facts in such case and comment upon the difference in the two cases to show the applicability of the charge to the one and its inapplicability to the other, is not an abuse of discretion. Cross v. State, 11 Tex. App. 84.

And refusal of the court to stop the attorney for the people in a criminal prosecution from reading, in the course of his argument to the jury, extracts from books of law and reports of judicial decisions on matters of law, is not error where the court instructs the jury that it is their duty to decide the case according to the law as it is given by the court, regardless of any law which has been read from the books by any of the counsel. People v. Treadwell, 66 Cal. 226.

So, refusal to permit counsel for the defense in a criminal prosecution to read in his argument cases previously decided in the supreme court is not an abuse of discretion, where the court declines to hear them on the ground that it is sufficiently advised on the law of the case. Hudson v. State, 6 Tex. App. 565, 32 Am. Rep. 593.

And it is not error for the court to refuse to permit counsel to read from a law book in his opening speech to the jury. Hall v. Com. (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 183.

And a remark by the state's attorney that Phillips's Remarkable Cases of Circumstantial Evidence, which had been used by the counsel for the accused in a criminal prosecution in his argument, was a mere romance or fiction, is not objectionable; but if the judge should have reason to believe that the jury were likely to be misled thereby, it would be his duty to state to them what principles applicable to the case were to influence and guide them. Jones v. State, 65 Ga. 506.

So, refusal to permit counsel in his argument to the jury in a prosecution for felony to read the statement of facts made on a former appeal of the same cause, and the decision thereon of the supreme court holding the evidence insufficient, for the purpose of deducing therefrom the insufficiency of the ject-matter of the insurance," but is placed with the other provisos, in a different part of the instrument. The mere location of the clause is, of course, not controlling, but it has been considered as of some weight in several of the cases cited supra. Nor is it to be construed as if it were removed from its position among the provisos, and incorporated with the clause descriptive of the subject-matter, by the mere use of the words, "except as hereinafter provided." To give these words such an effect would be to incorporate with the descriptive clause all the provisos as to loss caused directly or indirectly by riot or invasion, or by neglect of the insured, or by explosion or lightning, or where there has been other insurance (not notified to company), or where manufacturing is carried on after 10 p. m., or the building stands vacant, etc. The overwhelming weight of authority, as will be seen from the citations supra, is opposed to any such construction. The most important element, however, in determining whether a particular clause expresses a condition or an exception, is the nature of the clause itself. What does this particular clause mean, "If a building, or any part thereof, fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease?" Manifestly, it does not merely provide that the insurer will not be liable for the particular variety of loss by fire which results from a fall. It stipulates for very much more, viz. that the contract, which it is expressly provided shall normally continue for a year, shall, in the event of a fall, absolutely cease and determine, so that, if a fall shall take place which in no way injures the property insured, and it be thereafter destroyed by fire happening otherwise than by fall or from prohibited causes, the insurer is nevertheless not liable, because an event has happened which, by agreement of the parties, puts an end to the contract altogether. It is difficult to see how such a clause can be construed otherwise than as a condition subsequent.

To the further argument that the words in the descriptive clause, "while contained in brick building," etc., made it necessary for the plaintiff to show that no fall had destroyed the integrity of the building, a sufficient answer is found in the brief of the defendant in error. A clause drawn expressly to cover the case of a building falling before a fire has been inserted in the contract, and it is to be assumed that the whole intention of the parties on that subject is expressed in such clause.

The circumstance that the complainant alleged that the "fire did not happen by . . . reason of any of the causes excepted by the terms of the policy" did not change the situation in any way. Unnecessary allegations in a complaint need not be proved. Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 239.

It is next contended by defendant that the court erred in refusing to charge, as requested, that "the burden upon the whole case is upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the damage sustained was evidence then adduced, is not an abuse of discretion. Dempsey v. State, 3 Tex. App. 429, 30 Am. Rep. 148.

And the exclusion of portions of a work on mental diseases, offered in evidence in a criminal prosecution in which insanity was interposed as a defense, all of which related to the question of the responsibility of an insane person for his acts, containing an elaborate discussion on that question, is not error, as the jury is bound to accept the law as given by the court, and is not charged with the duty of determining whether the rules laid down by the court were correct. State v. Winter, 72 Iowa, 627.

And in People v. Wheeler, 60 Cal. 531, 44 Am. Rep. 70, it was held to be error to permit the district attorney on an argument in a criminal case to read to the jury certain extracts from Brown on Insanity, where no evidence had been adduced that the book was by a standard author.

A jury has no right to receive the law from books, however, nor from counsel, in a will contest, and counsel cannot be permitted, against objection, to read to them from books, cases decided in other states and in England, for the purpose of showing that the facts set forth therein were not inconsistent with the legal significance of soundness of mind as applied to the making of wills. Baldwin's Appeal, 44 Conn. 37.

And it has been held that counsel cannot be allowed to read to the jury and comment upon decided cases upon the question at issue found in the books of reports, for the reason that, so far as the question is one of law, such cases and the arguments upon them are for the consideration of the court only, and so far as it is a question of fact, it is to be decided by the jury upon the facts given in evidence in the regular course of the trial. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Allen, 11 Mich. 501, 83 Am. Dec. 756.

The accused in a criminal prosecution, however, has the right to read to the jury the determination of the court of last resort upon points affecting him, in such a manner as to give them a complete knowledge of their spirit, scope, and meaning, where the jury has statutory power to determine the law of the case. State v. Hoyt, 46 Conn. 330.

In People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65, it was said that as a general rule the practice of allowing counsel in either civil or criminal cases to read law to the jury is objectionable, and ought not to be tolerated, as its usual effect is to confuse rather than to enlighten the jury.

As to foreign laws and the methods by which they may be established, see note to State v. Behrman (N. C.) 25 L. R. A. 449.

IV. Miscellaneous matters.

Ephemeral publications, such as bank directories or reporters, cannot be referred to or produced in court in proof of the facts stated in them. State v. Brown, 4 H. I. 523, 70 Am. Dec. 168.

And statements of facts and extracts from books or newspapers cannot be read in evidence to the jury. Baldwin v. Bricker, 86 Ind. 221.

Nor is a gazetteer competent evidence of the distance between places. Spalding v. Hedges, 2 Pa. St. 240.

And pamphlets commonly known as "bank-note detectors" are inadmissible in evidence to prove the worthlessness of a bank bill. Payson v. Everett, 12 Minn. 217.

So, books explaining a process and terms of art in a manufacture and evidence as to the technical meaning of words in a trade are not admissible in evidence to explain a statute in which such terms are used, though the judge may inform himself by consulting such books. Atty. Gen. v. Cast Plate Glass Co. 1 Anstr. 89.

And a volume entitled "The Principle and Practice of Life Insurance," though a standard work of recognized authority in the business of life insurance companies, containing rules and modes of caused by fire, for this is the only risk it was insured against under the policy; and, if all the evidence, when considered together, leaves the jury in doubt as to whether the damage was caused by fire or not, their verdict must be for the defendant."

Manifestly, this is an accurate statement of the law, and presumably the only reason why the trial judge did not include it in his charge was because the question it refers to was completely overshadowed by the other and more important one which has just been discussed. There seems to have been no conflict of evidence at all on this branch of the case. There is no suggestion anywhere in the record that the "damage was not caused by fire." The opening page of the brief filed by plaintiff in error contains this statement: "On April 30, 1895, the property insured was damaged and destroyed by fire." The only question in the case was whether the fall preceded the fire, thus terminating the contract, or whether it did not. There was no contention upon the trial that the agency which destroyed the property was not the fire. If the jury had been required to answer specific questions, and if they had found, first, that the fall did not precede the fire nor result from it, and had found, secondly, that the damage was not caused by fire, it would have been the duty of the trial judge, upon motion, to set aside such finding, since it would be not only against the weight of evidence, but wholly unsupported by any testimony in the case. Under these circumstances it was clearly unnecessary to instruct the jury as to the academic question, Upon whom was imposed the burden of proving that the damage to the property insured was caused by fire? The fact was conclusively proved, and no one questions the accuracy of such proof.

It is next contended that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury that "even though the jury find that the fire in the building preceded the fall, they cannot award the plaintiff any amount for loss following the fall, unless they find that the fall was the result of fire."

The amount of the loss was not disputed upon the proof, nor, except for the suggestion that the fall preceded the fire, and thus caused the catastrophe, was there any claim that any part of the damage was caused otherwise than by fire. The court had charged the jury that the decision of the case "turns upon your conclusion as to a single issue of fact;" that "the suit was brought to recover a loss which the plaintiff alleges it sustained by the burning of its stock of goods," etc.; that "the plaintiff alleges that on the night of April 29, 1895, while this policy was in force, a fire occurred, in consequence of which its stock of merchandise was nearly wholly destroyed;" that, "according to the theory of the plaintiff,—and there seems to be no dispute about this upon the evidence,—the loss which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if it is entitled to recover at all, is the sum of $7,744.77, with interest," etc.; that the "simple issue, therefore, for your consideration is that which is presented by this defense: Did the building fall as a result of fire, or did the fall precede the fire?" These parts of the charge were not excepted to, and, having thus substantially covered the point now presented as the proof left it, the trial calculating and adjusting life insurance, is not admissible in evidence in an action upon a life insurance policy. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Bratt, 55 Md. 200.

And permitting counsel for an insurance company against objection to read to the jury a pamphlet prepared by the secretary of the company for the use of its agents, setting forth the qualities of a good agent, and what was expected of them, and comment thereon to illustrate his argument, in an action upon a life insurance policy, is an abuse of discretion preventing a fair trial. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Cheever, 36 Ohio St. 201, 38 Am. Rep. 573.

In Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Cheever, 36 Ohio St. 201, 38 Am. Rep. 573, supra, Leag v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 287, supra, II. b. was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the matter read was pertinent to the subject of inquiry, while in the present case the matter sought to be read had no possible bearing upon the subject.

So, United States Patent Office act of 1836, § 15, providing that the defendant in an action concerning a patent may plead the general issue and give notice in writing that the improvement has been described in some public work anterior to the supposed discovery thereof by the patentee, does not make such a public work admissible as evidence of the facts relied on, for the purpose of laying a foundation for an inference of some fact sought to be established. Seymour v. McCormick, 19 How. 93, 15 L. ed. 557.

And a description of an improvement in London's Encyclopedia of Agriculture before the issue of the patent is not evidence that the improvement was operated successfully before the patent issued. Seymour v. McCormick, 19 How. 93, 15 L. ed. 557.

But a foreign publication is competent as evidence in regard to the state of the art and as a foundation for the inquiry whether a patented structure required invention. French v. Carter, 137 U. S. 259, 34 L. ed. 664.

And tide tables calculated by celebrated scientific authors and contained in their books may be read in evidence, and are of equal validity with the almanac. Green v. Cornwell, 1 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 11.

And a record of the weather, kept at an insane asylum for a number of years, is admissible in evidence to show the condition of the weather on a given day included in such record. De Armond v. Neasmith, 32 Mich. 231.

So, the general acquiescence of millwrights in the accuracy of Leffel's Tables, and in the results of computation founded upon them, may be treated as common knowledge of men of that profession, and their computations so made are competent evidence; and such tables may be admitted in an action for damages for the diversion of water from a creek. Garwood v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 45 Hun, 123.

And permitting counsel for plaintiff in a suit for backing water by a dam upon his machinery, to read extracts from Evans's Millwright Guide in the closing argument to the jury, is not error where the court charged that extracts read from scientific works are not of authority, conclusive or prima facie, but, like argument of counsel or any other thing adduced to illustrate, they may be satisfactory to the jury or they may not. Cory v. Silcox, 6 Ind. 39.

As to tabulated results of computations by civil engineers, see WESTERN ASSUR. CO. v. J. H. MOHLMAN CO. F. H. B.

judge was under no obligation to instruct again upon the same point in the precise language of the request.

The next group of assignments of error raises the question as to the propriety of allowing one of the witnesses, a civil engineer, and expert in heavy construction work, to read excerpts from scientific books when giving his testimony. The general proposition that scientific books are not to be read in evidence is a familiar one, and many citations from text-writers and reported cases are found in the brief of the plaintiff in error. Nearly all the reported cases deal with medical works, and most excellent reasons for the application of the general rule in such cases may be found therein. But the rule is not of universal application. It would be a reproach to the administration of the law if it were so. Records of observations are undoubtedly secondary evidence, but, if all such records were excluded from the sources of knowledge available to a court of justice, it would frequently find itself unable to obtain information which was open to every individual in the community. It has been held repeatedly that standard life and annuity tables, showing at any age the probable duration of life, are competent evidence (Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 554, 30 L. ed. 2518); and yet these tables show merely the deductions from records of past transactions, when neither the record of the transactions nor the individual who has worked out the deductions is called to testify to the accuracy of his work, or to the conditions under which it was performed. So, too, almanacs, astronomical calculations, tables of logarithms, interest tables, weather reports, tables of the rise and fall of the tide, have been admitted in evidence. In an opinion approving of the admission of market reports, upon which the commercial world relies, is found the following pertinent suggestion of Judge Cooley: "As a matter of fact, such reports, which are based upon a general survey of the whole market, and are constantly received and acted upon by dealers, are far more satisfactory and reliable than individual entries, or individual sales or inquiries; and courts would justly be the subject of ridicule if they should deliberately shut their eyes to the sources of information which the rest of the world relies upon, and demand evidence of a less certain and satisfactory character." Sisson v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 14 Mich. 497, 90 Am. Dec. 252.

The particular excerpts complained of in the case at bar are these: Certain reports of the United States Department of Agriculture, prepared under the direction of the chief of the division of forestry, contain tables which comprise the results of over 2,000 tests by the United States government of the crushing strength of different kinds of timber, prepared expressly to increase the knowledge of timbers grown in this country for the benefit of merchants and dealers and builders and engineers. The report is a recognized authority in the engineer's profession. From the tables the witness read the "results of investigation on 'long leaf pine,'" which was the kind of timber in the posts the cause of whose giving way was the subject of dispute. The next book produced was Kent's Mechanical Engineer's Pocketbook, — the last edition of 1896, — which, it is not disputed, is a recognized authority. "Every mechanical engineer," says the witness, "has one on his shelf." From a table in this book, giving the crushing strength of timber, the witness read a statement of such strength, per square inch, of the kind of pine of which the posts were made. The third book is Johnson's Strains in Frame Structures, entitled "Theory and Practice of Modern Frame Construction," also concededly a recognized authority. It contained similar tables, and a similar excerpt was read. That information of great value is obtained by multiplying such tests and tabulating the results is surely self-evident. Under the rule contended for, that valuable information would be available for the use of a court of justice so long as the men who made the tests and prepared the tabulations were living and producible, but after their death or disappearance the information they had gathered would be lost to the court, although available for everyone else in the community, and relied upon by engineers and builders whenever a new structure is in process of erection. Upon the precise point here presented the diligence of counsel has not succeeded in discovering a single authority. We feel, therefore, no hesitancy in so modifying the general rule as to hold that, where the scientific work containing them is concededly recognized as a standard authority by the profession, statistics of mechanical experiments and tabulations of the results thereof may be read in evidence by an expert witness in support of his professional opinion, when such statistics and tabulations are generally relied upon by experts in the particular field of the mechanic arts with which such statistics and tabulations are concerned.

It is further assigned as error that two witnesses (Bowman and Stanton), called by the plaintiff, were allowed to state their opinions as to whether the fall preceded the fire or the fire preceded the fall. It is not objected that the witnesses were not experts, and precisely similar questions had been put by defendant to its own witnesses. It appeared, however, that neither Bowman nor Stanton saw the ruins until long after the fire, and defendant insists that their opinions were, therefore, incompetent. This does not necessarily follow. Although the ruins had been pretty well cleaned up, there was plenty of timber and columns lying down in the bottom, and it is safe to say that the indications afforded by the condition of the columns had much to do with the formation of an opinion. The lapse of time may have rendered the opinions of but little value, but on so much of the testimony as the record contains we are not prepared to say that the trial judge should have excluded them altogether.

The only remaining exceptions are to the refusal of the trial judge to allow defendant's witnesses Cashman and Freel to express an opinion as to "how long a fire would burn in the building before the posts would be weakened," and as to "what time would elapse before fire and smoke would appear." The hypothetical question intended to elicit this information contained, so far as the record shows, no indication as to whereabouts in the building the fire broke out. It is manifest that this is an important—probably the most important—element in the hypothesis, and, without it, any opinion, expert or other, would be mere wild guesswork. The trial judge correctly excluded it.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Motion to Supreme Court of United States for writ of certiorari denied.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Joseph F. RASCH, Recept.,

v.

Albert NOTH, Appl.

(.....Wis.....)

An action of ejectment cannot be maintained against one the eaves of whose barn overhang his neighbor's land 10 or 11 inches, where the eaves of the latter's barn are lower than those of the former, and the barn is built so close to the line that the water from the eaves falls on the former's land.

(April 12, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Calumet County in favor of plaintiff in an action of ejectment to compel the removal of the eaves from defendant's barn. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Kirwan and L. J. Nash, for appellant:

Ejectment can be maintained only to recover something visible and tangible, something which lies in livery, and not in grant, something that is not incorporeal, but is capable of physical possession and can be delivered by the sheriff upon execution from the possession of the defendant to the possession of the plaintiff.

The eaves, being attached to the defendant's lot, belong to him, and if the projecting part were cut off by the sheriff in execution of the judgment, the severed material would still belong to the defendant, and could not be delivered into the possession of the plaintiff.

Neither can there be a recovery by ejectment of the light and air that ought to be where the eaves are, nor of the space occupied; for these are invisible, intangible, and incapable of possession or ownership.

NOTE.—On the question what disseisin will support ejectment, including cases of projection of eaves, see note to Harrington v. Port Huron (Mich.) 13 L. R. A. 664.

The overhanging eaves did not constitute an ouster or disseisin.

If the piece of ground which the judgment awarded to the plaintiff was in some sense occupied by the defendant by his overhanging eaves, it was also as distinctly occupied by the plaintiff by resting his own barn upon it.

Sedgwick & Wait, Trial of Title to Land, § 741; Tyler, Ejectment, p. 904; Jones v. Collins, 16 Wis. 595.

The facts are more consistent with the theory that the barns of both plaintiff and defendant were placed as they were shown to be, not by mutual wrong, but by mutual license or suffrance.

Sedgwick & Wait, Trial of Title to Land, §§ 872, 873.

If there were mutual licenses, neither acquired any estate in or seisin of the other's soil. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 539.

And if such possession was permitted by the owner to continue, a tenancy at will or by suffrance was created.

Wood, Land. & T. § 7, p. 15; Brown v. Kayser, 60 Wis. 7.

In Wisconsin a tenant at will or by suffrance cannot be ejected until his tenancy has been regularly terminated by notice to quit.

Rev. Stat. §§ 2183, 2184; Brown v. Kayser, 60 Wis. 7.

Trespass, or an action of nuisance, and not ejectment, is the proper remedy for overhanging eaves.

Port Huron*, 86 Mich. 46, 13 L. R. A. 664.

Messrs. J. E. McMullen and C. E. McMullen, for respondent:

The owner of lands is entitled to enjoy, and has the exclusive use and enjoyment of, all the space both below and above the soil of his premises, and to erect thereon any superstructure that he may see fit for such enjoyment, and no one can lawfully obstruct it to his prejudice.

Appellant in this case transgressed that provision of law.

If the appellant can extend his roof over and upon the property of the respondent, and interfere thereby with his use and enjoyment of his premises, without any liability created thereby, then he can extend it 11 feet or any other distance that he may choose, either for the purpose of annoying the owner, or for personal benefit to himself. This clearly cannot be the intention of the law, nor the construction to be put thereon.

Where the defendant interferes with the use of the plaintiff's land the plaintiff might treat this as a disseisin rather than a trespass, and might maintain ejectment.

McCourt v. Eckstein, 22 Wis. 154, 94 Am. Dec. 594; Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 125; Zander v. Valentine Blatz Brewing Co. 95 Wis. 162; Murphy v. Bolger Bros. 60 Vt. 723; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 6; Sherry v. Frecking, 4 Duer, 452; Stedman v. Smith, 8 El. & Bl. 1.

Ejection or trespass at the option of the plaintiff may be brought against the owner of a building which, through inadvertence of the owner, overhangs the plaintiff's land; but if the defendant offers to remove the projecting part, and is prevented by the plaintiff, ejectment will probably not lie.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment. The defendant answered by way of general denial and adverse possession. A trial by jury being waived, the cause was tried by the court, and the findings of the court are to the effect that block 4 of the village, now city, of Chilton, was platted in 1852, and consisted of lots 1, 2, and 3 lying in the extreme northern portion of the block, which was of irregular shape, and another large and irregular lot, called the "Mill Lot," adjoining them upon the south; that the plaintiff owns the west one half of the mill lot, which is immediately south of lot 3, and the defendant owns lots 1, 2, and 3; that both parties claim through and under a common grantor as far back as 1865; that at that time stakes designating the corners of the lots and the division line between lot 3 and the mill lot were still standing, and were pointed out to the purchaser; that in 1869 the original plat stakes were still standing and visible; that the then proprietors of lot 3 and the mill lot, respectively, participated in the location of the line between the two lots, and built a line fence thereon; that the same was then treated by the respective proprietors as the division fence located upon the true line between lot 3 and the mill lot until 1888, when the then proprietors conveyed lots 1, 2, and 3 to the defendant, who has since occupied up to such line fence as the true line; that in 1875 the respective proprietors dug a well on the line of said fence, each paying one half of the expense of its construction; that in 1891 the west one half of the mill lot was conveyed to the plaintiff; that since that time the plaintiff and defendant have used the well in common; that the premises in dispute are northerly from such division fence, and are a part of lot 3, 40 L. R. A.

and not a part of the mill lot; that since 1869 the defendant and his grantors have held and occupied adversely all of the land lying northerly from the division fence; that the defendant has built upon lot 3 a barn, which stands and rests wholly upon his own soil, northerly from the division fence; that the eaves of such barn did project and overhang the line to the extent of 10 or 11 inches, but that the drip from the eaves fell upon the plaintiff's barn, which was also built so close to the line that its eaves, being lower down than the eaves of the defendant's barn, received and receive upon the northerly slant of its roof the water dripping from the eaves of the defendant's barn, and casts the same, together with all that falls upon its northerly slope, back northward on the defendant's land; that no complaint by the plaintiff or his predecessors or grantors was ever made to the defendant on account of the projection and overhanging of the eaves of the defendant's barn, and no evidence was given as to damage, if any, occasioned by such projection. And as conclusions of law the court found, in effect, that such projection of the eaves of the defendant's barn constituted an invasion of the plaintiff's rights, which was redressible in an action of ejectment; that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment accordingly, and for costs, and ordered the same to be entered. From the judgment so entered the defendant brings this appeal.

We are clearly of the opinion that this action of ejectment cannot be maintained upon the facts found by the trial court. Certainly, the cases in this court do not authorize a recovery in such a case. McCourt v. Eckstein, 22 Wis. 153; Zander v. Valentine Blatz Brewing Co. 89 Wis. 164, Ill., 95 Wis. 162. This last case, in line with the first, held, in effect, that "an intrusion by one lot owner of his foundation wall upon the land of the adjoining owner, without permission, is a trespass, and may be treated as a disseisin; but, if the owner of the land so intruded upon extends his own building to his line, and rests it upon such wall, and occupies the same continuously, he thereby elects to treat the intrusion as a mere trespass, and cannot maintain ejectment therefor." While it is found in the case at bar that the eaves of the defendant's barn projected 10 or 11 inches over the line, yet it was also found that the eaves of the plaintiff's barn projected under the eaves of the defendant's barn sufficiently to carry the water from both roofs northward onto the defendant's land. There is no dispute but what each party owns and occupies to the line mentioned. The only dispute is as to whether the plaintiff can maintain ejectment for such projection of the eaves of the defendant's barn, upon the facts found; in other words, whether the plaintiff can thus occupy his premises clear to his line, and at the same time maintain ejectment for such mere intrusion. And we must hold that he cannot. There are cases holding that one is liable in ejectment for the projection of his roof over another's land. Murphy v. Bolger Bros. 60 Vt. 723; Sherry v. Frecking, 4 Duer, 452. In others it is held that such action cannot be maintained. Aiken v. Benedict, 39 Barb. 400; Vrooman v. Jackson, 6 Hun. 326. See also Leprell v. Kleinachmidt, 119 N. Y. 364, where the question was left undetermined. Harrington v. Port Huron, 86 Mich. 46, 13 L. R. A. 664. It is unnecessary to determine the question in the case at bar.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with direction to dismiss the complaint.

v.

B. F. DUNWIDDIE, Guardian, et al., Appts.

(.....Wis.....)

1. The father's duty to maintain a child after divorce, where there is no decree of the court relating thereto, remains as before, especially if the custody of the child is not taken from him.

2. A promise of the father to pay the mother for maintaining their boy after he has reached the age when the father is entitled to have him under a decree of divorce granted for the father's fault will be implied, although he has tried to get the custody of the boy, and has told the mother that unless he can get it he will not pay for the boy's keeping, but she will not consent to surrender him.

A PPEAL by the guardian of the infant children of August Zilley, deceased, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Rock County reversing a judgment of the County Court disallowing the claim of Mary A. Zilley for support afforded to one of the children. Affirmed

Statement by Pinney, J.:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court for Rock county allowing the claim of Mary A. Zilley, the respondent, against the estate of her former husband, August Zilley, deceased. The parties were married September 26, 1867, and divorced, by a decree of the circuit court for Rock county, December 29, 1894, in an action brought by the claimant against said August Zilley on the ground of his cruel and inhuman treatment. The court by its decree made a final division of the estate of said August Zilley between him and the said Mary A. Zilley. The parties had an understanding with each other previous to the divorce in regard to the custody and education of the two children of the marriage, namely, William A. Zilley, at that time about sixteen years of age, and Clayton A. Zilley, about five years of age, to the effect that the mother, the present claimant, should have the custody and education of the boy William A. Zilley, and also of the youngest child, Clayton A. Zilley, until he should become of the age of ten years, after which his father was to have him. The court accordingly decreed the custody of said children to the mother "until the youngest of said children should become of the age of ten years, or until the further order of the court," the defendant in the meantime having the right to visit such children at reasonable times, in the daytime. No provision whatever was made in the decree as to the maintenance and support of either of the children. About two or three years subsequent to the divorce the deceased was married to Martha Zilley, who survives him. The deceased, August Zilley, then resided in the city of Beloit, where he continued to reside after the divorce and for some two or three years after his second marriage. He then moved onto his farm, near said city, and continued to reside there until the time of his death, March 7, 1895. The youngest child became ten years of age July 9, 1889, when the deceased, August Zilley, applied to the claimant for the boy to go and live with him, and she refused to allow him to go; whereupon he told her that if the child could not come and stay with him he would not pay for his keeping; that he was willing to pay his schooling, and give him a home with him, which was where he belonged, as he understood it. A room was fixed up for him in the home where Mr. Zilley then resided, and subsequently Zilley tried frequently to get the boy to live with him, but claimant would not consent. He continued to make his home with the claimant down to the 18th of January, 1895, when his father sent him to Faribault, Minnesota, to school, where he remained until after the death of the latter. It was found by the circuit court, among other things, that no allowance for or provision respecting the expense of the education and support of said children was made by the judgment, and no application to the court in respect thereto or in respect to the custody of said children was made by either party after judgment. The youngest child, Clayton A. Zilley, became ten years old July 9, 1889, and had at all times since the divorce resided with his mother, the claimant, excepting short periods of time, since he attained the age of ten years, not exceeding in the aggregate six months. He was attending school at Faribault, Minnesota, the greater portion of the time when not so residing with his mother, and during the residue of such time he was with his father, August Zilley, and his second wife, upon said farm. He visited and resided with his father for a few days at a time on several occasions after he became ten years of age, but preferred to reside with his mother, and returned to her on each such occasion, and made his permanent residence with her of choice, because his father was unwilling to compel, or did not compel, him to reside with him. Between July 9, 1889, and March 7, 1895, the date of the death of August Zilley, the claimant furnished said Clayton A. Zilley his board and lodging, and cared for him for and during five years and two months at her sole cost and expense, which board, lodging, and care were reasonably worth $1,072, and after said 9th day of July, 1899, and prior to March 7, 1895, said claimant furnished to said Clayton A. Zilley necessary clothing, at the cost to her of $146.50; and nothing had been paid to or received by her from anyone for or on account of such board, lodging, and care, or for such clothing. The claimant filed a claim against the estate of said August Zilley, deceased, in the county court for Rock county, for such board, lodging, care, and clothing for the sum of $1,444, and the county court by its judgment wholly disallowed said claim, and the claimant appealed therefrom to the circuit court. The foregoing facts were found by the circuit court and that the executor of the last will and testament, George Crosby, had in his hands assets, properly applicable thereto, more than sufficient to pay the said claim. There was evidence that the deceased, August Zilley, desired the boy Clayton to live with him, and on one occasion sent for the boy, and the claimant said that he did not have to go if he did not want to. In answer to the question why she kept the boy, she testified that the boy stayed there, and "I felt under obligations to have him stay." It appeared that the father was able and willing to properly provide for the boy, and desired that he should live with him. The circuit court reversed the judgment of the county court, and allowed said claim in the sum of $1,218.50, and adjudged that it be paid to the said claimant by said executor, with the costs of the action. The guardian ad litem of the two minor children of the said deceased, to wit, said Clayton A. Zilley and Edna Zilley, a daughter by his second wife, appealed.

Mr. B. F. Dunwiddie, guardian ad litem, for appellant:

A divorced wife and mother cannot recover from the estate of her husband, on the settlement thereof in the county court, for support and maintenance furnished voluntarily by her to her own child, where, under the decree of divorce, the father is entitled to the custody of the child, and where he was at all times desirous, ready, and able to give the child a home and provide for its support, but where he is prevented therefrom by the influence and refusal of the mother.

The decree of divorce between the respondent and Mr. Zilley was and is conclusive, as to the mutual rights and obligations of the parties, from its rendition in December, 1884, subject only to be modified by the court which rendered it, in an application under and pursuant to § 2363, Rev. Stat.

Under the evidence in this case, she could not have obtained any modification of the decree had she made an application, as the court 40 L. R. A.

would not have been warranted in awarding her anything for maintenance and support of the boy Clayton, which she had voluntarily furnished during a period when the father was ready and anxious to care for and maintain him.

By the express terms of § 2369, last clause, where a final division of property is made in a divorce action, no other provisions can thereafter be made for the wife. The judgment is finally conclusive, and cannot be modified by the trial court after the term at which it was rendered.

Messrs. Ruger, Norcross, & Ruger, for respondent:

While the marital relation continues the father is primarily liable for necessities for the support of his minor children.

McGoon v. Irvin, 1 Pinney, 526, 44 Am. Dec. 409, 1 Bl. Com. p. 447; 2 Kent, Com. 190 et seq.; Edwards v. Davis, 16 Johns. 281; Schouler, Dom. Rel. p. 343; Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 1154-1156; 1 Parsons, Contr. pp. 251, 253, 255.

A mother, also, is under an obligation to support her minor children, but as to the father her obligation and duty are but secondary.

Wis. Rev. Stat. §§ 1508, 1505; Thomas v. Thomas, 41 Wis. 229.

These relative duties and obligations of husband and wife are not changed by severance of the marital relation through a divorce, and a fortiori when the divorce is granted for the misconduct of the husband; and after divorce the husband continues to be primarily obligated to support his minor children, except so far as the judgment of divorce otherwise provides.

Stanton v. Willson, 8 Day, 37, 3 Am. Dec. 255; Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 453; Fulton v. Fulton, 52 Ohio St. 229, 29 L. R. A. 678; Dolloff v. Dolloff (N. H.) 38 Atl. 19; McCarthy v. Hinman, 35 Conn. 538; McGoon v. Irvin, 1 Pinney, 526, 44 Am. Dec. 409; Thomas v. Thomas, 41 Wis. 229; Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. § 1223; Buckminster v. Buckminster, 38 Vt. 248, 38 Am. Dec. 652.

On like grounds the primary obligation of the father to support his minor children continues during a separation of husband and wife caused by his misconduct.

Pierce v. Pierce, 64 Wis. 73, 54 Am. Rep. 531.

This judgment of divorce did not change these relative obligations and liabilities of the father and mother.

Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 453; Plaster v. Plaster, 47 Ill. 290; Welch's Appeal, 43 Conn. 342; Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 37, 3 Am. Dec. 255; Covels v. Covels, 8 Ill. 435, 44 Am. Dec. 708.

The fact that the father did not have actual custody of Clayton after he became ten years of age did not relieve him from his primary obligation to support him.

No subsequent order respecting their custody having been made, the mother's right of custody continued.

Wis. Rev. Stat. §§ 2362-2369; Williams v. Williams, 36 Wis. 362; Thomas v. Thomas, 41 Wis. 229; Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 887.

Having acquiesced in and made it the mother's duty to continue her custody, the father could not claim exemption from liability for the support of Clayton because he did not have actual custody, nor can those claiming through him make such claim.

Pierce v. Pierce, 64 Wis. 73, 54 Am. Rep. 581; McGoon v. Irvin, 1 Pinney, 526, 44 Am. Dec. 409; Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 87, 8 Am. Dec. 255.

The position of the respondent is clearly distinguishable from that of a stranger who voluntarily takes and supports the child of another who is willing to keep and support it.

Wis. Rev. Stat. 1503. See also Rev. Stat. 1535, § 4587c; Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 1162, 1164, 1223, 1224; Courtright v. Courtright, 40 Mich. 633.

During the continuance of the jurisdiction of the court adjudging the divorce, the mother's remedy for obtaining compensation for the support of Clayton, after he became ten years of age, would have been by application to that court, and it would have been competent for that court to award compensation for both past and future support. After the termination of such jurisdiction by the death of August Zilley, the jurisdiction of the county court, administering his estate, was properly invoked to exercise the power to make an allowance to compensate for the support of this boy, which should have been made by the court granting the divorce had application been made to it.

Thomas v. Thomas, 41 Wis. 229; Pierce v. Pierce, 64 Wis. 73, 54 Am. Rep. 581; Welch's Appeal, 48 Conn. 342.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the common law the husband was primarily liable for the support of his minor children. 2 Kent, Com. 190. In McGoon v. Irvin, 1 Pinney, 532, 44 Am. Dec. 409, it was said that "by every principle of law upon the subject, recognized and strengthened by our statute, parents are under legal obligation to maintain and support their children, who are of tender years and helpless." The statute (Rev. Stat. § 1503) makes the father primarily liable to support his minor children. When the marriage is dissolved by divorce, the duty of parents to maintain their children remains as before, for children are not parties to the divorce suit, and do not lose any rights thereby. Hence the father's duty to maintain them after the divorce, where there is no decree of the court relating thereto, especially if their custody is not taken from him, remains as before. After the parents were divorced, all duties and obligations to each other ceased, and they were as strangers to each other. Nelson, Divorce, 40 L. R. A.

§ 981. The claimant owed the husband no duty as wife, and her duty to support the child continued, as before, secondary, and his primary. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1210; Plaster v. Plaster, 47 Ill. 292. It is generally laid down that the liability of the husband to a divorced wife, in respect to the support of the children, is the same as to any third person, except as provided in the decree. If the court makes no order either for custody or support of children of the marriage, the divorce leaves the father's liability as at common law, and the mere divorce does not terminate his liability. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1220; Thomas v. Thomas, 41 Wis. 233. In a proper case, it seems, after the marriage is dissolved, he may be answerable to the mother for maintenance rendered the children while living with her. Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 87, 8 Am. Dec. 255; Buckminster v. Buckminster, 38 Vt. 248, 88 Am. Dec. 652. The father is under legal obligation to provide for the support of his children, even if they remain with their mother after her divorce, and, as against the public and the children, he cannot escape the duty. Courtright v. Courtright, 40 Mich. 633. Where the decree has granted the custody of the children to the wife, and contains no provision for their support, it has been held that the father is not liable for the support of the children. But this is upon the ground that, the statute having made it the duty of the court to provide for their custody and maintenance upon divorce, it will be presumed that the decree has made all the provisions on that subject that were necessary; that the decree is conclusive as to the respective rights and obligations of the parties, subject to the right to have it modified as subsequent exigencies may require. As the decree makes the parties strangers as to each other, it is generally considered that a divorced husband is not liable to his divorced wife for necessities furnished a child of the marriage in her custody, unless by agreement, express or implied; that there must be either an express promise, or facts from which one can reasonably be inferred. Rumsey v. Rumsey, 121 Ind. 215, 6 L. R. A. 682; Cushman v. Hassler, 82 Iowa, 295. And it has been considered that the support of the child, under such circumstances, by the mother, was but the voluntary performance of a natural duty, and that her remedy was to apply to the court for maintenance of the child when the divorce was granted. These, and other cases of a similar purport, are confidently relied on as decisive against the claimant. In McGoon v. Irvin, 1 Pinney, 532, 44 Am. Dec. 409, where the husband had procured a legislative divorce from his wife, and had left the minor children of the marriage in the family of a third person to be supported, the mother afterwards obtained the custody of the children without his knowledge and consent, and refused, on demand made in behalf of the father, to give them up. She afterwards intermarried with I., and the children were supported and educated by him. In an action by I. against the father to recover for their support, it was held that McG. had a legal right to the custody of the children, but, as he had not attempted to assert it against I., the law would presume that McG. had assented to their being in the control and custody of I.'s wife, their mother, and that I. could recover, though the act of the mother in obtaining the custody of the children before her second marriage might have been wrongful. And it was said by the court that "when a parent permits a stranger to maintain, support, and instruct such children, in no way objecting to the act, but rather assenting and advising therein, the law will presume that he knows his obligations, accepts the services, and assumes to pay." It was also said that "there was no duty or obligation on the plaintiff to notify the defendant to take the children away, or leave them to suffer until he could see the defendant and make an express contract about their support and maintenance. Such a course would have merited the reprobation of every humane and upright man. The defendant had the legal right to the possession, and could have enforced it at any time. He should have first moved in the matter, and on failure to do so, the law would presume that possession elsewhere was with his approbation and consent." In the leading case which holds the father liable, under circumstances like the present, the court approves the doctrine that, if a minor is forced out into the world by the cruelly or improper conduct of the father, necessities may be supplied, and the value thereof may be recovered from the parent. "There is evidently no satisfactory reason," said the court, "for changing the rule of liability when, through ill treatment, or other breach of marital obligation, the husband renders it necessary for a court of justice to divorce the wife, and commit to her the custody of her minor children. If, under such circumstances, upon the allowance of alimony with custody of children, the court omits to make an order for the children's maintenance, the father's natural obligation to support them is of none the less force." The duty of support "is not to be evaded by the husband's so conducting himself as to render it necessary to dissolve the bonds of matrimony and give to the mother the custody and care of the infant offspring. It is not the policy of the law to deprive children of their rights on account of the dissensions of their parents, to which they are not parties, or to enable the father to convert his own misconduct into a shield against parental liability." But, obviously, this reasoning can only apply where the husband is at fault and the decree is silent as to his liability. Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 458, and approved in Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1223, and in Fulton v. Fulton, 52 Ohio St. 229, 29 L. R. A. 678. It is to be borne in mind that the divorce in the instant case was granted to the claimant against her husband, August Zilley, on the ground of his cruel and inhuman treatment. It was his marital wrongdoing which led to the separation of the parties, and the award of the custody of the boy Clayton to the mother until he became of the age of ten years. The case as to the subsequent support of the boy Clayton A. may well be placed upon the ground that the improper conduct of the father had deprived the boy of his rightful and legitimate home, and so gave the right to the mother to supply the necessary support and maintenance, and that the father should be held liable as upon an implied contract, his primary liability still remaining in full force. It is said that the father is released from obligation to maintain his infant children when deprived of their society and services against his will. In Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 458, it is answered that, "if voluntary misconduct on his own part leads to the deprivation, he is himself responsible, and not the court, which intervenes for the protection of his children. And if the father, as against a stranger, cannot escape liability for necessities furnished to his minor children, though remaining with their mother after the divorce, the mother will not be barred of an action against her former husband for the expense of maintaining the children. After a dissolution of the marriage relation by divorce, the parties are henceforth single persons, to all intents and purposes. All marital duties and obligations to each other are at an end, and they become as strangers to each other. Upon the establishment of such new relations, a promise may be implied on the part of the father to pay the mother, as well as a third person, who has supplied the necessary wants of his infant child." The case of Ibitt v. Holt, 42 Ark. 465, was one where there had been a decree of divorce giving the custody of infant children to the mother, and it was held that this would not relieve the father from his obligation to support them; that he was bound to maintain them as long as they were too young to earn their own livelihood; and a court of chancery would, at a subsequent term, entertain the petition of the mother to recover from him her reasonable and proper advances for their support since the divorce, and for an order for their future support. The case of Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 37, 3 Am. Dec. 255, already cited, was relied on,—"a decision," says Ellsworth, J., in Finch v. Finch, 23 Conn. 421, "well considered, by a court of distinguished and unsurpassed ability, and which, as far as my knowledge extends, has ever been satisfactory to the judges and the profession, . . . and sustained by principles entirely satisfactory and as old as the common law itself." It was the right, and the duty as well, of the husband to obtain the custody and control of his infant son, and to support him, after he had arrived at the age of ten years. We consider it against the policy of the law to encourage a father thus obligated to attempt to ignore or evade his parental duty, or to cast it upon any other party, so as to enable him to convert such parental neglect and misconduct into a shield against parental liability. Domestic and social duty alike required him, when his son arrived at the age of ten years, to enforce his parental rights, and discharge his parental duties. He knew they were being exercised and performed by another, who as to him was then an utter stranger, and he knew, also, that the disrupted condition of his family relations had been adjudged in consequence of his marital misconduct. We think the case of Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, and other similar cases, indicate the true rule, and that they are in accordance with sound principles of public policy. We think there is ample ground from which the acquiescence and assent of the husband may be justly inferred to the provision made by the claimant for the necessary support and maintenance of his son, and which he had failed to furnish for him, so that a promise on his part to compensate the claimant for what she had so expended may be justly implied, as in the case of McGoon v. Irwin, 1 Pinney, 582, 44 Am. Dec. 409. The cases bearing upon the subject are not, it must be admitted, in entire accord, but they have turned largely upon questions of public policy in the states where they have been decided. We hold, therefore, for the reasons stated, that the recovery in favor of the claimant is correct, and should be affirmed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Marshall, J., dissenting:

The question presented and decided in this case, stated plainly, is as follows: Where husband and wife are divorced and the custody of their minor child is left with the mother till it arrives at the age of ten years, the legal custody then passes to the father by operation of law. If, when the latter period arrives, he does all thereafter that parental affection can suggest to induce the child to live with him, stopping short only of using force or legal authority to accomplish that result, yet the child, through stronger natural attachment for the mother, or induced by her, or from both causes combined, shall remain with the mother by her consent, and she makes no claim to compensation in advance for supporting the child or during the time of such support, and knows that the father desires to control, educate, and maintain the child in his own way, can the mother maintain an action against the father for her services in maintaining such child during the time the legal custody was in the latter? My brethren have answered this question in the affirmative. The grounds upon which the decision is placed, I am not able to discern with certainty. Allusions are made to the moral and legal duty of a father to maintain his child, with which all concur, but, obviously, that mere duty is one enforceable only by the public. In an action by a private individual such duty is only a circumstance to be considered in determining whether contractual relations, express or implied, exist between the parties. Many cases are cited by my brethren where there was an application for support of a child, made in a divorce action, granted, and sustained on appeal, on the ground of parental duty, but such is not this action. The citations do not touch the questions here. Nevertheless in substantially all of the well considered cases cited, it is held that compensation in such instances can go only for future, not for past support. Thomas v. Thomas, 41 Wis. 229; Courtright v. Courtright, 40 Mich. 683; Ramsey v. Ramsey, 121 Ind. 215, 6 L. R. A. 682. Cases are cited to the effect that a cause of action accrues to the person who furnishes support to a child where the father omits to do so, merely because of the moral and legal duty of the parent and a failure on his part to compel the child's obedience to his authority. That appears to be the theory my brethren have adopted. The precedents for that are instances where courts have seemingly lost sight of the distinction between duty to the child which the public may enforce, and duty as evidence of a contract, that a private party, privity thereto, may enforce by personal action at law. Man's humanity for children and melting tenderness for their welfare, one of the most admired and admirable sides of human character, has apparently operated, at times, to swing even courts away from that safe anchorage in the law, that personal obligations, enforceable by personal actions inter partes, rest solely on contract. That principle, rigidly adhered to, is the best protection of us all. Any departure from it, for any cause, is fraught with danger.

I am warranted in believing that the decision here, as stated, is based on the natural and legal obligation to support the child, not on contract, because the most prominent authorities cited and quoted from by my brethren in support of the decision are instances, in my judgment, that come within the observation made at the close of the last paragraph, as evidenced by the subsequent history of the question under discussion in the courts where such decisions were rendered. The first is Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 458. There the divorce was granted on application of the wife for fault of the husband. The custody of the child was awarded to the mother without provision for its support. Subsequently the divorced wife brought suit against the father to recover for the support of the child, and her action was sustained solely upon the ground that the obligation of the father was primary, continuous and absolute, and not affected by divorce. The same reasoning was indulged in as that leading up to the decision here. It was decided in 1887. In 1895, in Fulton v. Fulton, 52 Ohio St. 229, 29 L. R. A. 678, the same question was again presented, except the divorce was granted for fault of the wife. It was held that there could be no recovery in the absence of an obligation growing out of a contract, express or implied. The court said, in effect, that while the relations of the parties to the child were not changed, their relations and obligations to each other were the same as that of strangers, and that no recovery could be had without showing a request from the father to support the child, or a promise to pay for such support; that the circumstance of the child's staying with its mother was so explained by the natural relations existing between them as not to leave any room for implication that there was a contract relation between the father and the mother in respect to the support of the child. True, the court instead of directly overruling Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 458, distinguished the two cases by saying that the divorce in the former was for fault of the husband, in the latter for fault of the wife; but that was manifestly an explanation that entirely failed to explain. The right to recover, so far as it could be sustained on moral and legal duty, did not change in any respect by the circumstance that the divorce was granted for the fault of the wife. In both cases the divorced husband and wife were strangers to each other. The learned and very able court would have made a more orderly retreat from its early position by saying that it was based upon a wrong principle, for the two cases are manifestly inconsistent, and the result of trying to harmonize them presents the appearance ordinarily observed when the effort is made to preserve consistency by trying to harmonize things that are diametrically opposed to each other.

Again, in Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 87, 3 Am. Dec. 255, decided in 1808, that court held that the divorced wife could recover for the support of the child because of the fact that prior to the divorce he abandoned it and his conduct compelled the court to place its custody with the mother as its guardian; that by reason of the facts she could contract debts for the support of the child after the divorce, while she had the legal custody of it without any provision for its support, without consent of the father, upon the principle that when a person forces his wife from his home he is liable to the stranger to whom she is thus compelled to resort for necessities. The case has very little bearing on this one. Here the custody of the child was in the father; his residence with the mother was not by order of the court, or because abandoned or compelled to leave the paternal roof, but because he preferred the society of his mother, and the mother invited and induced it, by her conduct, against the wishes of the father. Manifestly the case should not be considered as authority under the circumstances. But treat this, for the sake of argument, as a case where there was an abandonment of mother and child before the divorce, so that the court, in its discretion, placed the custody of the child with the mother as a matter of necessity, but without provision for compensation for its support, and we then have, substantially, Finch v. Finch, 22 Conn. 411, decided in 1855, cited in the opinion of the court, but unfortunately, the part of the opinion relied upon, which refers approvingly to Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 87, 3 Am. Dec. 255, is from the dissenting opinion of Justice Ellsworth, while the rule of the early case, in the opinion of the court by Chief Justice Church, one of the most eminent jurists that has graced the bench of that court, was expressly disapproved. The contention was that because of the duty the father owed to the child, the mother who supported it could herself enforce that duty by recovering compensation for her services in a direct action for that purpose. In deciding the case, the court said, in effect, that the question is not what are the reciprocal rights of the children and parents as respects each other, but what are the duties as between themselves; that a divorced wife who has taken the children from the father stands in no more favorable position to recover for their support than a stranger; that the mere moral duty to support is not sufficient to support a promise, and that nothing short of a contract, express or implied, will warrant a recovery. Speaking of the claim made, that the difficulties which broke up the home and led to the divorce and award of the custody of the child to the wife should be held sufficient to support a contract obligation to pay for the necessary support of the child (the theory mentioned by my brethren in support of the decision here), the court said, "Stanton v. Willson is the only case that we know of in which such a claim has ever been sustained."

From the foregoing we might proceed at great length to review the authorities, substantially all in accord, as I read them, that no recovery can be had in a case like this, except upon a contract obligation, and that the doctrine is elementary that mere moral or legal duty as between parent and child, or the parent and the public, constitutes no foundation for the liability, nor is it material at all except as a circumstance from which a promise may be inferred; and that such inference cannot arise when in fact repelled by the proof that the father was anxious and willing to support his child and was prevented from doing so by the conduct of the child, or the mother, or both, as in this case. Says Lord Abinger, C. B., in Mortimore v. Wright, 6 Mees. & W. 482: A father who gives no authority and enters into no contract is not liable for goods sold to his infant son. The mere moral obligation affords no inference of a promise. The idea discussed by Lord Abinger was that, so long as the father stands willing to support his child, so that support is not of necessity furnished by a stranger, he incurs no obligation to another in the absence of a contract of some kind. So in Seaborne v. Maddy, 9 Car. & P. 497, it was held that no one is bound to pay another for maintaining his children unless he has entered into some contract so to do; that every man is to maintain his own children as he himself shall think proper, and it requires a contract to enable another to perform that duty and charge him in an action. To the same effect is the entire body of English law on the subject, from the time of Blackstone to the present, and to the same effect are substantially all American authorities as I read and understand them. Cushman v. Hassler, 82 Iowa. 295; Jackson v. Mull (Wyo.) 42 Pac. 608; Lapworth v. Leach, 79 Mich. 16.

The only question left is, Is there any circumstance here from which a contract can be inferred? It may be conceded that slight circumstances will be sufficient, but I am unable to find evidence of any such circumstances preserved in the record. On the other hand, the circumstances repel all such inferences. In Cushman v. Hassler, 82 Iowa. 295, it was held that, while from unexplained residence of a child with its mother, the legal custody being in the father, a contract may be implied to pay the latter for her services, when such residence is explained as contrary to the wish of the father, the inference is effectually repelled. That appears to fit the circumstances of this case most perfectly, and is in accordance with reason and common sense. So in Lapworth v. Leach, 79 Mich. 16, it was held that the moral obligation is not sufficient to support by inference the existence of an implied contract; that where the mother voluntarily supports her child, she cannot recover therefor as upon contract. The idea expressed by the court was that proof that the support was voluntary and that the father was willing to support the child himself, in the absence of any express promise or circumstances from which a promise to pay for the support could be implied, left no room for inference that a contract relation existed between the parties. Again, in Ramsey v. Ramsey, 121 Ind. 215, 6 L. R. A. 682, an exceedingly well-considered and instructive case, where the facts were much like those in the instant case, except the strong evidence of parental affection and desire of the father for the society of and privilege to educate and support his child in his own way, that exists here, did not exist there, the court said, in effect, that while the rule that by moral and legal obligation the duty was on the father, primarily, to maintain his infant child during the years of infancy and tenderness, the rule must also be recognized, which lies at the very foundation of all cases where a third person has discharged the obligation of the father, that it must in every instance be predicated upon contract, express or implied, and that mere voluntary residence of the child with the mother, without some evidence of abandonment on the part of the father, is not sufficient to show a promise by implication to compensate the mother for keeping the child.

We hesitate to go further in this discussion. The excuse for proceeding so far is the importance of the question involved, and the wide departure which, in my judgment, the decision rendered is from the settled rule on the subject. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that, where a child resides with its mother by choice and through her maternal influence over it, after the father has exhausted all the resources that strong affection for his child can suggest, to secure his presence under the paternal roof, he can be held liable to the mother because of the moral or legal obligation to support, which, under the circumstances, cannot be said to have been violated at all, unless it be a violation not to proceed to the extreme of compelling obedience of the child by force of legal proceedings. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that a father can be held liable as upon an implied promise, when all the circumstances obviously repel such an implication; that after he has done all above indicated in order to be saved harmless from the liability of being called upon and compelled to respond to a third party for the expense of supporting his child, he must resort to the extremity of compelling the child's obedience. If such is the law, any disobedient child may desert his father's home, accept support from another, and a right of action will thereby accrue to such other against the father for the child's support. The law has been held contrary to such view, as I understand it, for time out of mind. The fact that the person furnishing the support away from the parental roof is the mother does not change the rule, but rather the moral obligation of the mother and the maternal relation to the child, and the natural desire for his society, rather repel than support an implication of implied contract relations.

SUPERIOR COURT FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(.....Cal.....)

An order that the father pay for the support of minor children awarded to the custody of the mother without any provision for their maintenance, by a decree of divorce, may be obtained by petition in that case long after the decree has become final and the mother has remarried.

(February 19, 1898.)

APPLICATION for a writ of review to reverse an order directing the payment of counsel fees in a proceeding for maintenance of a minor child after divorce proceedings. Writ discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. W. Goodfellow, for petitioner.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a hearing upon an original application for a writ of review. The unquestioned facts shown by the return are the following: Upon the 16th day of June, 1884, Emma J.

McKay, then the wife of the petitioner herein, Angus McKay, obtained a decree of divorce from her husband. The decree awarded to her the care, custody, and control of the children of the marriage,—Horton L. McKay, aged five years, and Ethel M. McKay, aged three years. It contained, however, no provisions for alimony for the maintenance and support of the minor children. No appeal was taken from this decree, and it has long since become a final adjudication. No further proceedings of any kind were had in that action until May of the current year, when Emma J. McKay, who had since remarried, and is now Emma J. Polastri, filed in the superior court, and in the action in which the decree of divorce was granted, a petition setting forth the decree, the award to her of the care, custody, and control of the children, who are still minors, and averring that no provision had been made by the court for the maintenance and support of said children, prayed an order to compel the defendant in that action, the petitioner herein, to pay $50 per month for the past support of each of said children, and $50 per month for the future support of each of said children, until the further order of court. Upon hearing, and over the objection of defendant, the order was made. From this order defendant perfected his appeal, therewith giving a bond to stay execution. No objection is made to the form, substance, or sufficiency of this undertaking. After perfecting his appeal, the defendant was cited to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in refusing to comply with the terms of the order, and to make the payments contemplated therein; and, notwithstanding the showing made by him, in answer to the citation, that he had perfected an appeal from said order, and upon advice of counsel believed that his said appeal, with its accompanying bond, operated as a stay of all proceedings under said order, the trial court was about to pronounce him in contempt, and to punish him therefor, when, under a separate petition setting up these facts, he here obtained a temporary order staying proceedings, and an alternative order to show cause why all proceedings should not be stayed until the determination of his appeal. Thereupon Emma J. Polastri on behalf of and as guardian of the minor children, presented her petition to the superior court in the action of McKay against McKay, setting up the fact that the defendant McKay had appealed from the order fixing a sum for the maintenance of the children, and that the sum of $250 attorney's fees and $40 costs for printing briefs upon appeal were necessary disbursements to be made by and in behalf of the minors, to the end that they might properly present their response in the appellate court. The court then made its order directing this petitioner to pay the sum of $250 for the indicated purposes. The payment of money contemplated by this order being less than $300, and thus no appeal lying therefrom, he sought and obtained this writ of review.

The only question in this inquiry is whether or not the court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the order under review. Petitioner recognizes this, and contends that the former order requiring him to pay moneys for the support of the children was in excess of jurisdiction, and void; and that, therefore, the order here under consideration, being incidental to and for the purpose of enforcing the former order, is likewise void. While a determination of this matter in this proceeding will necessarily anticipate one of the propositions presented upon appeal from the order for maintenance, which appeal is now here pending, yet, as its determination is essential to this adjudication, it may not be avoided or postponed. The order of the court allowing the children $250 is to be considered as an order for the payment of money deemed necessary by the trial court to be furnished the children for the proper defense of their rights, under the order of maintenance. Therefore, if they are entitled to the money at all, they should receive it promptly, to accomplish the end in view, and the question of their right to receive it should not be postponed until the determination of the very appeal to defend which the money was declared needful. The order of the court making provision for the maintenance and support of the children was not void as in excess of jurisdiction. In this regard the circumstances of the case are identical with, and the order the same as, that made in Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 401, and upheld as a proper exercise of the power of the court. The power of the court to make such orders for the maintenance of minor children, under petition in the action long after final decree has been entered, finds such general support from the authorities that it may be said that the rule is uniform where any similarity exists in the codes or statutes upon the subject. Thus, in New York, under provisions similar to our own, the plaintiff obtained a decree in 1869 which gave her the custody of the children of the marriage, but which made no provision for the care of the children. In 1879 she presented her petition in the matter, and an award for the maintenance of the children was held to be proper. Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, 96 N. Y. 456. The New York statute declared: "In any suit brought by a married woman for a divorce, the court . . . may, during the pendency of the cause, or at its final hearing, or afterwards, make such order . . . for the custody, care, and education of the children of the marriage, as may seem necessary and proper," etc. 2 Rev. Stat. p. 148, § 59. Section 138 of our Civil Code reads: "In an action for divorce the court may, before or after judgment, give such direction for the custody, care, and education of the children of the marriage as may seem necessary or proper, and may at any time vacate or modify the same." The court of appeals held that under this statute an order could be made after final judgment providing for the payment of moneys for the maintenance of the children, and that the payment could be enforced against the father. To like effect is the case of Washburn v. Catlin, 97 N. Y. 623. In line with these authorities may be cited Holt v. Holt, 42 Ark. 495; Buckminster v. Buckminster, 38 Vt. 248. 88 Am. Dec. 652; Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 452; Plaster v. Plaster, 47 Ill. 290; 2 Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 981; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 1218, 1223. It is to be noted that the order here under consideration being exclusively for the maintenance and support of the children, is radically a different order from that considered by this court in Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, in which case it was distinctly said that section 138 of the Civil Code, and the rights of minor children to maintenance and support under it, were not before the court. It having been determined that the order for the maintenance of the minor children is not in excess of jurisdiction and void, and as petitioner's argument in this case is based wholly on that contention, it follows that the order here under review is likewise not in excess of jurisdiction.

The writ is therefore discharged.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

Loueza GIBSON, Resp't.,

v.

B. O. GIBSON, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(18 Wash. 489.)

1. One who relied upon a former adjudication of a matter cannot complain of a decision which is to the same effect.
2. Other allegations in a petition for divorce may be treated as surplusage and the action sustained as one for the maintenance of a child, when the parties had been previously divorced.
3. A divorced wife can maintain an action against her former husband for the maintenance of a minor child, when the father is found unfit to have the custody of the child and this has been awarded to her.

(January 31, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lincoln County in favor of plaintiff in a suit for divorce and an allowance for support of a minor child. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Myers & Warren, for appellant:

The court having found "that at the time of the commencement of this action the plaintiff and defendant were not husband and wife," it was error in the court to make any finding as to the fitness of either party to have the care, custody, or control of the child.

The court has no more authority to award the custody of the child than it has to order a division of the defendant's property, when there is no marriage.

Keppel v. Keppel, 92 Ga. 506; Davis v. Davis, 75 N. Y. 221; Brown v. Brown (Va.) 24 S. E. 238.

The question of the care, custody, and guardianship of the child was settled and adjudicated in a former divorce proceeding between the same parties, and it was therefore res judicata.

When a court has once decided the question of care, custody, and guardianship of the children in a divorce proceeding, the same is res judicata, and binding upon the parties until its provisions have been modified by application in the original cause, or by appeal.

Unless liability is imposed in a decree for divorce, the husband is not liable for the support of his child thereafter, when custody is awarded to the mother.

Messrs. Davies & Holcomb and Caton, Martin & McComb, for respondent:

The wife may recover her support without even commencing a divorce suit.

Kimble v. Kimble, 17 Wash. 75.

As the right to the custody of the child was put in issue the court determined that question and found in favor of plaintiff; then must the court not take into consideration the ability of the parties, father and mother, to feed, clothe, and support the child?

Kimble v. Kimble, 17 Wash. 75.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, Loueza Gibson, and the appellant, B. O. Gibson, were lawfully married in the year 1886, and they have one child, the fruit of said marriage, Bessie O. Gibson, now eleven years of age. On the 16th day of March, 1891, the respondent began an action in the superior court of Garfield county against the appellant for divorce and the care, custody, and control of their child, Bessie O. Gibson. On the 15th day of the June following the superior court of Garfield county rendered a decree in said cause, in which the plaintiff, Loueza Gibson, was awarded a divorce and the care, custody, and guardianship of the child, Bessie Gibson. In 1893 a correspondence began between the parties, and in February, 1896, the respondent came to Lincoln county to take up her residence with the defendant, and continued to live with him until shortly before the commencement of this action. This was an action brought by the respondent to obtain a decree of divorce from the appellant, for the care and custody of the child, and for general relief. The action was brought by the respondent on the supposition that she had been married a second time to the appellant. The petition also asked for the setting aside of some alleged fraudulent transfers by the appellant. The court found that the plaintiff and defendant were not husband and wife; that the transfers were not fraudulently made; that the defendant had treated plaintiff in a cruel, inhuman manner; that he had attempted to strike and kill her; that he had choked her until she was nearly unconscious, and that he had scratched her face; that since March 24, 1897, defendant had failed to provide plaintiff or her daughter, Bessie, with any provisions, fuel, or clothing. The court also found that the defendant was not a proper person to have the care, custody, and control of the said child, and that plaintiff was a proper person to have the care, custody, and control of said child, Bessie, and that the defendant Gibson was the owner of a certain amount of property; and, as conclusions of law, found that the defendant was entitled to a decree that the marriage relation did not exist between plaintiff and defendant, but that $150 was a reasonable allowance for the support of the child, Bessie O. Gibson, and the defendant B. O. Gibson was amply able to pay such money each year; and the judgment followed in accordance with the conclusions of law. From such judgment, an appeal is brought to this court.

It is contended by the appellant that the court was without jurisdiction in this case to enter any judgment for alimony; that it was error in the court to make any findings as to the fitness of either party to have the care, custody, and control of the child; and that, having found there was no marriage, the court had no authority to award the custody of the child. So far as the last contention is concerned, while the court may not have had jurisdiction to make this award, it appears from the record that it was the same award that had been made by the court which tried the divorce case; and as the appellant relies upon this case as being res judicata of the whole matter in controversy, he is in no wise injured by the order of the court in this case, for it leaves the custody of the child where it was found.

It also appears from the record of the former trial that it was found by the court in that case that neither of the parties, Loueza Gibson or B. O. Gibson, had any property. The pertinent question, and the one question that really affects appellant, is the right of the court to enter a judgment against him for the support of the minor child, and the question resolves itself into this: Can a divorced wife bring an action against her former husband for maintenance for a minor child whose custody has been awarded to her? The ordinary rules in relation to alimony which are discussed largely by the attorneys in this case do not apply in an action for the maintenance of a minor child. There do not seem to have been a great many adjudications on this particular question, and the courts have differed somewhat in their views; but we think that the weight of authority, as well as the better reasoning, sustains the view that this action for maintenance can be maintained, and any other demands in the petition can be treated simply as surplusage. The court in this case had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It also had jurisdiction of the parties. The maintenance of minor children is a subject that is especially relegated to courts of chancery, and while it is held in a case cited by the appellant, and which we think is the most pertinent case cited by him (viz. Husband v. Husband, 67 Ind. 583, 83 Am. Rep. 107), that "the awarding to the mother of the custody of her minor child, on decreeing to her a divorce from the father, deprives him of all right to the services of the child, and, consequently, frees him from all liability to the mother, for the care, support, and maintenance of the child," still that was an action for debt. The mother having supported the child for a given length of time, afterwards brought action against the father for the amount expended. There did not exist, as in the case at bar, the actual necessity for the support of the child. However, we think that the case was not rightfully decided. It was decided on the principle that the right to the services of the children and the obligation to maintain them go together; and that, if the assignment of the custody to the wife extends to depriving the father of his claim to their services, then he cannot be compelled to maintain them. But this court has frequently sustained judgments where the custody of minor children has been awarded to the mother, and maintenance adjudged against the father, and so have the courts of nearly every state in the Union; and, while there is no wrong in asserting the legal principle that the right to the services of the children and the obligation to maintain them go together ordinarily, yet the decision above cited loses sight of the fact that the right to their services has been forfeited by the father by reason of his proving himself recreant to the trust which the law and natural duty impose upon him. It violates our sense of justice to allow a father to plead his own wrong as an excuse for relieving himself from an obligation. Presumably the custody of the child is taken from him, because he is not worthy of its care and custody; and this doctrine in effect releases from an obligation the unworthy parent, and imposes an additional burden upon the worthy one. It seems, however, in this Indiana case, that an allowance had been made to the wife; and the court concluded that the reason that the court which had granted the decree did not render any judgment for the support of the child was on account of the allowance to the plaintiff of the sum of $1,500 by way of alimony. The court says: "The action for divorce was one in which the plaintiff might, if her case warranted it, and should, have obtained a provision for the support of the child, but, having taken her decree for divorce, and the custody of the child without any provision for its support, she took upon herself the burden of its support, without such provision, and cannot now maintain an action for such support." It will thus be seen from the quotation that this reason would not apply in this case, for the findings of the court show that, at the time the decree of divorce was granted, neither of the parties had any property; consequently, it would have been impossible for the respondent to have obtained this right in that action. But, under the findings of the court, the conditions and circumstances of the parties have changed; and it is a well-established rule of law, and, we think uncontradicted, that the maintenance of children is a matter which the court can adjudicate at different times during the minority of the child. Mr. Bishop, in his work on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation (vol. 2, § 1223), in noticing this question, says: "But it was his own wrong that deprived him of the custody. And it is fundamental, equally in our law and in natural reason, that no one can cast off an obligation by refusing to keep it, or any duty by any evil doing. Therefore a better-reasoned case holds that the duty of support 'is not to be evaded by the husband's so conducting himself as to render it necessary to dissolve the bonds of matrimony, and give to the mother the custody and care of the infant offspring. It is not the policy of the law to deprive children of their rights on account of the dissensions of their parents, to which they are not parties, or to enable the father to convert his own misconduct into a shield against parental liability.'" And in Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 452, it was held that "the obligation of the father to provide reasonably for the support of his minor child, until the latter is in a condition to provide for his own support, is not impaired by a decree which divorces the wife a vinculo, on account of the husband's misconduct, gives to her the custody, care, and nurture of the child, and allows her a sum of money as alimony, but with no provision for the child's support. The mother may recover a reasonable compensation from the father, for necessities furnished by her to the child after such decree, and may maintain an original action for such compensation against the father, in a court other than that in which the divorce was granted." It will be seen that this case squarely sustains the judgment for maintenance in the case at bar. In fact, the case at bar is stronger than the case cited; for in the latter the wife had been allowed a sum of money as alimony, but in this case no alimony had been awarded. In Courtright v. Courtright, 40 Mich. 683, which was an action brought for divorce, it was held that "the parental duty of giving personal care and protection to children is distinct from the duty to support them," and that "a father is under legal obligation to provide for the support of his children, even if they remain with their mother after her divorce; and as against the public and the children he cannot escape the duty."

The judgment will be affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Morris SELLERS, Appt.,

v.

HOWARD GREER.

(172 Ill. 549.)

1. Acceptance of a contract by assenting to its terms, holding it and acting upon it, may be equivalent to a formal execution by one who did not sign it.
2. A contract between persons who are equal owners of all the stock of a corporation except two shares, of which one is controlled by each of them, by which they assume to divide and dispose of the property of the corporation, is not obligatory upon the corporation.
3. Specific performance will not be granted in favor of a person who knew when the contract was made that the other party had no authority to dispose of the property which it assumed to dispose of.

(April 21, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, reversing a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in a suit to enforce specific performance of a contract to transfer certain property. Reversed.

Statement by Craig, J.:

This was a bill for specific performance, brought by Howard Greer against Morris Sellers, in the superior court of Cook county. The cause proceeded to a hearing on the pleadings and evidence, and the court entered a decree dismissing the bill. To reverse the decree Greer appealed to the appellate court, where the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded for the purpose of allowing Greer to recover such damages as he may have sustained on account of the failure of Sellers to perform the contract. To reverse the judgment of the appellate court, Sellers appealed to this court.

Upon looking into the record it appears that Morris Sellers and Howard Greer had been associated together in the business of manufacturing railroad supplies for several years prior to 1891. In June, 1891, they formed a corporation under the laws of this state, and adopted the name of Morris Sellers & Co., Incorporated. The capital stock of the corporation was fixed at $100,000, each share being of the par value of $100, and 499 shares were subscribed for and owned by Morris Sellers and Howard Greer, respectively, each owning that number of shares from the formation of the corporation to the time of filing the bill. The remaining two shares were owned by John M. Sellers and Paul E. Greer, who were sons of said principal stockholders, each owning one share. No money was paid by any of the stockholders for their stock. The 500 shares belonging to Sellers and his son were paid for by turning over the plant and their interest in certain patents to the corporation, and the 500 shares issued to the Greers were paid for by turning over their interest in certain patents controlled by them. All four of the above named parties were stockholders and directors. Morris Sellers acted as president and treasurer, and had charge of the office and financial department of the concern. Howard Greer was secretary and manager, or superintendent, and had charge of the factory and manufacturing department of the business.

After the organization of the corporation it did a fair business, and its management and success seemed to have been satisfactory to the parties interested until the latter part of 1894, when trouble arose between the two principal stockholders in regard to the management of the business. Greer made an offer to purchase the Sellers interest, but the offer was not accepted. Negotiations continued, however, between the parties until September 4, 1894, when Morris Sellers made a written proposition to buy out Greer. The proposition was written and executed by Morris Sellers and by him delivered to Greer. It was as follows:

Outline of proposition between Howard Greer and Morris Sellers: Greer to take all of the Greer patents and all of the special machinery attached to punching machines, all other appliances belonging to the making of spikes; he surrendering all of his stock in M. S. & Co. and to furnish M. S. & Co. complete set of templets for splices; M. S. & Co. to loan machine No. 4 for six mo. and pay Howard

Greer $1,800 towards a new machine for cutting spikes; Howard Greer to fill all of the present orders so far as the material now on hand will complete. This agreement to be put in proper form at as early a date as possible, pending the return of the company's att'y to draw up the necessary releases, etc.

Morris Sellers. Tuesday, Sept. 4, 1894.

The bill alleged and the evidence tended to prove that the Greer mentioned in the proposition was appellee, and the letters "M. S. & Co." meant and referred to the corporation known as Morris Sellers & Co.

Messrs. Loesch Brothers and Howell, for appellant:

The superior court did not obtain jurisdiction in this suit to decree specific performance of the outline of proposition, or to award damages because of appellant's inability to perform, for the following reasons:

a. Said proposition is not a contract because it does not purport to bind appellant and contains no binding promise by him. The contract must be complete, definite, and certain in its terms and limitations.

Hamilton v. Harvey, 121 Ill. 469; Lawson, Contr. § 10; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1405; Clipson v. Villars, 151 Ill. 165; Shovers v. Warrick, 152 Ill. 355; Dintleman v. Gilbert, 140 Ill. 597; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. pp. 1002-1012, and notes.

b. The proposition lacks mutuality and could not have been enforced against appellee at law or in equity. The contract must be mutual in its obligation and its remedy.

c. The proposition shows upon its face that the subject-matter was the property of a corporation, and not of appellant, and that the consent of the corporation thereto and a new contract by the company was a prerequisite; all which appellee knew when he filed his original bill.

Hurlbut v. Kantzler, 112 Ill. 482; Doan v. Mauzey, 33 Ill. 227; Stickney v. Goudy, 132 Ill. 213; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1405, and note p. 450; Hatch v. Cobb, 4 Johns. Ch. 559; Kempshall v. Stone, 5 Johns. Ch. 193; Harrison v. Polar Star Lodge, No. 652, 116 Ill. 279.

d. It appears from the proposition and the testimony relating to the time of its being given, that the subject-matter was not appellant's property. The proposition is incomplete, uncertain, and indefinite, and incapable of specific enforcement, and its enforcement by a decree for damages would be harsh and inequitable.

Barrett v. Geisinger, 148 Ill. 98; Hamilton v. Harvey, 121 Ill. 469; Winter v. Trainor, 151 Ill. 191; Tink v. Walker, 148 Ill. 234; Stone v. Pratt, 25 Ill. 25; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1405.

Equity may enforce but not make agreements.

tive, then no action will lie until the execution of such formal contract.

The action of appellee (after filing bill in this cause), in filing, as a stockholder, bill of complaint against Morris Sellers & Co., incorporated, to have said corporation dissolved, and in having a receiver appointed who took charge of and sold the chattels and letters patent generally described in the outline of proposition, bars him from any relief in this suit.

Messrs. Jones & Strong, for appellee:

If the allegations of the bill are proved the prayer thereof must be granted.

The specific performance of an agreement, relating to personal property, such as the one in this cause, has been held to be good, in numerous instances.

It is not necessary for the party to whom the contract is addressed to accept it in writing, if it is signed by one of the parties and acted on by the other. Under these circumstances it is as binding as if signed by both parties.

Vogel v. Pekoc, 157 Ill. 339, 30 L. R. A. 491; Johnson v. Dodge, 17 Ill. 442.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The two following grounds are relied upon by counsel for appellant, in the argument, to reverse the judgment of the appellate court: "We claim, firstly, that the proposition is not a contract binding upon appellee or upon appellant; that it lacks mutuality; that the subject-matter was the property of a corporation, and not of either of the parties named in the proposition; that appellee is in no wise bound, and so acted as not to legally bind himself, in terms, to said proposition; that it was made under such circumstances that it was not, and was not intended to be, a complete or binding contract or agreement upon either appellant or appellee; hence its specific enforcement was not only impossible, but if attempted by way of assessment of damages upon appellant, as the appellate court seeks to do, would contravene equitable principles. Secondly, that, if all these points are negatived, appellee has yet barred himself of all relief in equity by his own inequitable conduct."

It will be observed that appellee did not sign the contract, and hence it is contended that the contract is not mutual. It appears, however, that the contract was delivered by Morris Sellers, appellant, to appellee, on the day it was executed, and appellee accepted the contract and agreed to its terms and conditions. The acceptance of the contract by appellee assenting to its terms, holding it and acting upon it as a valid instrument, may be regarded as equivalent to its formal execution on his part, as held by this court in Johnson v. Dodge, 17 Ill. 442, and Fogel v. Pekoc, 157 Ill. 339, 30 L. R. A. 491.

But it is said the subject-matter of the contract was the property of a corporation, and not of either of the parties named therein, and, as the corporation never executed or ratified the contract, it cannot be enforced in a court of equity. Of the 1,000 shares of capital stock of the corporation Greer and Sellers owned equally the entire amount except two shares, which were held in the names of the respective sons of the two parties. These sons never paid anything for the stock placed in their names, and were mere nominal shareholders, and the only inference to be drawn from all the evidence is that the two shares were placed in their names in order that the concern might have a sufficient number of stockholders to make up a board of directors. In the management of the affairs of the concern, whatever was done by Greer was assented to by his son, and whatever action was taken by Sellers was approved by his son. As between the appellant and appellee, they may be regarded as owners of the property named in the contract, and any contract which they may have made in regard to the property may, as between them, be enforced in a court of equity.

But it is said that the proposition was not intended to be a complete and binding contract. There is nothing appearing on the face of the contract, nor is there anything in the evidence introduced on the hearing, which will sustain that position. The contract is definite and specific in regard to what was to be done by each of the parties. By the contract Greer was to do three things: First, he was to surrender all of his stock in the Morris Sellers & Co. establishment; second, he was to furnish a completeset of templets for splices; third, he was to fill all of the present orders, so far as the material then on hand would permit. From the terms of the contract there could be no uncertainty or doubt in regard to what Greer was required to do in order to comply with the contract. As to Sellers, he was required by the contract to deliver over to Greer all of the Greer patents, and what was meant by Greer patents was well understood by both parties.

It is true that Morris Sellers and Howard Greer owned all of the stock of the corporation except two shares, which belonged to their sons. But did this fact confer upon them, or either of them, the power to sell the corporate property? It is conceded that the patents and all the other property named in the contract in question belonged to the corporation Morris Sellers & Co., and the question presented is whether Morris Sellers and Howard Greer, two of the stockholders, without the consent or authority of the corporation Morris Sellers & Co., had the right to divide the corporate property between themselves, or to sell it, as was attempted to be done by the contract in question. A corporation is an artificial being created by law, clothed with certain powers. It acts through its board of directors and officers. Its property is not subject to the control or disposition of its members or stockholders. They have no power to sell or encumber the corporate property. A reference to a few authorities will fully sustain what has been said.

§ 709, it is said: "The stockholders cannot enter into contracts with third persons. Contracts between the corporation and third persons must be entered into by the directors, and not by the stockholders. The corporation, in such matters, is represented by the former, and not by the latter. Such is one of the main objects of corporate existence. To the directors are given the management and formation of corporate contracts. The stockholders cannot, in meeting assembled, bind the corporation by their contracts in its behalf. Although one person owns a majority of the stock, or all of it, or all but two shares, he does not in consequence thereof acquire the right to act for the corporation, or as the corporation, independently of the directors. One person may own all the stock, and yet the existence, relations, and business methods of the corporation continue. A single stockholder cannot make a contract for and in the name of the corporation which shall have any binding force or validity, except by subsequent ratification or adoption in the regular manner."

In Allemon v. Simmons, 124 Ind. 199, it was attempted to hold a corporation liable on a contract made by one Crawford, who was a director and owner of five sixths of the stock of the corporation. In disposing of the question the court said: "It is true, Crawford was one of the directors of the company, and held a majority of the stock, but the existence of these facts conferred upon him no power to make contracts for the corporation. It could only be bound by the action of its board of directors; the board could have conferred on Crawford this power, but there was no evidence that it had done so. Crawford, as one of the directors, had no more authority or power than any other director. The board consisted of five members; and three constituted a quorum, less than three could make no binding contract for the corporation."

The contract which Simmons and Ayleshire executed with Crawford was the mere personal engagement of Crawford with the said parties."

In Humphreys v. McKissock, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. ed. 473, the validity of the action of all the stockholders of a corporation in transferring its property without corporate action arose, and in disposing of the case the court said: "Both the commissioner and the court, in confirming his report and entering the decree mentioned, seem to have confounded the ownership of stock in a corporation with ownership of its property. But nothing is more distinct than the two rights; the ownership of one confers no ownership of the other. The property of a corporation is not subject to the control of individual members, whether acting separately or jointly. They can neither encumber nor transfer that property, nor authorize others to do so. The corporation—the artificial being created—holds the property, and alone can mortgage or transfer it; and the corporation acts only through its officers, subject to the conditions prescribed by law. In Smith v. Hurd, 12 Met. 385. 46 Am. Dec. 690, the relations of stockholders to the rights and property of a banking corporation are stated with his usual clearness and precision by Chief Justice Shaw, speaking for the supreme court of Massachusetts, and the same doctrine applies to the relations of stockholders in all business.

corporations. Said the chief justice: "The individual members of the corporation, whether they should all join, or each act severally, have no right or power to intermeddle with the property or concerns of the bank, or call any officer, agent, or servant to account, or discharge them from any liability. Should all the stockholders join in a power of attorney to any one, he could not take possession of any real or personal estate, any security or chose in action; could not collect a debt, or discharge a claim, or release damage arising from any default, simply because they are not the legal owners of the property, and damage done to such property is not an injury to them. Their rights and their powers are limited and well defined."

In this court, in Hopkins v. Roseclare Lead Co. 72 Ill. 373, the right of a stockholder of a corporation to transfer certain leases belonging to the corporation arose, and in disposing of the question the court said (p. 379): "It is insisted that La Grave had no power to make the sale of the leases, to transfer the control of the suit, or to sell the 20 acres of land, as they were all owned by the company. He was but a stockholder, and as such had no power to make the sale. He, although owning the majority of the stock, could not act for the company unless specially authorized. He could, no doubt, control the action of the company by the election of its officers, but still the company could only act through its officers or by expressly delegating power to others, whether a stockholder or other persons." See also England v. Dearborn, 141 Mass. 590; Newton Mfg. Co. v. White, 42 Ga. 149; Russell v. M'Lellan, 14 Pick. 68.

From what has been said it is apparent that Morris Sellers, although he owned one half of the capital stock of the corporation, had no right to sell the corporate property, and any contract he may have made would not be obligatory on the corporation. The corporation, Morris Sellers & Co., the owner of the letters patent and other property described in the contract, was not made a party to the bill, and no decree could have been obtained against it if it had been made a party, for the reason it never executed the contract. Nor did it ratify the contract after it was made, but, on the other hand, expressly refused to do so on application of Greer to its board of directors. The bill prayed that Sellers might be compelled to convey the letters patent named in the contract to Greer. He had no title, and hence could not make a conveyance, and any decree that might have been rendered would have been nugatory. In a bill for specific performance, the contract must be of such a character that the court is able to make an efficient decree and enforce it when made. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1405.

This case is similar in principle to Hurlbut v. Kantzler, 112 Ill. 482, where a bill was filed for specific performance against Kantzler, Cretty, & Blair and the board of education, to compel the assignment of a lease. There Kantzler held a lease from the board of education which was not assignable without the written consent of the board. Kantzler, however, gave to Hurlbut a written agreement to assign the lease, but it was held the agreement could not be enforced against the board, as it had not assented to the agreement. In disposing of the case it is said (p. 488): "There is no allegation in the bills, or proof, that the consent of the board of education will be given, or ever was given. . . . Hurlbut, at the time he took the contract from Kantzler, knew that the latter could not transfer his leasehold interest without the express consent of a third party, against whom he could claim no rights, legal or equitable, and consequently took his contract under such circumstances as to make its validity and effectiveness depend upon the exercise of the will of another under no obligation to do any act for him or for his benefit."

Appellee not being entitled to a decree for a specific performance, the next question presented is, Did the court err in refusing to retain the bill for the purpose of allowing appellee to recover damages for the failure of Sellers to perform the contract? It appears from the record that a short time before the bill was filed two actions were brought against the corporation, Morris Sellers & Co., to recover money due on certain obligations of the corporation. Judgments were subsequently rendered against the corporation. After the existence of these judgments came to the knowledge of appellee, four days after he filed the bill in this case he filed another bill against the corporation, in which he prayed for the appointment of a receiver and that the affairs of the corporation might be closed up. A receiver was appointed, and all the property, including that described in the contract, was sold by the receiver; and it is insisted by appellant that appellee has no standing in a court of equity to recover damages, because the property described in the contract was sold under a decree procured by him. In the view we take of the case it will not be necessary to determine this question, as there are other grounds upon which the decision of the case may be predicated. In Doan v. Mauzey, 33 Ill. 227, it was held that a bill for specific performance will not be retained to assess damages for a failure to perform the contract, where the complainant knew when he filed the bill that the vendor had parted with the title to the property. The same rule was declared in Stickney v. Goudy, 132 Ill. 213. In Kennedy v. Hazelton, 128 U. S. 667, 33 L. ed. 576, it was held that specific performance cannot be decreed of an agreement to convey property which has no existence or to which the defendant has no title, and if the want of title was known to the plaintiff at the time of beginning suit the bill would not be retained for the assessment of damages. The same doctrine is declared in Hurlbut v. Kantzler, 112 Ill. 482. Here Greer, the appellee, knew when he accepted the contract from Sellers that the property named in the contract was owned by Morris Sellers & Co., a corporation. He also knew that Sellers had no authority to sell the property, and, knowing these facts, he could not maintain a bill for specific performance, nor would the bill be retained for an assessment of damages for a breach of the contract.

The judgment of the appellate court will be reversed, and the decree of the superior court of Cook county will be affirmed. Judgment reversed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Washington, ex rel. A. A. DENNY,

c.
Robert BRIDGES et al.
and
City of Seattle, Intervener.

1. A lease of harbor area in front of tide lands for curing and canning fish, maintaining a retail and wholesale fish market, and storing ice for packing and handling fish, is not authorized by Const. art. 15, § 1, reserving such area "for maintaining wharves, streets, and other conveniences of navigation and commerce," since the word "commerce" is qualified by the word "navigation."

2. The structures authorized by Const. art. 15, § 2, respecting leases of harbor areas for "wharves, docks, and other structures," when this section is construed with § 1, must be limited to "conveniences of navigation and commerce."

NOTE.—Right of owner of upland to access to navigable water.

Few questions present so much difficulty, when viewed in the light of the expressions of judicial opinion, as does this one. In England when by virtue of the Conquest the King had all the rights and the subject only those which were granted to him, there is no express decision as to the riparian right of access to navigable water. The general understanding of the situation at that time has been, however, that the King could cut off access if he chose to do so. On the other hand, when the rights of the King became limited, and those of the subject correspondingly amplified, the right of access became a substantial one recognized by the courts, until now such rights cannot be destroyed, even by the government, without making compensation to their owner. This is also the rule wherever the English law controls. In this country some of the courts have adopted one extreme, some the other, while yet others have taken a middle ground not very clearly defined. The earlier cases were more favorable to the individual, while, contrary to the course in England, the later ones seem to be ignoring his claims, until one of the lower courts in Illinois has held that the state can convert the water into dry land for park purposes, and that the former riparian proprietor has no legal cause for objection.

The English rule.

Hall (Seashore, 2d ed. p. 6), says that the title of the King to the land under water is similar to his ancient title to all the terra firma in his dominions. It is a fundamental principle that all the lands in the realm belonged originally to the King, and that which had not been granted to the subject remained in him in absolute ownership. This is what is known as the jus privatum.

Freeman says (Eng. Const. 2d ed. pp. 139 et seq.) the tracts of unoccupied land were originally the property of the public. But by the time of or after the Conquest this land was known as terra regia, and disposed of by the King as he chose. After Magna Charta the character of the land began to change again, until now the land is not the King's with power in him to dispose of it, but in the people, and under the control of Parliament. He further states that by custom each new sovereign is now compelled to grant his individual rights in the unoccupied land to the people.

The practical effect of this is to merge the jus privatum into the jus publicum. The first case involving the right of access was decided in 1843, after this change had been accomplished.

In Rose v. Groves, 5 Mann & G. 613, 6 Scott, N. R. 645, 1 Dowl. & L. 61, 12 L. J. C. P. N. S. 251, 7 Jur. 951, access from the river to plaintiff's public house was obstructed by timber moored by defendants in the stream in front of plaintiff's bank. During the argument, Maule, J., said this was not an action for obstructing the river but for obstructing access to plaintiff's house. And it was held that the declaration was good after verdict.

And a recovery was permitted on a remarkably similar state of facts in French v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 145 Mass. 261.

Kearns v. Cordwainers' Co., 6 C. B. N. S. 888, 28 L. J. C. P. N. S. 286, 5 Jur. N. S. 1216, was a proceeding between licensor and licensee based upon a contract that the licensor should apply for leave to erect a landing place beside a wharf, and the question was as to whom application must be made. Cockburn, Ch. J., during the argument, stated that the conservators of the river had a right to authorize the erection so far as the public was concerned, but the difficulty he felt was as to whether or not they could override private rights. In his opinion he said it appeared to him that no private rights were interfered with; that the erection was not one which was immediately brought into contact with, or would directly interfere with, access to the premises of adjoining owners, and that being so, the only rights interfered with were public rights which the conservators could control. But he says that if the obstruction operated a private particular injury to abutting owners, according to Rose v. Groves, they would have a right of action.

If a railroad is built between a wharf and the water, the wharf is injured within the meaning of a statute requiring compensation to be made in such cases. Bell v. Hull & S. R. Co. 6 Mees & W. 690, 2 Railway Cas. 279.

In Atty. Gen. v. Conservators of the Thames, 11 Hem. & M. 1, 8 Jur. N. S. 1203, 11 Week. Rep. 163, the judge says the right of the owner of a private wharf to have access thereto is a totally different right from the public right of passing or repassing along the river. The existence of such a private right of access was recognized in Rose v. Groves. The wharf owner claimed that it had a right to the wharf coupled with a right of access to the river, and the judge agreed that if this access was taken away it would be entitled to an injunction. But, he says, the access was not blocked up, the wharf was only made less accessible. That is a mere interruption to the navigation of the river which they enjoyed in common with the public, and not as part of their special right of access.

In Duke Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Bd. of Works, L. R. 8 Exch. 306, where an embankment for a road was built along the shore so as to cut the riparian owner off from access to the water, the court of exchequer held that he was entitled to damages, Kelly, C. B., saying: "I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff would have been entitled to bring an action against a person who should have deprived him of the mass of water flowing along the back of his premises, just as much as he would against anybody who took away the public road in front" of them. This judgment was reversed in the exchequer chamber on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to the compensation given him for the general damages and depreciation in value of his premises caused by the execution of the undertaking. But there is no discussion of the riparian right of access which aids APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to grant to relator a lease of state lands in a harbor for purposes connected with his business. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blaine & De Vries, for plaintiff:
Chapter 28, Laws of 1897, relating to Seattle in the settlement of the question. During the argument in the House of Lords (L. R. 5 H. L. 418) Lord Chelmsford asked, What is the distinction between cutting off access to a house by obstructing a road and cutting off access to it by embanking a river? and it was replied that that is not here made the subject of a specific claim. But Lord Chelmsford stated that the loss of access to the river at high water was claimed. The judgment in favor of plaintiff was reinstated, and upon the question of the right to compensation for loss of the water right, Cleasby, B., said plaintiff was entitled as riparian owner to the regular flow of the water all along the extremity of the ground, and that the deprivation of the water right was clearly an injurious affecting of the premises entitling him to compensation. That the plaintiff had caused the chief difficulty in his case by making the alleged ownership of the causeway to the water the pivot of the whole case, so that the taking of the strip of land was the only injurious act, whereas the main grievance was the destruction of the valuable water right. Hannen, J., said plaintiff as owner of land abutting on a navigable river was entitled to a right of access to the stream along his whole frontage, and not merely to the place where his causeway was located. Martin, B., said plaintiff had the easement, or right, or privilege, by whatever name it may be called, of the flow of the water of the river in its natural channel up to his garden wall. He had one entire thing. He had not the land alone, or the causeway alone, or the right of the flow of the river alone. He had all three combined. If anyone constructed an embankment so as to shut out his premises from the river he could have maintained an action against him for depriving him of his riparian right. Lord Chelmsford said there can be no doubt, and none has been entertained, that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in respect to the taking away of the causeway and landing place, and the injury arising to his house and premises by depriving them of access to the river. The only question upon which there has been a difference of opinion among the judges is as to whether or not compensation could be given in respect of the depreciation of the property by the conversion of the land between it and the river into a highway. Lord Cairns said: It has appeared to me that the property of the plaintiff in this case was what is commonly called riparian property. The meaning of that is, it had a water frontage. The meaning of its having a water frontage was this, that it had a right to the undisturbed flow of the river which passed along the whole frontage of the property, in the form in which it had been formerly accustomed to pass. Beyond all doubt the water right was a property belonging to the plaintiff for which compensation was to be made when it was taken away.

That decision settled the rule that deprivation of access to water is an element of damages to be awarded for the building of a roadway along the bank of the stream.

The owner of a wharf the length of which is less than that of his boat cannot be deprived of his right of access to his wharf by his neighbor's preventing the boat overlapping his wharf if the latter wharf is not in use. But a use of the wharf which would deprive his neighbor of the use of his wharf during the greater part of the time would be unreasonable. Original Hartlepool Collieries Co. v. Gibb, L. R. 5 Ch. In Lyon v. Fishmonger's Co. L. R. 10 Ch. 673, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 747, 33 L. T. N. S. 146, 24 Week. Rep. 1, where licensees of the conservators of the river Thames were about to fill up a little inlet in the river bank in such a way as to cut off access to a portion of plaintiff's wharf, the vice chancellor says that at the argument he asked counsel, Do you contend that the conservators of the river could make an embankment in front of the main front of plaintiff's wharf, and thereby prevent his having barges coming up to be loaded and unloaded immediately in front of his wharf?—and he states that this was a proposition so monstrous that counsel seemed to recoil from it and they have not ventured to assert such a right as that. It is in fact conceded that such a right could not be exercised, and that if it was attempted to be exercised plaintiff would be entitled to apply to the court for protection. And he states that a man who has a house opening on a highway has a right to step from his house into the highway, and whether the highway was of solid earth or a highway of water is immaterial. He has just the same right from a wharf on the bank of the Thames to step into a boat as he would have to step upon solid land from a house adjoining a public street into that highway. The court of chancery appeals said that it had been unable to find any authority for holding that a riparian proprietor where the tide ebbs and flows had any rights or natural easements vested in him similar to those of a riparian proprietor above the tide or beyond those of the public at large. And it reversed the decision of the vice chancellor. And Rose v. Groves and Atty. Gen. v. Conservators of the Thames were distinguished. The court says the wharfinger is amply protected in his right of access to his wharf by his interest as one of the public, and that there is no necessity to invent any private right in him as a riparian proprietor.

But upon appeal to the House of Lords L. R. 1 App. Cas. 602, the lord chancellor said unquestionably the owner of a wharf on the river bank has, like every other subject of the realm, the right of navigating the river as one of the public. This, however, is not a right coming to him qua owner or occupier of any lands on the bank, nor is it a right which per se he enjoys in a manner different from any other member of the public. But when this right of navigation is connected with an exclusive access to and from a particular wharf it assumes a very different character. It ceases to be a right held in common with the public, for other members of the public have no access to or from the river at the particular place; and it becomes a form of enjoyment of the land and of the river in connection with the land, the disturbance of which may be vindicated by an action or restrained by injunction. It appears to me impossible to say that a mode of enjoyment of land on the bank of a navigable river, which is thus valuable, and as to which the landowner can thus protect himself against disturbance, is otherwise than a right or claim to which the owner of land on the bank of the river is by law entitled within the meaning of the act requiring compensation for the destruction of such rights. Limiting Kearns v. Cordwainers' Co. 6 C. B. N. S. 383, 28 L. J. C. P. N. S. 285, 5 Jur. N. S. 1216. Lord Chelmsford said that he saw no sound principle upon which the distinction between the two descriptions of natural streams (navigable and non-navigable) could be supported. That he could not comprehend why a riparian owner of a tidal river should not possess all the peculiar advantages which the possession of his property with relation to the river afforded him, provided they occasioned no obstruction to the navigation. Lord Selborne said: Upon principle as well as upon the authorities I am of opinion that private riparian rights may and do exist in a tidal navigable river. The rights of a riparian proprietor as far as they relate to natural streams exist jure nature, because his land has by nature the advantage of being washed by the stream; if the facts of nature constitute the foundation of the right, I am unable to see why the law should not recognize and follow the course of nature in every part of the stream.

In Bell v. Quebec, L. R. 5 App. Cas. 93, 49 L. J. P. C. N. S. 1, 41 L. J. 451, which was a case of a bridge erected on the river lower down than plaintiff's land so as to interfere with navigation, the court said that in Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co. the House of Lords undoubtedly decided that the right of access to the water from riparian land is a private right which the owner of such land enjoys qua owner.

The rule of Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co. is applicable to every country where the same general law of riparian rights prevails as in England, unless it is excluded by some positive rule or binding authority of the lex loci. North Shore R. Co. v. Pion, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 612.

In Atty. Gen. v. Wemyss, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 192, the rule of Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co. was applied in case of an attempted reclamation of land on the shore, carried on under direction of the Crown, the effect of which would be to shut plaintiff off from the water. In that case the reclamation was for the purpose of securing a quay at the point of navigability beyond some mud banks along the shore. This would seem to have been in aid of navigation. It was claimed that the plaintiff's right to use the foreshore as an access to the sea was no greater than the right of any other of the public. But this contention was disallowed and his right established. It was then claimed that the Crown could not be sued. But a statute had provided for suit under certain circumstances which was held to include this case, so the right was established.

From this it appears that the English law now is that the right of access is property which cannot be taken away without compensation while the present system of laws exists.

The rule in Ireland.

excepting that there has been a tendency to hold that the right could not be taken away, even with compensation.

In Queen v. Rynd, 16 Ir. C. L. Rep. 29, where a railroad was built between plaintiff's land and the sea, it was held that the case was a proper one for the assessment of damages, Hayes, J., saying: "As to the effect which is likely to result . . . from the construction of the embankment, which will prevent the access from his land to the sea which he has heretofore enjoyed, whether for the exercise of right of navigation, or for bathing, or any other lawful purpose for which the subject may require to have such access, I think he has been injuriously affected, and ought to be compensated."

In a later case it was held that the right of access is not a proper subject for pecuniary compensation, and must be provided for by accommodation works. Jackson, J., says: "I think the prosecutor entitled to a communication with the sea for the purposes not connected with the mere use of the land qua land, viz., bathing, boating, and fishing." Ball, J., says it would be unreasonable and unjust to hold that plaintiff is bound to take a pecuniary compensation for his loss. Richards, B., says that plaintiff is entitled to access, not in virtue of any personal privilege, but in right of his land and as an easement incident to his land and his property, and parcel of the convenient and necessary use and enjoyment of his premises. It is the common-law right of all Her Majesty's subjects to fish, boat, and bathe in the open sea, and those who have land stretching down to the shore have facilities for enjoying all these rights which others differently circumstanced have not, and they necessarily use their land for the purpose of enabling them to avail themselves of these advantages. The sea is a public highway, and I confess I see no distinction in principle between the right of adjoining owners of land to the use and enjoyment of the sea and to the use of a public road. Blackburne, Ch. J., Pennefather, B., Perrin, J., and Lefroy, B., dissented, but not all from the fact that the right of access exists; some holding that compensation could be given and that the preservation of a mode of access was not necessary. Falls v. Belfast & B. R. Co. 12 Ir. L. Rep. 233.

The rule in Canada.

The English rule has been accepted in Canada, although some of the judges have been inclined to hold the other way.

In Re Miller and Great Western R. Co. 13 U. C. Q. B. 582, compensation for land on a water front had been allowed for the land under the water which belonged to the Crown, on the theory that the riparian owner would have the prior right to acquire title to it from the Crown. This was overruled by the court, Burns, J., saying the proprietor of land extending to the shore has no more right or authority over the waters beyond the shore or the lands beneath the waters than all other of Her Majesty's subjects have. He has no right to expect the Crown will grant or dispose of any peculiar advantage to him in preference to any other person.

street so as to cut the owner off from access to the water, the loss of access would form an element of the damages to be awarded.

A riparian owner has the right of access to the stream which cannot be cut off without paying him compensation. Chapman v. Oshkosh & M. River R. Co. 33 Wis. 629.

Damages for taking land by placing a pier on the bed of the river where it belongs to plaintiff cannot be recovered under a declaration alleging obstruction to plaintiff's right of access to his wharf. Maxwell v. Bay City Bridge Co. 41 Mich. 458.

While some of the above expressions were mere dicta, the rule was regarded as so well settled that it was stated as in the nature of a fundamental principle to illustrate some other rule.

The state cannot make a grant of the land under the water of the great lakes, which will impair the riparian rights of the owners of the shore. McLellan v. Prentiss, 85 Wis. 437.

The state cannot arbitrarily take away or destroy the rights of a riparian owner on a navigable lake without his consent, or without compensation or due process of law, for the sole purpose of benefiting some other riparian owner. Priewe v. Wisconsin State Land & I. Co. 93 Wis. 547, 33 L. R. A. 645.

But a riparian owner cannot recover damages for the diversion of the waters of the stream by a corporation under authority of the legislature for the purpose of improving the public navigation. Black River Improv. Co. v. La Crosse Boom & Transp. Co. 54 Wis. 669, 41 Am. Rep. 66.

In that case it is said the doctrine of the Delaplain case cannot be extended to a case where the state places obstructions in the navigable waters of the state for the purpose of improving the navigability of the stream.

In Cohn v. Wausau Boom Co. 47 Wis. 325, where a booming company had run a boom along the river in front of plaintiff's land, he claimed the right to have it removed as a nuisance. But the court, without directly considering the question of the right of access, held that plaintiff held his right as a riparian owner only by implied public license—as tenant by sufferance of the state—a right of which the exercise might always be prohibited by public law in aid of public use. The private right is a quasi intrusion upon the public right, tolerated only in private aid of navigation, and gives way ex necessitate rei to public measures in aid of navigation.

And that case was recognized in J. S. Keator Lumber Co. v. St. Croix Boom. Corp. 72 Wis. 82.

The rule in Massachusetts.

While there is some obscurity in the Massachusetts decisions, the rule is well settled there that the right of access cannot be cut off without compensation made.

In Ashby v. Eastern R. Co. 5 Met. 366, 38 Am. Dec. 426, it is stated in the headnote that where the value of the wharf is impaired by construction of a railroad across the flats beyond it the owner is entitled to recover of the proprietors of the railroad the damages thus sustained by him.

In Brayton v. Fall River, 113 Mass. 229, 18 Am. Rep. 470, where a city had obstructed the use of plaintiff's wharf by refuse coming down a sewer, the court said if the effect of defendant's acts had been merely to create a bar across the mouth of the creek so as to destroy or injure its navigability, the plaintiff could not have maintained an action because it was thereby rendered more difficult to reach his wharf. Those would have been injuries of the same kind sustained by other persons who have occasion to use the creek. But where the land has been filled up directly in front of plaintiff's wharf so that vessels could not gain access to it, the injury was special to plaintiff so as to give him a right of action.

In Davidson v. Boston & M. R. Co. 8 Cush. 91, a bridge without a draw had been erected over the flats in front of plaintiff's wharf, and he claimed damages for the interference with access to the wharf, which was on a small inlet or arm of the sea. The court said the plaintiff had no right, as riparian proprietor, to have his flats kept open for the purpose stated. So far as the railroad erected by authority of the legislature affected the right of plaintiff to pass or repass to and from his lands and wharves with vessels, it was a mere regulation of a public right, and not a taking of private property for public use, and gave the petitioner no claim for damages. In that case the instruction which the court was reviewing involved only the right to have the flats kept open; and the court said that solid structures might be built on the flats so as to obstruct the flow and reflow of the tide, without objection, provided a neighbor's access to his house or land was not wholly cut off. Beside crossing the flats the railroad company had crossed the channel from which the tide did not entirely ebb, and had built there the bridge without a draw, and although the exception did not directly involve the right of navigation to it, yet the court took the occasion to make the observations stated above, so that it plainly intended to rule that as against the public interest a wharf owner cannot complain that his access is cut off from the sea, if access to the water still exists.

And that case was followed in Thayer v. New Bedford R. Co. 125 Mass. 258, in which case a railroad was built across a dock so as to prevent boats coming up to plaintiff's wharf. The court said each individual as one of the public has a right to use navigable waters with his boats and vessels at pleasure, but it is in the exercise of a public and not a private right. He cannot thereby acquire a private right, for his use cannot in law be adverse. In that case plaintiff's dock opened from the end of a dock belonging to other persons through which he claimed a right of way by prescription, and it was this right of way which he claimed had been interfered with. The court denied his alleged right of way, and the case may possibly fall within the class which denies relief to persons injured by an obstruction of a stream, although from the peculiar circumstances of the case the plaintiff was practically the only one injured, since the railroad crossed the dock but a short distance below his own, thereby shutting off access to it.

In Blackwell v. Old Colony R. Co. 123 Mass. 1, which was an action for damages for building a bridge across a navigable arm of the sea, the court says that a private action could not be maintained for it because the injury was to the public navigation, and the mere fact that the plaintiff alone had a wharf above the bridge did not alter the case, the injury being only in degree and not in kind. It is further said that the case has no analogy to those in which the obstruction, being in front of complainant's land, entirely cuts off his access to the stream, and thereby causes a direct and peculiar injury to his estate.

If the passage to the wharf is filled up beyond the plaintiff's land the damage is the same to him as to the remainder of the public, and he cannot maintain a private action. Breed v. Lynn, 126 Mass. 367.

In Drury v. Midland R. Co. 127 Mass. 511, it was held that the right of free access to tide water is a right the obstruction of which is an element of damages to be considered in making compensation for the taking of land for railroad purposes. The court does not refer to the Davidson and Thayer Cases, and the only case in point cited is the head-note statement in the Ashby Case. The trial judge in that case said the mere fact that the road crosses the main channel there, with or without a bridge, standing alone, does not entitle the petitioner to damage if the railroad does not cross his land, but if the road does cross his land between the portion thereof on the main land and the channel, cutting him off from the use of that channel, which otherwise he could have made in connection with that portion, the petitioner is entitled to damages.

In Boston & W. R. Corp. v. Old Colony R. Corp. 12 Cush. 605, where there was a claim for damages for injuries to a wharf by the constructing of a railroad bridge in such a way that a pier of the bridge occupied space which could have served the purpose of a vessel's berthing at the wharf, the court said if petitioner sustained any loss by the bridge it was a damage arising from a partial impairment of the use of a public right and damages sustained by him in common with all the rest of the community and for which they could have no claim for damages. They had no right to occupy that part of the channel as a vessel's berth because it was upon a public navigable stream, and if occupied in fact more extensively by them than by others it would be by sufferance, and not of right. A claim for impeding access by vessels to the wharf was also made, but the court does not express any separate opinion upon that.

The cases holding the opposite rule.

A few courts have established a rule denying the existence of a riparian right of access which cannot be cut off by the state at its pleasure. The extent of this opposition may best be ascertained by examining the decisions.

New York.

The rule denying riparian rights started in New York in the case of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522.

In Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 146, improvements in the bed of the Hudson river, made under authority of the legislature, were made the basis of an action by a riparian owner on the ground that they impaired the use of his wharf. But the court said the right of plaintiff to navigate to and from his wharf is not denied. All that is contended for on the part of defendants is that the mode in which his right shall be exercised is subject to be controlled and regulated by the legislature as in their judgment the interest and convenience of the public may require. And it was further held that plaintiff could not maintain an action because the injury for which he sought remuneration was not peculiar to himself. It has been equally felt by a hundred others whose property is similarly situated.

That case was affirmed in Lansing v. Smith, 4 Wend. 21, 21 Am. Dec. 80, where Chancellor Walworth in the course of his opinion states that the 40 L. R. A.

The fact that the statute gave plaintiff a preference right to purchase tide lands abutting upon his upland gave him no vested right as against the state in such tide lands, until something in the nature of a contract had come into existence between himself and the state.

legislature could authorize erections in front of the wharf, as was done in Queen v. Smith, 2 Dougl. 445. The latter case, however, was an indictment against the owner of the wharf for cutting down erections made in front of his wharf, which were not on his land, and the case did not involve the power to place the erection so as to cut off his right to the wharf, but the rightfulness of his method of getting rid of them.

In Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522, where a railroad company under authority of the state had laid its tracks below highwater mark along the shore of the Hudson river so as to cut the riparian owner off from access to the stream, the court draws a distinction between the power of the King of England and of the state in this country, holding that the power of the state is the more extensive, and then adopts the language of the chancellor in Lansing v. Smith, placing the decision on that case without any reference to the fact that in the Lansing Case the riparian owner was injured only in so far as his wharf was further up the river than the obstruction to navigation, so that he was injured in common with all others situated as he was; while in the Gould Case the plaintiff alone was injured in his private right of access. It is held that the language of the chancellor denies to the plaintiff any private right to the waters where the railroad is constructed, and that he has no claim to damages. It is said that the exclusive right of access does not belong to the plaintiff because his lands adjoin navigable waters, but because no other man can enjoy them, for the reason that if he enters on the plaintiff's land without his permission he becomes a trespasser. The judge says: "I can see nothing peculiar in these rights which are not possessed by any other person living 1,000 miles from navigable waters, as I suppose he would have the right to the exclusive possession of his land, to come and go to and from it with teams and produce; and should any other person attempt to exercise the same right without the permission of the owner, he would be a trespasser." Edmonds, J., dissents. The question of the right of access, which was the principal one raised in the case, was not discussed, or even noticed, in the prevailing opinion.

The lower court said the plaintiff is in the position of thousands whose lands are deteriorated in value in consequence of improvements lawfully made upon the lands of others. Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. 12 Barb. 616.

That case was recognized in People v. Tibbetts, 19 N. Y. 523; People, Loomis, v. Canal Appraisers, 38 N. Y. 461; Smith v. Roebester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 398; Langdon v. New York, 98 N. Y. 129, and followed in Getty v. Hudson River R. Co. 21 Barb. 617, and in Re New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. 29 Hun, 269.

But in Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 133 N. Y. 79, 15 L. R. A. 618, the court held that the owner of land bounding upon a navigable river has the right of access to the navigable part of the river and the right to construct a landing or wharf. In that case the court, speaking of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co., says it believes that the proposition decided by it is not supported by any other judicial decision in this state, and if they were dealing with the question now as an original one it would not be difficult to show that the judgment in that case was a departure from precedent and contrary to reason and justice. It further says: The Gould Case has been frequently criticised and questioned, and it is believed has never been fully acquiesced in by the courts or the profession as a decisive authority or a correct exposition of the rights of riparian owners.

And in Kane v. New York Elev. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 164, 11 L. R. A. 645, the court said the Gould Case has been frequently criticised, and cannot be regarded as a decisive authority upon the point adjudged therein.

In Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 34 N. Y. S. R. 454, a second appeal of the case reported in 133 Y. N. 79, the court says, if the former decision deserves to be followed to its full extent it has no application to this case.

The Rumsey Case was followed in Hedges v. West Shore R. Co. 150 N. Y. 156.

The grant by the state of the right to build a railroad along the shore below high-water mark cannot extinguish or impair the easement of riparian rights which the owners of the upland have in the river. Saunders v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 144 N. Y. 75, 26 L. R. A. 878.

It thus appears that the riparian right of access is recognized, so far, at least, that it cannot be cut off by the erection of a railroad along the shore without compensating the owner.

Many of the cases in New York state have arisen out of controversies concerning the water front of Manhattan island. These cases have been decided as though they established the general rule, and cases from the island and those elsewhere have been cited indiscriminately in discussions of the law. But there is very strong reason for making a distinction between them. Before any private titles had been acquired on the island the municipality obtained a grant of a strip 400 feet wide around the whole island, so that all private titles were subordinate to this grant, and persons taking them cannot be regarded as in the true sense of the term riparian owners. Of course such owners could not complain of the use by the municipality of its property.

The city of New York took the absolute title to the tide ways surrounding the island, which enabled it to cut off the riparian owner from access to the water. Sage v. New York, 10 App. Div. 294.

In that case the right of the riparian owner against the right of the public to improve navigation arose, and the court adopted a middle ground between the Gould and Rumsey Cases.

It held that the riparian owner is entitled as against all but the Crown as trustee for the public at large to the right of access. But that a riparian owner's right of ingress and egress to his water front does not include a right to compensation for an interference therewith caused by a public improvement on the water front for the benefit of navigation. Sage v. New York, 154 N. Y. 61, 38 L. R. A. 606.

The court said that while the general rule prevents disturbance of riparian rights by public authority without making compensation, when the interest of the whole people requires the improvement of a water front for the benefit of navigation it seems to be the rule for the state, or the city of New York by permission of the state, to make such improvements upon the tide-water front without compensating the riparian owner other than by giving him the paramount right of purchasing in 40 L. R. A.

The validity of the grant is not questioned on account of any irregularity in the manner case of sale. The foundation of the rule does not seem to have been clearly pointed out. The right of the government rests upon the principle of implied reservation, and in every grant of land bounded by navigable water where the tide ebbs and flows, made by the Crown or the state as trustee for the public, there is reserved by implication the right to so improve the water front as to aid navigation for the benefit of the general public without compensation to the riparian owner. The implication springs from the title to the tide-way, the nature of the subject of the grant, and its relation to the navigable tide water.

The court in that case does not keep the distinction between Manhattan island property and other property, and between common and individual injuries, as clear as might be desired. The distinction made between rights against the state and those against its grantees is a new one in the form there presented, and, as will be seen above, has not been made in England.

The following cases were governed by the Gould Case or were from Manhattan island, and therefore subject to its peculiar law.

In People v. New York & S. I. Ferry Co. 68 N. Y. 71, the land under water had been granted to the owner of the adjacent upland, but the court in discussing his right says the ownership of the adjacent upland, however, gave him no title to or interest in the lands under water in front of his premises.

In Furman v. New York, 5 Sandf. 16, an attempt was made to enjoin the conveyance of land under water to a third person. But the court refused to interfere. The claim was not placed on the right of access to the water, but on the right to the soil under water. The court says the most that the owner of the upland can ask is the first offer in case the city decides to sell.

And that was affirmed in Furman v. New York, 10 N. Y. 567.

The owner of a pier which is obstructed by the deposit of refuse about it so as to prevent access to it has no claim to relief as a riparian owner, but his right, if any, is with the other people of the state whose use of the highway has been obstructed or disturbed by an individual. Hudson River R. Co. v. Loeb, 7 Robt. 418.

In Manhattan Gaslight Co. v. Barker, 36 How. Pr. 233, which was a motion to restrain the deposit of refuse in a public river in such a way as to impede access to the plaintiff's property, the court, on the authority of the Gould Case, said it cannot be inferred from the mere fact of proximity that the owner of land adjoining a public highway or fronting on a river which is a public highway has some interest therein simply by reason of his proximity. This is an error which has been extensively indulged in.

In New York v. Hart, 95 N. Y. 443, the court, in discussing the rights of an owner whose title went to high-water mark, says, after referring to the nature of the injury which the owner will suffer by being cut off from the water and the privileges which he will thereby lose, that the state may, by virtue of its ownership of the tide way, destroy them by a use or grant for public purposes and without compensation.

But it is held that when the city decides to sell its tide-way for the construction of wharves the riparian owner has a prior equity in the right to make the purchase.

of making it, but on account of lack of power to make it at all.

19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 353, and cases cited under note 4.

Reavis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The owner of a bulkhead cannot enjoin the erection of a pier beyond it in the water under permission of the proper authorities. His remedy, if any, is an action for damages. Taylor v. Brookman, 45 Barb. 106.

New Jersey.

In New Jersey the question developed a difference in opinion between Chief Justice Beasley and Chancellor Zabriskie, in which the chief justice finally prevailed, but the chancellor was very tenacious in holding to his opinion even after the law had been established against him.

In Gough v. Bell, 22 N. J. L. 441, where the question was as to the title to improved land on the water front, Carpenter J., cites cases holding that a riparian owner has a right of access to the water; and he says if this doctrine can be maintained it would seem to follow that no grant for a mere private purpose can be supported, which interferes with the established rights of such owner. It would simply be to take the property of one person in order to transfer it to another. But he says the decision of that question was not necessary in that case. Randolph J., however, says the rights of a person whose boundary is the sea extend only to high-water mark. What right has he beyond this boundary? All beyond belongs to the state; and although that may be slow to deprive him of any privilege, yet, can it be disputed that the state would have a right to fill up in front of any riparian owner to high-water mark, and erect there a fortification or lighthouse? And if no land was taken above high water would any private property be taken for public use which the riparian owner must be paid for under the Constitution? And on appeal, although the question was not discussed by all the judges, Potts, J., says (Bell v. Gough, 23 N. J. L. 375) the rights of the riparian owner are as sacred and inviolable as any others. They are appurtenances to the estate, constitute part of its intrinsic value, and can no more be taken from him contrary to law than any other portion of his property. Among these rights is that to the water as appurtenant to the upland. These doctrines rest upon sound and safe principles, and interpose an impassable barrier behind which the citizen may find protection against the power of the state itself. The doctrine that the legislature could grant to any private person for private use a strip of land along all the navigable water ways for private use, so as to destroy every pre-existing right of the riparian owner and interpose new owners between him and the navigable waters, would certainly be received with equal surprise and consternation. In this conclusion Nevius, J., concurred, but Valentine held that no such right existed.

In State, Roberts, v. Jersey City, 25 N. J. L. 525, which was an attempt to tax an improvement which had been made out into the water, the judge says it must now be accepted as the established law in New Jersey that the right of the owner of land bounded by a navigable river extends only to the actual high-water mark. The land under water may be granted by the state to a stranger at any time before it is reclaimed and annexed to the upland. Such is unquestionably the common law.

In Tinsman v. Belvidere Delaware R. Co. 26 N. J. L. 143, 60 Am. Dec. 565, a railroad company built 40 L. R. A.

Plaintiff applied to the board of state land commissioners to lease from the state the harbor area in front of certain tide lands of the city of Seattle owned by him. The uses for which he sought to lease the harbor area were as follows: "For the purpose of receiving by an embankment which injured a right which plaintiff had to float timber in the mouth of a creek, upon land belonging to another person some distance from his saw-mill, and it was held that he had a right of action for the injury.

In Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 532, 3 Am. Rep. 269, the chief justice, with whom concurred a majority of the court, says that he has not found that any other judge than Nevius and Potts and Edmunds, dissenting in Gould v. Hudson River R. Co., has ever based a decision on the ground of a riparian right in navigable waters. And he states that the theory of this position is based upon a misconception. That the right of access is not held by virtue of property, but that it attaches to the riparian owner as an individual, and he holds it in common with other citizens. The case is merely this: The man who owns the land next to navigable water is more conveniently situated for enjoying the public easement than the rest of the community. But a mere enumeration of the advantages of the position falls far short of showing that such proprietor has, in the jus publicum by the common law, more or higher rights than others. He further says that no ancient authority can be found which gives countenance to the notion that any such privileges as those claimed are appurtenant to the bank or ripa of a navigable river. The argument is built largely on the fact that the King had granted shore lands in gross. It is held that the license of the state to the owner to fill out upon the shore may be revoked at any time before it is exercised, and the shore may be granted to a third person. It is said that by such an appropriation the shore owner may sustain a greater inconvenience than will other citizens whose land does not run along the water, but the injury is in its essence and character the same, the difference being only in degree. From this decision Zabriskie, Ch., and Clement and Ogden, judges, dissented.

In 34 N. J. L. 533, Chancellor Zabriskie says that Judge Grier ruled in the unreported case of Bell v. Coles that the owner of land under the tide water could not cut off the access of the riparian owner to the water or fill up the land, and that because of this opinion the owner of the submerged land purchased a strip of the upland in order to acquire the right to utilize the land under water.

In Keyport & M. P. S. B. Co. v. Farmers' Transp. Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 13, the chancellor, speaking of Gough v. Bell, says, of eight judges who delivered opinions only one is silent upon the point in question. All the others more or less strongly maintain that in New Jersey the shore owner has vested rights in the water in front of him that cannot be taken away. And not only the opinions of the judges, but the history of public, professional, judicial, and legislative opinion on this matter, shows that this was and had been for years the prevalent view in the state.

And in Keyport & M. P. S. B. Co. v. Farmers' Transp. Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 511, where the question was as to the right of a wharf owner to have the space at the side of his wharf kept open, it is said that public sentiment from the earliest times to this day, and the whole course of legislative action in this state, have recognized a natural equity, so to speak, in the riparian owner to preserve and improve the contact of his property with the navigable water.

rail and water, shipping by rail and water, fish and other food products of the water, curing and canning cod, salmon, and other fish and water products; of keeping and maintaining a retail and wholesale fish market for the handling of shell and other fish from the waters of the Pacific Ocean, Alaska, and the inlets, bays and arms of the Pacific Ocean, and the lakes and rivers of Oregon, Washington, British Columbia, and Alaska; and in the handling of fresh, salt, cured, and canned fish in and between the city of Seattle and the markets in the state of Washington and other states and foreign countries; and for the manufacture or

The state may grant the right to a railroad company to bridge a stream, and it may take the necessary land under water for the purpose of the bridge, although the effect will be an interference with the wharfage rights of the riparian owner. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. New York & L. E. R. Co. 23 N. J. Eq. 187.

The riparian owner who has not in fact reclaimed the land under water in front of his bank has as riparian owner no legal right to or in respect to the land in front of his property which will prevent the state from granting it to any person, and that without compensation to such owner. American Dook & Improv. Co. v. Public Schools, 39 N. J. Eq. 409.

But it has been said that the state cannot license a person to erect wharves in front of land owned by a corporation, although the corporation cannot itself acquire such a right. State v. Brown, 27 N. J. L. 18.

Washington and Oregon.

The Washington Constitution provides that the state asserts its ownership of the beds and shores of all navigable waters in the state up to and including the line of ordinary high tide in the waters where the tide ebbs and flows, and up to and including the lines of ordinary high water within the banks of all navigable rivers and lakes; and it was held in Eisenbach v. Hatfield, 2 Wash. 236, 12 L. R. A. 632, that by reason of that provision the riparian owner has no special or peculiar rights in the water as an incident to his estate. The authorities on the subject are considered, and support for the judgment is found in them. But Stiles, J., delivers a strong dissenting opinion.

In Oregon a series of decisions established that the tide lands belonged to the state. Hinman v. Warren, 6 Or. 411; Parker v. Taylor, 7 Or. 446; Parkers v. Rogers, 8 Or. 183, and in the opinions it was incidentally remarked that the state was under no obligation to recognize the rights of individual owners.

So, in Shively v. Welch, 10 Sawy. 136, it is said by way of argument that the owners of upland in Oregon had no right to or interest in land under the water, or any right to purchase the same until and except for the act of 1872.

At the same time, in Wilson v. Welch, 12 Or. 353, Thayer, J., recognized riparian rights as property which could be taken only for public use and upon giving compensation.

So, in a Federal case it was held that the owner of land abutting on tide lands in Oregon, and not disposed of by the state or the United States, has a right of access from his land to the water, and may erect and maintain a private wharf for his own convenience so long as he does not interfere with the public use, and subject to the regulating power of the legislature. Case v. Loftus, 39 Fed. Rep. 730, 5 L. R. A. 684.

In Parker v. West Coast Pkg. Co. 17 Or. 510, 5 L. R. A. 61, it is stated in a headnote by the court that an owner of land bounded by navigable waters possesses important riparian rights, and in the opinion, from which there is no dissent, it is stated that the bed of the river belongs to the state in its sovereign capacity, subject to the riparian rights of the owner of the land above and adjacent thereto. The state, however, cannot sell it, nor can the state control its use except to increase the facilities for navigation and commerce.

Finally, in Bowly v. Shively, 22 Or. 414, the court, after a full review of the authorities in that state, held that the expressions of opinion that riparian proprietors had a right to wharf out, of which they could not be deprived, were mere dicta or the individual opinion of the judge making them; and the rule was announced that the state had an absolute right to dispose of the tide lands, and that the riparian proprietor had no right whatever therein.

This decision was placed upon the ground that the question was settled by the prior Oregon decisions. But decisions holding that the title to the tideways in the state are not necessarily inconsistent with a riparian right of access to the water.

Another claim made in the opinion is that the state has the King's ius privatum in the property which it can dispose of as he could. But the claim of a private right resting in the public, even when that public is organized, is not a satisfactory one. The only question is for what purpose the public holds its title. Furthermore the court relies on Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 532, 3 Am. Rep. 269, and Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522, saying that the rule of that case is a rule of property in New York, and has never been questioned. It thereby overlooks the fact that that case had been expressly overruled by the New York courts two months before, and in the overruling case it was stated that the Gould Case had never been held to represent the true rule upon the subject.

Lord, J., who delivered the opinion, announced his disapproval of the rule of the case.

The Bowly Case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the rule was fixed by the state law, which was binding upon the United States courts.

The rule of the Federal courts.

The question of riparian rights against a state or individuals is one of state law which is binding on the Federal courts. Shively v. Bowly, 152 U. S. 1, 38 L. ed. 331.

The Federal courts have, however, expressed opinions upon the question, which have more or less influenced the decisions in state courts. Dutton v. Strong, 1 Black, 23, 17 L. ed. 23; Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984.

And in St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeir, 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74, the court apparently assumed that it was settled that riparian owners had rights in the adjacent waters.

In Avery v. Fox, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 246, where, for the purpose of improving navigation, the channel of a river which flowed past plaintiff's land was moved so that the water would be diverted from the old course, it was held that the riparian owner had the right to have the water flow past his land, of which he could not be deprived without compensation.

But when the right of the Federal government to make improvement in aid of commerce conflicted with the right of the individual, the right of the individual was held not to exist.

In Hawkins' Point Light-House Case, 39 Fed. Rep. 77, where the United States had placed a lighthouse in the water in front of property the owner of which had by the state statutes the title to the soil and the right to wharf out, the court says it is by no means true that any dealing with a navigable stream which impairs the value of the storage of ice to be used in the packing and handling of fish and other food products of the water, and the furnishing ice to the steamers and other craft touching at said city of Seattle, and to the towns and places upon Puget Sound and tributary country." The board of harbor-line commissioners rejected the application of plaintiff to lease on two grounds: "First. That the plaintiff, A. A. Denny, must adjust or acquiesce in the adjustment of tide lands purchased by him as aforesaid to the new plat thereof, before any lease will be granted him for the harbor area aforesaid, or any part thereof. Second. That the rights of riparian owners gives them a claim for compensation. The contrary doctrine that, in order to develop the greatest public utility of a water way, private convenience must often suffer without compensation, has been sanctioned by repeated decisions of the supreme court. If necessary to the free navigation of the stream the owner will be prevented from extending any structure into it.

In Gibson v. United States, 166 U.S. 299, 41 L. ed. 996, the United States government had built a dike in the Ohio river and confined the water to the main channel, the effect of which was to prevent the free ingress and egress of boats to the landing of plaintiff, a riparian owner, so that at the time of year when the landing was most needed it could not be reached by boat. The court held that the riparian owner's rights were subject to the consequences of the improvement by the government of its navigable waters, and that the constitutional provision requiring compensation for private property taken for public use does not apply because the private property was not taken, but only damaged. The effect of that decision is that the right of access is not property, although the opinion does not directly say so.

But the lower court, whose opinion was affirmed (Gibson v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 18), directly held that the owner of a wharf on the bank of a river has no right of property below low water mark, and no property in the flow of water or in the approach to land. The court says that if the riparian owner had any such right it must be based on prescription, which is at variance with the doctrine of Lyon v. Fishmongers' Co., which holds the right to be a natural one. It is further said that the riparian owner's right was a mere license which might be revoked at any time, relying on Lansing v. Smith, Homochitto River Comrs. v. Withers, and Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co.

When the court denies the existence of property in the right of access to the water it follows a very small minority of the courts which have considered the question.

A change in the channel of a river so as to prevent the flow of the water to the land of a riparian owner will not render the United States liable to make compensation as for property taken. Friend v. United States, 30 Ct. Cl. 94. In that case stones and dirt were dumped in the channel of the river, by which the access to the plaintiff's land was cut off.

The right to regulate commerce involves the right to regulate navigation, and this involves the use of submerged lands. The title of the riparian owner, although extending to the current of the stream, is subject to the right of Congress to occupy the submerged land for the erection of structures in aid of commerce between the states, and it is immaterial that such structures are placed in the water in such a way as to interfere with the riparian owner's access to deep water. The right of access to deep water is a right subordinate to the right of the state and the Federal government to control the stream in so far as necessary for purposes of commerce. Scranton v. Wheeler, 18 U.S. App. 152, 57 Fed. Rep. 803, 6 C. C. A. 585. This case was reversed in 41 L. ed. 313, evidently for lack of jurisdiction.

Some of the state courts have followed the above decisions.

Although the riparian owner takes the title to the soil under water his right is subordinate to that of the United States government to make improvements in aid of navigation, so that he is entitled to no compensation, although the government erects a pier in such a manner as to cut him off from access to the navigable water. Scranton v. Wheeler (Mich.) 71 N. W. 1091.

The right of access of a riparian owner is subordinate to the power of Congress over the subjects of interstate commerce. Winifrede Coal Co. v. Central R. & Bridge Co. 24 Ohio L. J. 173.

Other decisions which have denied the riparian owner's right.

In Philadelphia v. Scott, 51 Pa. 80, 22 Am. Rep. 738, it is said that while the owner of land on a tide river has an absolute title to the soil to ordinary high-water mark, between this line and the ordinary low-water line his title is qualified by the public right of navigation. This prevents his use of the soil to the prejudice of the public right, and confers on the state the right to improve the intermediate space for public use without compensation.

All land below high-water mark belongs to the state, and before it is reclaimed by the riparian owner the state may grant it for public use to whoever it sees fit. New Jersey Zinc & I. Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 398, 1 L. R. A. 133.

In Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 124 U.S. 656, 31 L. ed. 543, the court said that over submerged land of the navigable waters of the state of New Jersey the state had absolute and exclusive dominion, including the right to appropriate them to such use as might best serve its views of public interest.

In Homochitto River Comrs. v. Withers, 29 Miss. 21, 64 Am. Dec. 123, where the state had diverted a stream from its ancient course, which flowed through plaintiff's land, the court said the state, in virtue of her right of eminent domain, has the paramount right to control and dispose of everything within her limits which is not absolutely and exclusively private property, to the promotion of the public good.

It is competent for the legislature to grant to municipal corporations the exclusive right to build wharves on public navigable rivers without compensation to the adjacent landowner for the land so taken for the purpose. As against the state the riparian owner has no rights to the river below high-water mark. Ravenswood v. Fleming, 22 W. Va. 52, 45 Am. Rep. 435, the court, from its argument as well as from its citation of authorities, apparently intended to follow the rule of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. and Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co.

But in Barre v. Fleming, 29 W. Va. 314, Snyder, J., cites the rule of Yates v. Milwaukee, that the riparian owner has the right of access to the navigable part of the river in front of his land and to make a landing, wharf, or pier, and states that the only question involved and actually decided in Ravenswood v. Fleming was that the statute denying to a riparian owner of a lot within an incorporated town the right to build a wharf, pier, or bulkhead without the consent of the town council was constitutional. And he further said that in the execution of the public trust the state may by statute confer upon her municipal corporations use for which the plaintiff, A. A. Denny, desires to lease said harbor area is not a convenience of commerce or navigation, and the structure which, according to said application, he contemplates placing on said harbor area, is not a wharf, dock, or other structure, within the meaning of the Constitution and tide-land laws of the state of Washington."

In the view of this cause taken by the court, the right to authorize the establishment of public wharves or landings within their corporate limits without compensation to the owner of the fee.

In Tomlin v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. Co. 32 Iowa, 106, it is said that by the rules of the common law the owner of land along the shore of a navigable river is entitled to no right either in its shores or waters as an incident of his ownership, except the contingent ones of alluvion and dereliction. He is not entitled to damages for an embankment made along the banks of such river by authority of the state, the effect of which is to deprive him of free access to the stream. This ruling is placed upon the authority of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. and Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co.

And that case was followed in Ingraham v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 34 Iowa, 249.

The state may reclaim the submerged land for park purposes without paying compensation to an abutting owner for deprivation of his right of access to the water. The court says no court has yet gone so far as to hold that the owner of a natural shore is entitled to riparian rights as against the sovereign. When one man buys a lot whose boundaries are certain and defined it is his privilege to permit it to remain open, uncultivated, and unproductive so long as he pleases. Until he improves it the owner of the adjoining lot has an implied license to pass over it, to enjoy the benefits of the light and air and other incidental advantages which it affords him, but the former may cut off these advantages by building upon his lot, without being liable in damages to the person who has hitherto enjoyed them. And the same rule applies in favor of the government in respect to its public waters. People, Atty. Gen., v. Revell, 29 Chicago Legal News, 345.

The effect of statutes.

In almost every instance in which the court has denied the riparian right the legislature has nullified the decision by recognizing it.

Under the New Jersey act of March 21, 1871, a grant of the land under water could be made only to the owner of the upland adjoining. Polhemus v. Bateman, 60 N. J. L. 163.

A license under the act of 1851 to fill in the tide lands confers rights on riparian owners only. New Jersey Zinc & I. Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 398, 1 L. R. A. 133, Citing Brown v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 27 N. J. L. 648.

The statutory law in New Jersey gave riparian owners the right of erecting wharves and piers, and in case of their neglect to take from the state its grant on the terms offered, then it gives the lands to a stranger making compensation to the riparian owner for the value of his privilege, and who, succeeding to the state's title, would have no relation to the riparian owner except that of common boundary. Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 124 U. S. 656, 31 L. ed. 543.

Under the New York statutes the commissioners of the land office can convey titles to the lands under the waters only to the owners of the upland. E. G. Blakslee Mfg. Co. v. E. G. Blakslee's Son's Iron Works, 129 N. Y. 155.

In Iowa a statute has provided that a railroad company must make compensation for erecting a railroad between high and low water mark. Renwick v. Davenport & N. W. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 664, Affirmed, Davenport & N. W. R. Co. v. Renwick, 102 U. S. 180, 26 L. ed. 51.

Under a statute giving riparian owners the exclusive right to wharf out, deposits made in front of a wharf by a municipal corporation without authority will be a nuisance for which the owner may maintain an action. Garitte v. Baltimore, 53 Md. 422.

The Florida act of 1866 divested the state of its title, and gave the land under water to the owner of riparian land as far as the edge of the channel. Geiger v. Filor, 8 Fla. 326; Sullivan v. Moreno, 19 Fla. 200.

Access cut off by railroad.

So far as this question has been considered, it seems that a railroad cannot be permitted to cut off the right of a riparian owner without making compensation to him. Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 N. Y. 522, was overruled by Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 133 N. Y. 79, 15 L. R. A. 818.

In Iowa it was held that because a riparian owner has no right of access to navigable water he is not entitled to damages for being deprived of such access by the construction of a railroad along the shore. Tomlin v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. Co. 32 Iowa, 106, 7 Am. Rep. 176.

And in Houghton v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 370, where a railroad was placed between plaintiff's land and the water, it is said that Tomlin v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. Co. was not questioned, but that the question was whether or not the place where the railroad was built was below high-water mark.

But that rule was changed by statute, and in Backus v. Detroit, 49 Mich. 110, 43 Am. Rep. 447, Cooley, J., says that the doctrine of the Tomlin Case is unsound.

A riparian owner cannot be deprived of the right of access by a railroad company in building its works on the shore of a river without compensation. Organ v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 51 Ark. 235.

In Chicago & P. R. Co. v. Stein, 75 Ill. 41, where the claim was made that access to plaintiff's property had been injured by the erection of a bridge over the river, there seems to be no question on the part of the court that in case of injury compensation must be made, but it was held that no injury was shown in that case.

Right as against private individual.

The owner of a wharf cannot willfully and unreasonably moor boats along the front of the wharf in such a way that they overlap and prevent access to the slip of an adjoining owner. Delaware River S. B. Co. v. Burlington & B. Steam Ferry Co. 81 Pa. 103.

In Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 29 Ind. 364, 95 Am. Dec. 644, where a wharf boat had been obstructed by steamers tying up at an adjoining wharf, the court said if the navigator cannot load his boat in invitum against the soil, or obstruct the proprietor's access to the river, still less should he be allowed thus to use the wharf boat.

The right of a riparian owner to wharf out is not affected by the allotment of the ground in front to another person as an oyster bed under the state statutes. Prior v. Swartz, 62 Conn. 139, 18 L. R. A. 668.

A riparian owner may maintain an action against a third person who interferes with his right of access to his wharf. Folsom v. Freeborn, 13 R. I. 200.

Rafts cannot be moored so as to deprive wharf owners of access to their wharves. Harrington v. Edwards, 17 Wis. 587, 84 Am. Dec. 768.

A riparian owner may maintain an action to enjoin the obstruction by a private owner of the public stream in such a way that access to his property is cut off. Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156.

it is not necessary to discuss the first ground of the rejection of the application to lease by the board of harbor-line commissioners. Article 15, § 1, of the Constitution of the state, relating to tide lands, among other things declares: "Nor shall any of the area lying between any harbor line and the line of ordinary high tide, and within not less than 50 feet nor more than 600 feet of such harbor line (as the commission shall determine), be sold or

An action may be maintained against a boom company for cutting off access to the landing place of a riparian owner. French v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 145 Mass. 351.

An owner of a private wharf, who is in possession, may enjoin the construction of another wharf in front of it which will cut him off from navigable water, unless the persons making it show a lawful right to erect it. Cowell v. Martin, 43 Cal. 606.

A settler on public land bordering on tide water has, as against a private individual, a right of access to the water which the courts will interfere to protect. Lewis v. Johnson, 76 Fed. Rep. 478. The court says that the law of the Buqueleuch and Lyon Cases was affirmed in Shively v. Bowlby.

A tenant cannot during the term acquire a right to maintain a pier in front of the landlord's wharf which he can retain after surrendering the wharf. Bedlow v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. 112 N. Y. 263, 2 L. R. A. 629, Reversing 44 Hun, 378.

Estoppel by grant.

Municipalities have been held to have estopped themselves by their grants of wharf rights from interfering with access to them.

A city which has granted a wharf right cannot cut off access to the wharf by erecting a bulkhead in front of the wharf. Langdon v. New York, 93 N. Y. 129; Williams v. New York, 105 N. Y. 419; Kingsland v. New York, 110 N. Y. 569; Kingsland v. New York, 45 Hun, 198.

If the city has granted a right to erect a wharf and take toll it cannot afterwards build a bulkhead beyond the end of the wharf so as to cut off access to it. Crocker v. New York, 15 Fed. Rep. 406.

But in Whitney v. New York, 6 Abb. N. C. 329, note, it was held that a covenant by the city that the grantee should have the wharfage from a wharf which he should make in the river, not extending to the extreme line owned by the city, would not deprive the city of the power to erect a wharf beyond the end of the former one which would cut the former one off from the water.

Special reasons for refusing relief.

There are some cases in which relief has been refused, which cannot be regarded as direct decisions upon the main question.

Among these are Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 146, in which the access was merely rendered more difficult, and complainant was injured as others were.

The owner of a wharf cannot enjoin an adjoining owner from extending his wharf further into the stream, although the effect is to make the access to his wharf more difficult. Van der Brooks v. Currier, 2 Mich. N. P. 21.

So, the existence of a street along the river front will cut off the riparian right of the person whose land borders on the street. United States v. Morris, 23 Wash. L. Rep. 745, 24 Wash. L. Rep. 168.

If a riparian owner is entitled to compensation for deprivation of his right by the filling up of the flats in front of his property so as to cut him off from the water it must be claimed at the time. In a case where no attempt was made to enforce the right for a long time, the court says: "We do not think that at this late day they afford any ground, if ever they did afford any ground, for the equitable interference of the court." Clarke v. Providence, 16 R. I. 337, 1 L. R. A. 727.

Right as against improvement of navigation.

In Wisconsin, New York, and the Federal courts 40 L. R. A.

it is held that the right of the public to improve the navigation of the stream is superior to the riparian owner's right of access. Black River Improv. Co. v. La Crosse Boom & Transp. Co. 54 Wis. 669, 41 Am. Rep. 66; Cohn v. Wausau Boom Co. 47 Wis. 325; Sage v. New York, 154 N. Y. 61, 38 L. R. A. 606; Gibson v. United States, 29 Ct. Cl. 18; Scranton v. Wheeler, 16 U. S. App. 152, 57 Fed. Rep. 803, 6 C. C. A. 585.

Summary.

It thus appears that by what may be called the common law because it is that which is almost universally adopted by the courts without the aid of statute, a riparian owner has a right of access which cannot be impaired by the state by granting rights to other individuals which will interfere with it. A railroad, wharf, or embankment cannot be authorized which will cut off the right of access without making compensation to the riparian owner.

This rule has not been adopted in New Jersey, Iowa, Washington, and Oregon. In these states the effect of the decisions has been in part neutralized by statutes giving privileges to riparian owners.

In England and countries following its law the riparian right cannot be taken by the public for improving navigation without compensation.

If the riparian right of access is recognized as property it cannot be taken in this country without compensation because of constitutional protection. To obviate this result the United States Supreme Court has refused, contrary to the rule elsewhere, to recognize it as property.

The same result is obtained in New York by holding that the private right, although property, is subordinate to the public right to improve the waters for navigation. The court holds that in every grant of land bounded on navigable water made by the state, there is reserved by implication the right to so improve the water front as to aid navigation for the benefit of the general public without compensation to the shore owner.

And in Wisconsin it is held that the riparian owner holds his rights by implied public license. That the exercise of this right may be prohibited by public law in aid of public use. That it gives way ex necessitate rei to public measures in aid of navigation.

From the fact that navigable waters are natural public highways there is very little analogy in other branches of the law to aid in settling the conflict between public and private rights in regard to them. The position taken by the New York and Wisconsin courts, that the right of the riparian owner ceases to exist when it conflicts with the public right to improve navigation, is different from that existing in other departments of the law. Generally the private right is regarded as absolute, and when the public wishes to abridge it compensation must be made. It would seem that the harmony of the law would be much better subserved by extending the same rule to riparian rights, and requiring the public to compensate the owner in case its needs necessitate the destruction of his rights. The Wisconsin method of stating the rule seems preferable to that in New York, but it is likely to prove a surprise to the riparian owner to find that after he has exercised and been regarded as possessing certain rights for years it may be they are in effect only a license which the public may revoke at pleasure. granted by the state, nor its rights to control the same relinquished, but such area shall be forever reserved for landings, wharves, streets, and other conveniences of navigation and commerce." As asserted by counsel for plaintiff, the word "commerce" is one of wide significance, and in its general sense may mean almost any transaction or intercourse between men. But the word has been restricted by the courts according to the context in which the term has been used. Section 2 of article 15 of the Constitution of the state declares: "The legislature shall provide general laws for the leasing of the right to build and maintain wharves, docks, and other structures, upon the areas mentioned in § 1 of this article, but no lease shall be made for any term longer than thirty years; or the legislature may provide by general laws for the building and maintaining upon such area wharves, docks, and other structures." Counsel for plaintiff contend that the words "navigation and commerce" do not appear in the 2d section, and that the phrase "and other conveniences of navigation and commerce" appears in the 1st section; that the 2d section provides for laws for the leasing of the right to build and maintain wharves, docks, and other structures, and that the purpose for which these "other structures" are to be used, or their nature, is not defined; and also argue that navigation and commerce mean one and the same thing, and that commerce includes navigation, and that the word "commerce" here is used in its broadest import; that the words "navigation and commerce" are words of enumeration, and not those of definition; and that the court is called upon to define their meaning, and such definition should properly be made from a consideration of the people and their wants at the time the Constitution was adopted. It is also argued that the reservation of harbor areas is a very broad one, and a comparison is made between the harbor area in front of the city of Seattle and that of other noted emporiums of the world. The contention that "navigation" is included within "commerce," and means the same thing, cannot be maintained. The word "navigation," as used in the 1st section of the article of the Constitution quoted, is clearly used as a qualification of the word "commerce," and the provisions for maintaining upon the harbor area wharves, docks, and other structures, by or through the state, refers to structures which are conveniences of navigation and commerce. We think the language as well as the sense of these two sections of the Constitution is plain, and the ordinary rules of statutory and constitutional construction fit this sense. It is plainly said in § 2 that the wharves, docks, and other structures are those mentioned in § 1. Then the rule of ejusdem generis is plainly applicable here, and "other structures" must fall within the genus "conveniences of navigation and commerce." Our Constitution, in its provisions relating to harbor areas in front of cities, is unlike that of any other state Constitution that has been submitted to our attention. Therefore it would probably be useless to attempt to find authority to aid in the construction of our Constitution. The state of Washington at its formation had before it the experience of the world in the regulation and control of harbor areas. The constitutional convention well knew that private control of these waters had always been inimical to free navigation and to the public interests. The insidious and plausible pretexts for the establishment of private interests in such waters were also well understood, and, however large the harbor areas within the domain of the state, it was well known, from the history of the past and the tendencies of the present, that the organization of private interests in combination would be sufficiently powerful to pervade all these waters. A very fair comment upon the import of these constitutional provisions is found in the Report of the Massachusetts State Board on Docks and Terminal Facilities (1897) p. 37, in which it is said: "Alive to modern tendencies, the state of Washington, in her Constitution, article 15, declares that no water areas beyond high-water marks shall be sold or relinquished by the state, 'but such areas shall be forever reserved for landings, wharves, and streets, and other conveniences of navigation and commerce.' Subsequently a harbor-line commission established harbor lines in the navigable tide waters of the state adjacent to the cities, with a view to providing for docks having a length of 600 feet and an avenue fronting thereon of from 100 to 250 feet wide. Thus the water front of all the cities in the state is to be forever preserved in uniform condition, under control of the public. In the interest of economical and convenient commercial uses, secure from the encroachment of individuals or corporations." "Curing and canning fish, maintaining a retail and wholesale fish market, and the storage of ice for packing and handling fish," are not conveniences of "navigation and commerce," and maintaining establishments of that character and structures erected for such purposes are not the "other structures" mentioned in the Constitution relating to this subject. The act of the legislature (Laws 1897, p. 229, § 53) does not contemplate a lease for any other purposes than those specified in the Constitution. The act specially reserves to the state of Washington "the right to regulate, either under rules of the commission or legislative enactment, or by both methods, the rates of wharfage, dockage, and other tolls to be imposed by the lessee upon commerce for any of the purposes," etc.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

STATE of Connecticut

v.

(.....Conn.....)

A state statute making it unlawful to keep a place in which the business of transmitting money to be placed or bet on any horse race, etc., whether within or without the state, is permitted or carried on, or to be concerned in such business, is not an unconstitutional regulation of interstate commerce as applied to an agent of a telegraph company, who keeps such place or is engaged in such business, and transmits the money to another state by telegraph.

(May 3, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County, Waterbury District convicting him of keeping a place where betting was carried on and transmitting money to another state to be wagered on a horse race. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles E. Perkins and M. Kenealy, for appellant:

The business of sending telegraphic messages from one state to another is interstate commerce.

Prentice, Pol. Powers, p. 280.

The sending money by telegraph is as much interstate commerce as sending messages.

Interstate commerce is protected against legislation by states in exactly the same way, and to the same extent, as foreign commerce.

A state cannot be allowed to fix for itself whether certain articles or the dealing in them are so injurious or deleterious as to take them out of the protection of interstate commerce.

Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36.

The state cannot, under any circumstances, make regulations as to telegraph companies sending money or messages to other states, as that matter is entirely under the control of Congress.

Whenever the law of the state amounts essentially to a regulation of commerce with foreign nations or within the states, as it does when it inhibits, directly or indirectly, the receipt of an imported commodity, it comes in conflict with a power which in this particular has been exclusively vested in the general government.

Mr. Nathaniel R. Bronson, for the state:

The line of distinction between that which constitutes an interference with commerce, and that which is a mere police regulation is sometimes exceedingly dim and shadowy. It is not doubted that Congress has the power to go beyond the general regulations of commerce which it is accustomed to establish, and to descend to the most minute directions, if it shall be deemed advisable; and that, to whatever extent ground shall be covered by these directions, the exercise of state power is excluded. In establishing police regulations, a state may incidentally affect commerce; but they, when not in conflict with any act of Congress, are valid.

Hall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The act creating the offense charged is directed against that form of gambling known as "pool selling," including bets or wagers on the result of any trial of speed, skill, or endurance. Pub. Acts 1893, p. 240. It prohibits (1) keeping any place with apparatus or devices for the purpose of carrying on such gambling; (2) keeping any place where pool selling of any kind, either directly or indirectly, is permitted or carried on; (3) keeping any place in which the business of transmitting money to any race track or other place, there to be placed or bet on any horse race, etc., whether within or without the state, is permitted or carried on; (4) making any such wager, or buying or selling any such pools; (5) being concerned in buying or selling any such pools; (6) being concerned in carrying on the business of the transmission of money to any race track, etc. The defendant is charged in the first count with a violation of the third prohibition, and in the second count with a violation of the sixth. The defense relies on the alleged unconstitutionality of the act.

The following case is presented by the record:

"On the trial of the case to the jury, upon the plea of not guilty, the state claimed and offered evidence to prove that on the 29th day of January, 1897, the defendant, in the city of Waterbury, was employed by the New Jersey News & Electric Telegraph Company as the manager of its telegraph office there located; that, as such manager, he received from one — a telegraphic message in the ordinary form used for transmitting messages, addressed to the Jersey City Commission Company, Jersey City, New Jersey, directing the said Jersey City Commission Company there to bet for the sender of said message the sum of money named therein, and to draw upon Mills & Company, New York city, New York, for said money; that, at the time of delivery of said message to the defendant, the said — deposited with the defendant said sum of money, to be by him transmitted by telegraph to Mills & Company, New York city, subject to the draft of the said Jersey City Commission Company; and that said telegraph message was by the defendant transmitted by telegraph to the Jersey City Commission Company, and said money was by the defendant transmitted by telegraph to Mills & Company; and that the defendant knew that the purpose in said transmissions was to have said money bet upon a horse race without this state. The state offered evidence of no other violation of the law. The defendant claimed, and offered evidence to prove, and claimed he had proved, that, in the receipt of said message and of said money, he was acting as the agent of his said employer, in the ordinary course of business of a telegraph company engaged in the business of telegraphing of messages and moneys. The defendant admitted that he knew the purpose for which said money was sent and said message transmitted.

"The defendant, in writing, requested the court to charge the jury as follows: '(1) That if the jury shall find that the accused, as charged in the first count of the complaint of the prosecuting attorney, did possess, keep, manage, maintain, and occupy a certain room, office, and place in which the business of transmitting money to a certain race track or race tracks, or other places without this state, there to be placed or bet on certain horse races, games, and competitions, with full knowledge thereof, and that said keeping, possessing, managing, maintaining, and occupying was in the ordinary course of business of a telegraph company, he is guilty of no offense against the laws of this state, as any statute of this state prohibiting such acts would be, and is, in violation of and against the provisions of the Constitution of the United States vesting in the Congress of the United States the power of regulating commerce between the states.

(2) That if the jury shall find that the accused did in fact, as charged in the second count of said complaint, transmit (by telegraph) money from the city of Waterbury to a place without this state, for the purposes alleged in this complaint, and that said transmission was in the ordinary course of the business of a telegraph company, he is not guilty of any offense against the laws of the state; and that a statute of this state which prohibits such act is void, being contrary to said provision of the Constitution of the United States.' The court refused to so charge the jury, but did charge the jury as follows: 'That notwithstanding the jury should find that in the keeping, etc., of the place as set forth in the complaint, the accused kept said place for the ordinary purposes of a telegraphic business, yet, if the business of transmitting money for the purposes charged in the complaint was carried on in said place, the accused was guilty of a violation of the laws of this state, and the statute prohibiting such act was constitutional; and that if the jury should find that accused did, as charged in the second count of said complaint, knowingly transmit (by telegraph) moneys from the city of Waterbury to a place without this state, to be bet upon a horse race, that the accused is guilty of a violation of the laws of this state, notwithstanding such transmission may have been in the ordinary course of the business of a telegraph company, and that the statute of this state prohibitive of such act is constitutional.'" To the court's refusal to charge as requested, and to the charge as delivered, the defendant duly excepted.

The case was submitted in this court on briefs. In that of the state, it is stated that "the facts are not disputed, nor is it denied that the statute concerning pool selling distinctly prohibits the act done by the accused. He claimed, however, that the law was unconstitutional. No other line of defense was adopted, and no evidence put in to confuse the issue." The brief filed by the defendant in reply commences thus: "It appears from the brief of counsel for the state that the only question in this case is that of the unconstitutionality of the act of 1898 (page 240 of the Public Acts of that year). He also admits that the act would be invalid as a restraint of interstate commerce, if it cannot be brought within the limits of the police power of the state. This limits the question to the precise point as to whether, under any claim of police power, the state can interfere with messages sent from one state to another, because the legislature thinks that the matters concerning which the messages are sent are such as it does not approve of." We shall dispose of the appeal on the question to which the counsel on both sides have thus addressed themselves, and which they seem to agree in regarding as the only one presented on the record; assuming that the attention of the jury was properly directed by evidence and instructions (to which it was thought unnecessary to refer in the finding) to the necessity of proof, under the second count, that the defendant, at the time of transmitting the money to be bet, was unlawfully concerned in the carrying on of the business of the transmission of money to places without the state, there to be placed or bet. The decisions in respect to the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several states, which is granted by the Constitution, have been numerous, and not altogether consistent; but they seem to have established the following propositions: A state law dealing directly and only with interstate commerce is void. A state law purporting to deal with domestic matters, but being in its effect and essence merely a regulation of interstate commerce, is void. A state law plainly and in good faith dealing only with state matters is valid, notwithstanding it may incidentally affect interstate commerce, unless it comes in conflict with some valid statute of the United States on that subject, or, in the absence of legislation, affects such commerce in a particular where the silence of Congress is equivalent to legislative prohibition. The power of regulating commerce covers such a wide field that cases must arise where a law passed in the legitimate exercise of the power of domestic legislation is also, in a sense, a regulation of commerce. But it is not therefore necessarily an invasion of the jurisdiction of Congress.—i. e. an exercise of the "power" of regulation. It is an exercise of the "power" of domestic legislation, and is valid unless it conflicts with some existing law, or so essentially affects interstate commerce as substantially to disturb those channels of commerce which Congress has seen fit to leave undisturbed. In dealing with such legislation, the courts have given a much wider latitude to what is called "police legislation" than to other forms of domestic legislation, because police regulations are absolutely essential to the protection of society, and in the main can only be established by the state government.

The law in question is purely a police regulation. For more than 200 years we have treated wagering as against public policy, and playing at the games which promote wagering has been illegal. The restrictions on playing the games have been removed, but playing for anything of value is still an offense. Gen. Stat. §§ 2557, 2558. A wager of any kind is illegal. The loser can recover the money lost, and, if he does not sue, any person may sue for and recover treble the amount. Id. §§ 2552, 2553 (passed in 1797); Rev. Stat. 1808, p. 861. Betting on horse races is a penal offense. Gen. Stat. § 2556. Since the establishment of our government wagering has been held to be, if not absolutely immoral, yet so injurious in its results as to require suppression by penal legislation. Such legislation has for many years past been directed against the business of promoting wagering in its various forms; and the keeping of places where such business is carried on has been treated as an offense. Indeed, throughout the United States the business of gambling is now recognized as illegitimate, and one whose contracts the courts will, in many cases, refuse to enforce. Within the past two years the United States Supreme Court has said: "This court had occasion many years ago to say that the common forms of gambling were comparatively innocuous, when placed in contrast with the widespread pestilence of lotteries. Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U. S. 488, 496, 42 L. ed. 553, 555. Similar language may appropriately be used in respect to the pool selling against which the act in question is directed; especially since the perversion of the telegraph to its uses has multiplied many fold its capacity for harm.

The act of 1893 attempts to reach the root of the evil by prohibiting the keeping of a place in which this kind of gambling, in any of its ramifications, is carried on. One of the most dangerous forms is that for which the telegraph is utilized. In prohibiting the keeping of a place in which such a business is carried on, or being concerned in such a business, the state does not attempt to, and does not in fact, exercise any exclusive power vested in Congress over interstate commerce. It simply prohibits in this state the business of aiding crime; and, if such commerce is thereby affected at all, it is the incidental effect of depriving those here engaged in telegraphing of the profits they might make through the business of promoting gambling in this state. That business is prohibited; and it is immaterial whether it be carried on by an individual in his own house, or by a telegraph company apart from, or as a part of, its ordinary business of telegraphing. In whatever place and by whomsoever the business of promoting gambling is carried on, the offense is committed, and cannot be justified because in committing it a telegram is sent from Connecticut to New Jersey.

In Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223, it was claimed that the power of regulating interstate commerce involved the right in all citizens to introduce and sell in any state any harmless article of food, unrestricted by state legislation; but it was held that a police regulation forbidding the sale in such manner as was likely to induce the citizens of Massachusetts to buy one article under the belief they were buying another was not a restriction of interstate commerce. The court said (p. 479, 155 U. S., and page 229, 39 L. ed.): "The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public." No more does it secure to anyone the privilege of promoting gambling. The same principle—i. e. that a police regulation, pure and simple, does not become a regulation of interstate commerce merely because it may incidentally affect the bringing into the state, or sending out, of certain articles of commerce—was affirmed in Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 534, 40 L. ed. 798, 798. But when a state attempts to regulate domestic commerce in an article which it recognizes as a legitimate subject of commerce, so as to discriminate in favor of domestic commerce and against interstate commerce in that article, the law ceases to be a pure police regulation, and becomes a direct interference with interstate commerce. Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 58, 41 L. ed. 632. The law before us is not analogous to the South Carolina dispensary law, condemned in Scott v. Donald. There might be some analogy if the legislature had recognized gambling by telegraph as a legitimate subject of commerce, and had undertaken to authorize the business of transmitting money for the purpose of gambling when the transmission was to places within the state, and to forbid or to regulate it when the transmission was to places without the state. The law comes within the principle illustrated by the cases of Plumley v. 40 L. R. A.

Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 39 L. ed. 223, and Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S. 519, 534, 40 L. ed. 798, 798, and Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 618, 43 L. ed. 878, as well as by many other cases unnecessary to cite. It is closely analogous, so far as the principle involved is concerned, to the Georgia law forbidding the running of railway trains on Sunday, which was sustained, although the channels of interstate commerce were thereby blocked for one day out of every seven. The language of the court in announcing the decision is applicable to the present case, and would seem to be conclusive. After reviewing various prior decisions, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Harlan, says: "These authorities make it clear that the legislative enactments of the states, passed under their admitted police powers, and having a real relation to the domestic peace, order, health, and safety of their people, but which, by their necessary operation, affect to some extent, or for a limited time, the conduct of commerce among the states, are yet not invalid by force alone of the grant of power to Congress to regulate such commerce; and, if not obnoxious to some other constitutional provision or destructive of some right secured by the fundamental law, are to be respected in the courts of the Union until they are superseded and displaced by some act of Congress passed in execution of the power granted to it by the Constitution. Local laws of the character mentioned have their source in the powers which the states reserved and never surrendered to Congress, of providing for the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, and are not, within the meaning of the Constitution, and considered in their own nature, regulations of interstate commerce simply because, for a limited time or to a limited extent, they cover the field occupied by those engaged in such commerce. The statute of Georgia is not directed against interstate commerce. It establishes a rule of civil conduct applicable alike to all freight trains, domestic as well as interstate. It applies to the transportation of interstate freight the same rule precisely that it applies to the transportation of domestic freight." Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 317, 41 L. ed. 166, 173.

In the case at bar the defendant's sole claim was that if he kept the place as charged, and was concerned in the business as charged, yet, inasmuch as some of the acts essential to constitute these offenses consisted in the transmission of the information and money to another state, he was guilty of no offense, because a law restricting the ordinary business of telegraphing among the states is void; and his sole grievance is that the court did not so charge. For the reasons given, we think the charge on that point was correct. When one opens an office, and makes arrangements and furnishes facilities to enable his customers to sit in his office, and gamble upon the results of horse races in this state and other states, he keeps a place in which the business forbidden by the statute is carried on; and, if he knowingly assists in making the transmission of money in the course of that business, he is concerned in the business. It is immaterial whether the illegal business is carried on as a wholly independent business, or as a part of an otherwise legitimate business in telegraphing. For a telegraph company to transmit a single message, and make a single transfer of funds, such as is stated in the finding of the court in the case before us, would not, standing alone, constitute a carrying on of the business of transmitting money for betting purposes. It would, however, be relevant evidence to show that fact, and might be sufficient in connection with proof that the company furnished special conveniences for the use of those desiring to make such bets, or had no substantial business of any other description.

There is no error in the judgment of the Superior Court.

The other Judges concur.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

C. V. BANTA, Jr., Appl.,
v.

City of CHICAGO.

(172 Ill. 204.)

1. A license tax on brokers extends to a member of a stock exchange who buys and sells stocks, bonds, or securities on the floor of the exchange in his own name, and makes or receives delivery and payment in the execution of orders for his customers.

2. "Goods, wares, and merchandise" for the sale or negotiation of which a broker is required to pay a license tax include shares in the capital stock of incorporated companies and other securities which are the subject of common barter and sale, and which are given visible and palpable form by means of certificates, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness.

3. A tax upon occupations or employments, whether for revenue or as an exaction for the privilege of pursuing a calling, may be imposed and collected in the form of a license fee.

4. Either regulation or revenue may be the purpose of a license tax imposed on the occupation of a broker and other trades or occupations mentioned in Const. 1870, art. 9, § 1, and it is not material to determine which may be the purpose of the license.

5. A delegation of the power to impose license taxes on occupations may be made by the legislature to municipal corporations.

6. The requirement of uniformity in respect to both persons and property in Const. 1870, art. 9, § 2, applies only to taxes collected by assessments upon assessable property.

7. The uniformity of a license tax on occupations is required by Const. art. 9, § 1, only as to the class upon which it operates.

(April 21, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court of Cook County convicting him of violating an ordinance of the city of Chicago prohibiting persons from acting as brokers without a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hamline, Scott, & Lord, for appellant.

The business carried on by the defendant was that of a factor, and not a broker.

It is a fundamental principle of jurisdiction that the city can exercise only such powers as are expressly enumerated in its charter.

Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196.

Courts are authorized to indulge in no presumptions in favor of the validity of the ordinances of municipal corporations.

Schott v. People, 89 Ill. 195.

Powers conferred by the statute when exercised through the ordinances are penal in their character. All penal statutes must be strictly construed.

Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196; Wright v. People, 61 Ill. 382; Waddle v. Duncan, 63 Ill. 233; People v. Peacock, 98 Ill. 172; Illinois & St. L. R. Co. v. People, 19 Ill. App. 141; Watson v. People, 27 Ill. App. 493; Belles v. Anderson, 88 Ill. App. 129; Chapman v. Wright, 20 Ill. 120; People v. Feeler, 145 Ill. 150; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 331.

The meaning of strict construction is that penal statutes will not be extended by implication to causes which are not expressly provided for by the very terms of the act.

Danville*, 86 Ill. App. 659; Olney v. Todd, 47 Ill. App. 440.

It is legally impossible to say that Banta was a broker or anything else than a factor.

Markham v. Jaudan, 41 N. Y. 235; Brewster v. Van Liew, 119 Ill. 561, 59 Am. Rep. 823.

But how can Banta have a lien as pledgee on property of which he has not possession? When Banta's customer delivered possession of the certificates indorsed in blank, Banta became possessed of the shares of stock themselves. Hence, if he sells the stock for his customer while such certificates are in his possession, he is a factor pure and simple.

Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 880, 17 L. R. A. 853.

The privilege or liberty to engage in or control the business of selling goods as a broker on commission is one of profit,—of presumptive value; and if Banta is denied the right to contract with respect thereto, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract.

Appellant is a broker within the meaning of the ordinances set out in the stipulation of facts.

The phrase "goods, wares, and merchandise" in the ordinance includes stocks.

Neither the words "including real estate brokers and insurance brokers," directly following the word "broker," nor §§ 214, 215, and 216 of said ordinance, modify or limit the meaning of that word in such a manner as to take a stockbroker out of the definition of broker, but are interpretation clauses intended to extend its meaning.

The fact that appellant incidentally performed some of the functions of a factor does not take him out of the general definition of "broker."

Appellant does not do business in his own name in such a way as to characterize him as a factor only.

Boggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Chicago adopted an ordinance declaring it unlawful for any person, association, or corporation to engage in business in the capacity of a "broker" within said city without having paid a license fee and obtained a license authorizing such person, association, or corporation to transact business in that capacity. The appellant was tried upon a stipulated state of facts, by the court without a jury, and was convicted of violating said ordinance, and a fine of $25 was assessed against him. This is an appeal from such judgment of conviction.

Council for appellant urge the court erred in its rulings upon propositions submitted to be held as the law of the case, and in their brief, with reference to such alleged erroneous rulings, say, "It will be perceived that the propositions given and refused present squarely these questions: First. Was not the business carried on by Banta that of a factor, and not a broker? Second. If Banta is a broker, is he not such a broker as is not covered by the ordinance in question? Third. Does not the Constitution forbid the legislature empowering the city of Chicago to require one engaged in the avocation of a broker to take out a license as a condition precedent to the right to carry on his business? Fourth. If the ordinance levies a tax, is it not in violation of the constitutional requirement that taxes on brokers should be uniform, and the constitutional requirement that taxes for corporate purposes should be uniform in respect to persons and property?" We will consider and dispose of these questions in the order as stated by counsel.

The stipulation as to the facts and the ordinance are as follows:

"It is hereby stipulated by the parties hereto that the defendant, Banta, is a citizen of Chicago, and a member of the Chicago Stock Exchange, a voluntary association composed of 445 members, which members become members thereof upon election thereto by the governing committee of said board, payment of an initiation fee, and signing the constitution and by-laws thereof; that said stock exchange has a board room in the city of Chicago, to which none but members are admitted, and at which room stocks, bonds, and other securities are bought and sold by the members thereof as agents for others, on a call made daily, excepting Saturdays, from 10 A. M. until 2 P. M. Under the rules of said exchange no member thereof can buy or sell stocks or bonds or other securities save in the room of said exchange, and between the hours aforesaid, and no member can belong to any similar association within the state of Illinois. By the constitution of said exchange no fictitious sales can be made, and no fictitious or trifling bids or offers can be made, and all bonds, securities, and all certificates of stock dealt in are obliged to be delivered on the floor of said exchange or at the place of business of the member who is the purchaser; and under said constitution every member must have in the vicinity of the exchange a place of business other than the exchange, where comparisons may be made at any time during the day, and where notices may be served. The constitution and by-laws are signed by every member on joining said exchange, and any violation of such constitution or by-laws subjects the offender to fine, suspension, or expulsion at the instance of the governing committee of said exchange. The defendant's sole business consists in buying and selling stocks, bonds, and other securities on the floor of said exchange for customers from whom he receives orders at his office to buy or sell said stocks, bonds, or other securities on said exchange, and the manner of his doing said business is invariably as follows, to wit: A customer gives him an order to buy stocks. Defendant goes onto the stock exchange, makes a contract with a member of the exchange for the purchase of stock, and in all cases receives from such member on the floor of the exchange or at his office the certificates of stock so bought, indorsed with blank assignment of shares of stock, and blank power of attorney to make necessary transfer on books of the corporation issuing such stock, and in payment therefor the defendant gives to such member his own check. Defendant then delivers to his customer said certificates of stock so bought, upon receiving from said customer a check for the purchase price thus paid, plus the defendant's commission for making such purchase. In case of a sale, it is defendant's invariable custom to receive the certificates of stock from the customer, indorsed with blank assignment of shares of stock and blank power of attorney to make necessary transfer on books of the corporation issuing such stock, sell the stock, and deliver the certificates thereof to the member of the exchange buying, receive from him his check for the purchase price, and give to his customer defendant's check for the stock sold, less his commissions. In every case of purchase or sale the certificates of stock are actually delivered. In the case of a purchase they are delivered to defendant by the member selling, and then by defendant to his customer. In case of sale they are received by defendant from his customer, and delivered to the member of the exchange buying the same. Such delivery to the purchasing member of such stock so sold by defendant is invariably made within a short time after the sale,—at the latest by 10:30 o'clock of the morning after the sale. In some cases, where the parties so require, said delivery takes place at the instant of the sale. It is also agreed that this defendant always buys or sells on the stock exchange in his own name, but he acts exclusively for others, and does not buy or sell on his own account, and that this is true, generally, of the transactions of members of the exchange. The person for whom the member of the exchange buys stock from this defendant is not usually known to this defendant. The commissions in the case of purchase or sale are those specified in article 19 of the constitution of the Chicago Stock Exchange, § 1 of which is as follows, to wit: 'Sec. 1. Commissions shall be charged and paid under all circumstances, and upon all transactions, both purchases and sales, or upon contracts for the receipt or delivery of securities. Such commissions shall be calculated in all cases upon the par value of securities, and shall be at the rates hereinafter named; and such rates shall be in each case the lowest commission that may be charged by any member of the exchange, and shall be absolutely net, and free from all or any rebatement, return, discount, or allowance in any shape or manner whatsoever, or by any method or arrangement, direct or indirect. And no bonus, percentage, or portions of the commissions so established shall be given, paid, or allowed, directly or indirectly, to any clerk or person, for business sought or procured for any member of the exchange.' The commissions vary with the price or quantity of stock, bond, or other securities sold or bought. In some cases it happens that defendant receives orders from customers to buy or sell shares of stock, which are in conflict with the orders received from other customers. In such event defendant procures another member of the board to act as his agent in making purchase or sale, and pays him one half of the commissions for his services, unless, at the end of the day, by agreement between defendant and such other member of the board, the trade is retransferred back to the defendant, in which case defendant pays the other member of the board at the rate of $2 per 100 shares for his services. But in every case the certificates of stock that the defendant is ordered to sell are delivered by the defendant, and not by such agent, to the purchaser, and the certificates of stock defendant is ordered to buy are received by defendant, and not by his agent, from the seller, and are delivered by defendant to the customer. Defendant does no other business save that above stated, and could not do any business in stocks, bonds, or other securities in any other way without violating the rules of the stock exchange, in which event defendant would be liable to fine, suspension, or expulsion therefrom.

'It is further stipulated that the city of Chicago is a municipal corporation in the state of Illinois, is incorporated under the general city and village act, and that there is now, and has been since the 11th of June, A. D. 1897, an ordinance in force, the same being the ordinance for the alleged violation of which the defendant was arrested and fined, and which is as follows, to wit:

"Sec. 213. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association in the city of Chicago to engage in the business or act in the capacity of a broker, including real estate brokers and insurance brokers, without first obtaining a license therefor, and paying a license fee in the sum of $25 per annum, the issuance of such license to be regulated by the general ordinances now or hereafter in force.

"Sec. 214. A broker is one who, for commission or other compensation, is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, or grain belonging to others.

"Sec. 215. A real-estate broker is one who, for commission or other compensation, is engaged in the selling of or who negotiates sales of real estate belonging to others, or obtains or places loans for others on real estate.

"Sec. 216. An insurance broker, within the meaning and intent of this chapter, shall include any and every person, firm, corporation, or association engaged in soliciting, procuring, or placing, for a consideration received or to be received, insurance on lives, or on buildings, vessels, or other property, either directly or through any other broker or through any insurance agent, in or with any insurance company or association other than an insurance company or association of which such person, firm, corporation, or association soliciting, procuring, or placing the insurance in any case shall be the duly authorized agent.

"Sec. 217. Any person, corporation, or association violating any of the provisions of this chapter shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $25 nor more than $200 for each offense."

"In the case of bonds and securities other than stocks, defendant receives them from his customers, sells them in his own name, and delivers them, and in case of purchase buys them in his own name, receives them, and delivers them, to his customer."

The insistence of counsel for appellant is that it appeared from the stipulated facts that appellant had possession of the stocks, bonds, or other securities which he sold or undertook to sell, and that he received stocks, bonds, or other securities bought by him, and that the transactions, whether purchases or sales, were made in his own name, and that he paid for all stocks, bonds, or securities which he purchased, and received the price for all those sold. Upon this insistence counsel contend that the business in which the appellant was engaged was that of a factor, and not of a broker, and cite in their brief an array of authorities in support of the proposition that a broker is a mere negotiator of contracts for other parties; that his duties are confined to the matter of making contracts between others concerning their goods or effects; that he does not have possession of the property or thing to be bought or sold; that he cannot buy or sell in his own name; that he does not pay for that which he bought or receive the price for that which is sold. This definition of the term "broker" is broader than that given in the earlier books, and narrower than that which is accepted at the present day. A broker, as defined in the earlier authorities, is a person employed by merchants English and merchants strangers in contriving, making, and concluding bargains and contracts between them concerning their wares and merchandise, and the moneys to be taken up by exchange between such merchants and tradesmen. Comyns' Dig. Merchant, C. The operations of brokers gradually extended, however, to the affairs of others than merchants domestic and merchants foreign, and they engaged generally in business as negotiators of contracts and bargains between others. Their transactions were, however, confined to the negotiation of contracts as "middlemen" empowered to explain the intentions of both parties, and to put them in condition to come together personally, and conclude the contract of bargain and sale. A broker was not, therefore, intrusted with the possession of what he was employed to sell, nor empowered to make a contract in his own name, or receive the money paid for the article sold, or pay for the article bought. During this period brokers restricted their operations to the negotiations of contracts for the purchase and sale of tangible things, and while their business was thus restricted the definition adopted by the appellant was applicable and correct. But the business of brokers continued to expand, and they subsequently undertook to effect the negotiation of bonds and other evidences of indebtedness, and certificates of shares in the capital stock of incorporated companies. The advent of brokers into this branch of business is referred to by Chief Justice Beck in the early case of Gibbons v. Rule, 12 J. B. Moore, 539, which was decided in 1827, as follows: "The statute 8 & 9 Wm. III. chap. 20, by which the first government loan was raised, speaks of a new description of brokers, —persons employed in buying and selling tallies, the government securities of those days. These have since been called stockbrokers." The statute referred to was enacted by the Parliament of England in the year 1697. The transition from the restricted to the more enlarged sphere was attended with additional powers corresponding to the new duties by brokers, and a new definition of the term "broker," or qualifications and exceptions to the former definition, became imperatively necessary. Speaking upon this subject, Mr. Russell, in his work on Factors and Brokers (published in 1845), on page 16, says: "Each of these definitions, however, must, at the present day, be regarded as somewhat too limited. By the two former, for instance, the employment of brokers is confined entirely to dealings between merchant and merchant,—a description which, it will at once be seen, would exclude stockbrokers, a class most extensively engaged on behalf of persons not merchants; and by the last, they are described to be persons engaged in making private bargains only,—a limitation which would equally exclude those of them who are in the habit of attending public sales, such as the sales of the East India Company, and who, whilst acting in that capacity, can scarcely be said to enter into none but private contracts." And with reference to the power of a broker to contract in his own name, the same author, on the same page, says a broker must, as a "general rule," contract in the name of his principal. Mr. Edwards, in his work on Factors and Brokers (1870), in § 109, says a broker is at liberty to buy in his own name if such be the custom among brokers. And Mr. Story, in his work on Agency (§ 109), says there are exceptions, by the usages of trade, to the rule that a broker cannot make a contract in his own name. And, speaking to the same point, Russell on Factors and Brokers (p. 52) says: "They [brokers] may, however, contract in their own names, provided their principals have given them authority to that effect, or if the usual course of dealing warrants them to do so." In Edwards on Factors and Brokers (§ 97), speaking with reference to the possession of the property negotiated by a broker, it is said that "ordinarily he [the broker] does not have or acquire the possession of the property." And in Story on Agency (§ 84) speaking to the same point, it is said "the broker does not usually have possession."

With relation to the old-time rule that a broker did not pay the purchase price of goods bought or receive the price of those sold, like exceptions and qualifications may be noted. Mr. Story, in his work on Agency (9th ed. p. 36), says: "But it may be the duty of a broker, under the employment he has undertaken, to see to the delivery of the goods and the payment of the price." And in Russell on Factors and Brokers (p. 54) it is said: "But if the custom of trade or the usual course of dealing between himself [the broker] and his principal warrant him to do so, he may receive payment for goods so sold." In large commercial centers those brokers who negotiated purchases and sales of securities and certificates of shares in incorporated companies found it convenient and greatly to their advantage to establish some convenient place for transacting the business of brokerage in stocks, and to form associations, commonly called "stock exchanges," and to adopt rules and regulations for the government of the members of such exchanges in the transaction of their business as brokers. These associations or exchanges have become almost the sole medium for the purchase and sale of stocks, bonds, and other securities in all our great cities, and the prices current from day to day in such exchanges practically fix the value of such securities and stocks. The rules and regulations adopted by such exchanges prescribe the duties, declare the powers and liabilities of the members, and control the course of dealing between them. The members of such boards are, and have long been, universally recognized as brokers, and so denominated. The author of the article on stockbrokers in 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, page 700, says: "A stockbroker is a broker who, for a commission, attends to the purchase and sale of stocks or shares, and of government and other securities, in behalf and for the account of clients. Even before the organization of stock exchanges, and as early as the latter part of the seventeenth century, persons who engaged in the business of buying and selling securities were denominated 'stockbrokers.' The functions of the stockbroker are broader than those of the ordinary broker, who, as a rule, acts as a mere negotiator, and is not intrusted with the possession of the property concerning which he acts, while the stockbroker frequently is intrusted with the possession of the securities, and may even take and transfer them without the name of his principal appearing in the transaction, and often pays or advances the price and receives payment." Some of these broader duties and powers possessed and exercised by the class of brokers who, as members of stock exchanges, deal in evidences of indebtedness, certificates of shares in the capital stock and assets of incorporated companies, in some respects pertain more nearly to the functions of factors or bankers; but, as we have seen, they are now, and for many years have been, exercised and possessed by such brokers as well. A broker may, in the course of a transaction, exercise some of the functions of a factor or of a banker, and be none the less a broker. It is believed the meaning now most usually given, in common acceptance, to the word "broker," is, one who transacts the business in which it appears from the stipulated facts this appellant is engaged.

We cannot assent to the view urged by counsel for appellant, that the ordinance does not include brokers who deal in stocks, bonds, and securities. The argument in support of this view is that § 214 of the ordinance was adopted by the city council for the purpose of interpreting the word "broker" employed in § 213, and that, properly construed, appellant, even if deemed a broker, is not one of the class of brokers defined by § 214 as intended to be required to pay a license fee under the provisions of § 213. Section 214 is as follows: "A broker is one who, for commission or other compensation, is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, or grain belonging to others." It is urged that it appeared from the statement of agreed facts that appellant was engaged in buying and selling stocks, bonds, and other securities,—not goods, wares, and merchandise, or produce and grain,—and hence his business was not that contemplated to be included in the provisions of § 213 as interpreted and limited by § 214. But we think the better and more firmly established doctrine is that, in the absence of any qualifying or restricting clause, the phrase "goods, wares, and merchandise" includes and comprehends shares in the capital stock of incorporated companies, and other securities which are the subject of common barter and sale, and which are given visible and palpable form by means of certificates, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness. Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9; Baldwin v. Williams, 3 Met. 365; Pray v. Mitchell, 60 Me. 430; Dowdel v. Hamm, 2 Watts. 61; Ryall v. Rolle, 1 Atk. 180; Crichton v. Symes, 3 Atk. 62; Moore v. Moore, 1 Bro. Ch. 123; Somerby v. Buntin, 118 Mass. 285, 19 Am. Rep. 459; Jackson v. Robinson, 1 Yeates, 101, 1 Am. Dec. 293; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, article Goods; Anderson, Law Dict.; Bouvier, Law Dict.

Nor do we think the ordinance contravenes any constitutional provision. It is a well-recognized attribute of the sovereign power to tax any and every occupation and employment for the purpose of raising revenue. Cooley, Taxn. pp. 570-572, 592. Like power also rests with the sovereign to impose a tax in the nature of an exaction for the privilege of pursuing certain callings; namely, those which the sovereign, by virtue of the police power, may interdict or regulate, or those wherein the privilege is in the nature of a franchise, or others which, because of exceptional and particular reasons affecting public policy, are deemed proper subjects for supervision or regulation by the state. Cooley, Taxn. pp. 570-572, 592; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560; Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 156. The tax upon occupations or employments, whether for revenue or as an exaction for the privilege of pursuing a calling, may be imposed and collected in the form of a license fee. Cooley, Taxn. pp. 591, 592, 597. The Constitution of 1870 has no provision limiting the power of the state to exercise this sovereign right of taxation, whether the tax be laid for revenue or for purposes of regulation. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560, except that, as § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution specifically mentions certain occupations which may be taxed, the right to tax others is denied by the familiar rule of construction that the enumeration of certain occupations implies the exclusion of all others. Cairo v. Bross, 101 Ill. 475. Section 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1870 expressly authorizes the general assembly to tax various occupations, including brokers, the only restriction being the requirement that such tax should be uniform as to the class upon which it operated. The general assembly delegated to the cities in the state the power to impose such taxation within their respective jurisdictions. Rev. Stat. chap. 24, § 62, cl. 91. It was competent for the general assembly to delegate the exercise of such power within the limits of cities and villages to such municipalities. East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 392; Houland v. Chicago, 108 Ill. 496.

It is not urged the ordinance is unreasonable or oppressive in respect of the amount of the license fee, but it is urged the business of a broker is not hurtful to the public peace, safety, or morals, and that no other reason can be given why such business should be deemed a proper subject of regulation or prohibition, under the police power or otherwise. It is therefore asserted the city is driven to the position that the ordinance is a revenue measure, and is lawful as such. The terms of the ordinance do not indicate whether the license fee is required for the purposes of revenue or for regulation merely. It is true that, in order to be effectual, a license must confer authority to do that which, without the license, would be illegal; but it does not follow that only such occupations as might be inhibited or regulated under the police power, or for other similar reasons hereinbefore referred to, may be required to take out license in order to legally transact business. The occupation may be lawful in itself, and not subject to prohibition or regulation by the state, yet it may be prohibited, in order to compel the taking out of a license, if the purpose is to raise revenue by means of license fees. Cooley, Taxn. pp. 596, 597. Therefore the mere fact that the effect of the ordinance is to declare it to be unlawful to transact the business of a broker without license does not indicate whether the purpose is to raise revenue or to regulate and control the business. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Taxation (p. 597), says that the language of the ordinance, or its terms, may be expected to indicate with sufficient precision whether the license is required for purposes of revenue or for regulation merely, the intentment being that regulation is the object, unless there is something in the language indicating with sufficient certainty that the purpose is to produce revenue. In the view we take of the case, it is not material to determine whether the license fee is for revenue or for purposes of regulation. We think it is well settled by repeated decisions of this court that the state in its sovereign capacity, and the cities and villages of the state by virtue of the grant of the power by the general assembly, have ample power and authority to impose license fees upon the occupation of a broker and the other trades or occupations mentioned in § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1870, for 40 L. R. A.

the purposes either of regulation or revenue. People v. Thurber, 18 Ill. 556; Firemen's Benev. Asso. v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 513, 74 Am. Dec. 115; Illinois Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Peoria, 29 Ill. 180; East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 392; Ducat v. Chicago, 48 Ill. 172; Chicago Packing & P. Co. v. Chicago, 88 Ill. 227, 80 Am. Rep. 545; Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 372; Lovington v. Board of Trustees, 99 Ill. 564; East St. Louis v. Trustees of Schools, 102 Ill. 489, 40 Am. Rep. 606; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 102 Ill. 560; Timm v. Harrison, 109 Ill. 593; Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 186. Whether the exaction of a license fee is for either purpose, it is essential the ordinance providing for the license be so framed that it will have uniform operation as to the class upon which it operates, for such is the positive requirement of said § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution.

Counsel insist that the provisions of § 9, art. 9, of the Constitution of 1870 are equally applicable to the power of the city to exact the payment of license fees, and that the requirement of the said latter section that municipal taxes shall be so laid that they shall be uniform in respect to both persons and property must be complied with in an ordinance enacted for the purpose of raising revenue through the medium of license fees. The ordinance under consideration levies a license fee upon each person pursuing the occupation of a broker, and requires that all such persons shall pay a uniform fee, without regard to the amount or value of the business transacted by the said brokers, or the capital they have, if any, invested in the business. The argument therefore is, the ordinance is not uniform in respect to persons and property, and for that reason is in contravention of said latter section of the Constitution. We think said § 9 has reference only to taxes to be collected by assessments upon assessable property. Such was the view expressed by this court in Walker v. Springfield, 94 Ill. 372. When revenue is sought to be raised by the imposition of license fees, the authority exercised is that given by the provisions of § 1 of article 9 of the Constitution of 1870, and it is only necessary, in order to comply with the provisions of that section, that the ordinance shall be "uniform as to the class upon which it operates." The ordinance under consideration excuses no one of the class upon which it operates from the payment of the license fee, but exacts a uniform fee from each person in said class. It is uniform in respect to the persons affected, and more is not required by the Constitution.

The judgment is affirmed.

voting, under the act of 1891, requiring the names of all candidates to be printed on one ballot, except names written thereon by the voter, and requiring the voter to prepare his ballot by marking a cross opposite the name of each candidate voted for.

(April 21, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bureau County in favor of contestant in a proceeding to contest the election of defendants to the office of president and clerk of the village of Ladd. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Owen G. Lovejoy and Alfred R. Greenwood, for appellants:

The statute having specially provided that the voter may vote for persons other than those whose names are on the ballot when he receives it, by writing in the names of such other persons in blank spaces thereon, the voter is confined to that manner of placing such names on the ballot.

Little Beaver Twp. School Directors' Election, 165 Pa. 283, 27 L. R. A. 294.

People, Columbia Constr. Co., v. Hinrichsen, 161 Ill. 226; Sanner v. Patton, 155 Ill. 565.

The statute must be substantially complied with. To permit the voter to substitute some other method of his own of marking his ballot to express his choice, for the one provided, would practically nullify the statute.

Apple v. Barcroft, 158 Ill. 650; Detroit v. Rush, 82 Mich. 539, 10 L. R. A. 171.

Mr. William Hawthorne, for appellee: No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Federal Const. 14th Amend.

All elections shall be free and equal.

Ill. Const. art. 2, § 18.

The validity of ballots defective in form depends on the ascertainment of the intention of the voter; if the intention of the voter is plain, the ballots should be given effect accordingly.

People, Akin, v. Matteson, 17 Ill. 167; McKinnon v. People, Malzacher, 110 Ill. 305.

The statute is not mandatory, but directory merely, as regards the details of an election.

Behrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 135 Ill. 591.

Votes cast for a person not nominated for office in any of the ways provided by statute, but whose name, not being printed upon the official ballot, was written by each voter in a blank space upon the same and marked with a cross, are legal votes.

Sanner v. Patton, 155 Ill. 553.

A voter should not be deprived of his right to vote through mere inadvertence, mistake, or ignorance, if an honest intention can be ascertained from his ballot.

Parker v. Orr, 158 Ill. 609, 80 L. R. A. 227.

Section 23 of the ballot law clearly recognizes the right of the voter to add new names to the ballot. That the voter must "write" in any particular manner does not appear.

Jones v. State, Atherby, 1 Kan. 273; Sanner v. Patton, 155 Ill. 553.

The voter may write or paste upon his ballot the name of any person for whom he desires to vote for any office. To hold otherwise would be to disfranchise, or to disqualify, the citizen, as a voter or a candidate, and to affect the law quite unnecessarily with the taint of unconstitutionality in such respects.

People, Bradley, v. Shaw, 133 N. Y. 493, 16 L. R. A. 606.

The intention of the voter must govern.

McKinnon v. People, Malzacher, 110 Ill. 305.

That provision of the Constitution which declares that "elections shall be equal" means that the vote of every elector shall be, in its influence upon the result, equal to the vote of every other elector.

People, Grinnell, v. Hoffman, 116 Ill. 587, 59 Am. Rep. 793.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding by appellee to contest the election of appellant Fletcher to the office of president, and appellant Weissenberger to the office of clerk, of the village of Ladd, in Bureau county. The petition avers that at an election of officers in said village on April 20, 1897, John Rolando received more than 200 legal votes for president, and John Gillen more than 190 legal votes for village clerk; that said Fletcher and Weissenberger each received no more than 140 legal votes, respectively, for said offices, but the judges of election refused to count over 190 votes cast for Rolando and Gillen, and declared that Fletcher and Weissenberger had received the highest number of legal votes cast for president and clerk; and thereafter the president and certain of the trustees of the village declared the latter elected to said offices. It thus appears that the only ground of contest set forth in the petition is that votes legally cast for Rolando and Gillen were not counted by the judges and clerks of the election.

It appears from the record that a certificate of nomination had been filed with the village clerk, on which the names of Rolando and Gillen appeared for said offices; but, objections thereto being filed and sustained, no further steps were taken to have their names as such candidates placed upon the official ballot. The ballot as prepared by the village clerk and furnished to the judges of election was as follows:

☐ Petition. ☐ Petition.

☐ For Village President,
ADAM FLETCHER.

☐ For Village Clerk,
A. H. WEISSENBERGER.

☐ For Village Trustees,
MICHAEL CONWAY.

☐ J. P. BUTLER.

☐ ANTON BRASSA ☐ For Village Trustee,
JAMES McQUAID.

Upon the canvass of the votes there was found in the box a great number of ballots on which were pasted the following ticket:

- | | |
|----------|--|
| X | For Village President,
JOHN ROLANDO. |
| X | For Village Clerk,
JOHN GILLEN. |
| X | For Village Trustees,
JOHN RIVA. |
| X | JOHN WHELAN. |
| X | J. V. JONES. |
| X | For Trustee to fill Vacancy,
ED. A. CARR. |

These were pasted on the official ballots, most of them being attached on the margin, to the right of the blank space in the right-hand ticket. Some were put on "upside down." One was on the left margin of the ballot, and another was pasted lengthwise in the blank space on the right. All these ballots were rejected by the judges and clerks of the election in the canvass of the vote. The tickets so attached were printed as above, except the crosses in the squares opposite the names of the candidates. The back of each paster was gummed, so it could be attached by simply wetting it.

The testimony is to the effect that Rolando, Gillen, and Riva, three of the candidates named in this ticket, were during the election in the vicinity of the polls, each having in his possession numbers of the tickets which were furnished to voters, some of them being already marked with a cross in the squares opposite the names. One witness testified: "I saw John Rolando, candidate for village president, have these ballots there that day. I jokingly says, 'I wish I had a paster, so I could vote;' and he says, 'I will give you one;' and he pulled out a handful, some of them marked, and some of them weren't marked. That was 12 or 15 feet from the voting place." Another said: "I was in Ladd on April 20, 1897,—the time of the village election. I saw some paster tickets there that day, about 20 or 30 feet from the polls. John Gillen had them. He was running for clerk on the paster ticket. He showed the pasters to some other people, and gave the pasters to them. It was a paster marked just the same as 'Exhibit 5.'" Exhibit 5 showed the paster ticket marked with a cross in the square opposite the names of the candidates. The testimony of these witnesses is fully corroborated by that of others, and wholly uncontradicted.

The only question in the case is, Were the tickets so prepared and voted legal ballots? If they were not, appellants were legally elected, and the circuit court erred in its finding and decree to the contrary. The method of conducting the election on the part of Rolando and Gillen in the use of these pasters, and the manner in which they were furnished to voters, was, in our opinion, violative of the spirit and intent of the election law of this state in force since July 1, 1891. The several sections of that law provide ample opportunity for all persons to have their names placed upon the official ballot as candidates, and clearly contemplate that candidates shall avail themselves of that opportunity. Section 14 provides: "The names of all candidates to be voted for in each election district or precinct shall be printed on one ballot, . . . and the ballot shall contain no other names, except that in case of electors for President and Vice President of the United States the names of the candidates for President and Vice President may be added to the party or political designation." It is true that, in order that no voter shall be deprived of the right to cast his ballot for whomsoever he will for any office, he is authorized by § 23, when the name is not printed thereon, to prepare his ballot by writing the name of the candidate of his choice in a blank space on said ticket, making an "X" opposite thereto. It is, however, plainly prescribed by the statute that the ballot furnished by the judges to the voter must be prepared by him individually, after he enters the booth, except in so far as he may be assisted as an illiterate voter, under the provisions of § 24, and that he shall be allowed to do so uninfluenced or in any way controlled by being electioneered or furnished with tickets or pasters by outsiders. Section 21 requires the officers upon whom is imposed by law the duty of designating or providing polling places, to furnish a sufficient number of booths, "which shall be provided with such supplies and conveniences, including shelves, pens, penholders, ink, blotters, and pencils, as will enable the voter to prepare his ballot for voting, and in which voters may prepare their ballots screened from all observation as to the manner in which they do so. . . . The arrangement shall be such that the voting booths can only be reached by passing within said guard rail. They shall be within plain view of the election officers, and both they and the ballot boxes shall be within plain view of those outside of the guard rail. . . . No person other than the election officers and the challengers allowed by law, and those admitted for the purpose of voting as hereinafter provided, shall be permitted within the guard rail, except by authority of the election officers to keep order and enforce the law. The number of such voting booths shall not be less than one to every seventy-five voters or fraction thereof, who voted at the last preceding election in the district." The following section provides that the voter, upon entering the place of voting, shall give his name, and, if required to do so, his residence, to the judges of election, one of whom shall thereupon announce the same, etc., and provide him with the official ballot. Section 23, which prescribes the manner of voting, is in part as follows: "On receipt of his ballot the voter shall forthwith, and without leaving the inclosed space, retire alone to one of the voting booths so provided, and shall prepare his ballot by making in the appropriate margin or place a cross (X) opposite the name of the candidate of his choice for each office to be filled, or by writing in the name of the candidate of his choice in a blank space on said ticket, making a cross (X) opposite thereto." The next section authorizes two of the election officers, of different political parties, to be selected from the judges and clerks of the precinct in which they are to act, to assist any voter who may declare, upon oath, that he cannot read the English language, or that, by reason of any physical disability, he is unable to mark his ballot, and requests such assistance. Section 28 prohibits every person from doing any "electioneering or soliciting of votes on election day within any polling place or within 100 feet of any polling place," and provides that "no person shall interrupt, hinder, or oppose any voter while approaching the polling place for the purpose of voting." Section 29 also provides that "any voter who shall, except as herein otherwise provided, allow his ballot to be seen by any person with an apparent intention of letting it be known how he is about to vote, or who shall make a false statement as to his inability to mark his ballot, or any person who shall interfere or attempt to interfere with any voter when inside said inclosed space or when marking his ballot, or who shall endeavor to induce any voter, before voting, to show how he marked or has marked his ballot, shall be punished by a fine," etc.

These several sections clearly show that it was the intention of the legislature, by the passage of the ballot law, to carry out the purpose of the act as indicated in its title,—that the voting shall be by ballots printed and distributed at public expense, for candidates nominated for public offices, to regulate the manner of holding elections, and to enforce the secrecy of the ballot. The well-known object of the law was to prevent the pernicious practices, theretofore existing, of peddling tickets at the polls, electioneering voters, and, by corrupt and fraudulent methods, interfering with the free and unrestrained exercise of the right of the voter. It seems too clear for argument that if the practice resorted to in the use of pasters, as was here done, is to be legalized, the whole purpose and object of the law will be practically abrogated. There would in that case be no substantial difference between the operation of the present law and the old method. Under that law, candidates, and those acting in their behalf, provided themselves with tickets often marked as they desired them to be voted, furnished them to voters, and, by persuasion, purchase, or otherwise, induced the voters to deposit such ballots in the ballot box. Under the method here adopted, they could furnish the ticket as they desired it to be voted, marked, or with instructions to the voter how to mark it, and, by the same methods, induce him to attach it, as furnished, to the official ballot, and then procure it to be deposited in the ballot box. The manner of voting prescribed by the act is thereby wholly changed, and the secrecy of the ballot entirely destroyed.

It seems to be thought, however, that to deprive a candidate of the right to have such ballots counted in his favor would be to interfere with the privilege of the voter to cast his ballot for the candidate of his choice. We do not think so. Under the provisions of § 23, authorizing the voter to write the name of the candidate of his choice upon the ballot, as construed in Sanner v. Patton, 155 Ill. 553, every voter is guaranteed the right to vote for any person for an office, whether the name of such person is printed upon the official ballot or not. The number of booths required to be furnished, and the facilities provided therein—"shelves, pens, penholders, ink blotters and pencils"—to enable the voter to prepare his ballot, together with the assistance which he is entitled to receive from the judges, amply secure to him every right of a voter. The mere fact that the methods thus provided may be less convenient than the use of pasters or stickers furnishes no sufficient reason for changing or modifying the requirement of the law, wisely designed for the purposes above mentioned. The inconvenience here would have been no greater than in any other case where the voter writes the name of a candidate on the ballot. All that was necessary if a voter desired to vote for Rolando for president was to write his name under that of Fletcher, making a cross opposite it.

It seems to be thought that because, under the provisions of § 23, the voter may prepare his ballot by writing the name of the candidate of his choice in a blank space on said ticket, he may also indicate his choice by printing such name, not on the ticket merely, but by pasting the printed name in the space on the ticket; and, in support of the position, reference is made to that provision of the statute (3 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. chap. 131, § 1, cl. 15) in regard to the construction of statutes, which says: "The words 'written' and 'in writing' may include printing and any mode of representing words and letters." This statute has no proper application to the construction of the language of § 23. There is no reference to a "written" instrument or matter "in writing" in this section, but it expressly says that the voter "shall prepare his ballot by writing in the name of the candidate of his choice," and the preceding § 21, by requiring the officers to provide pens, penholders, ink, blotters, and pencils, and no other means or conveniences for preparing the ballot, clearly indicates that the name of the candidate shall be inserted by writing,—that is, it commands the act of the voter to be performed in a certain manner. Of course, the form of the letters is a matter of no consequence. Nor are we disposed to hold that a ballot should be rejected merely because the name appears in print, provided it is prepared by the voter himself in that way after entering the booth; but we do hold that it is not lawful for him to use stickers or pasters in so doing. We do not attach so much importance in this case to the fact that the statute was violated by candidates distributing the tickets and electioneering, as we do to the fact that by the use of such tickets every facility is furnished for evading and violating the provisions of the law. In Pennsylvania, the act providing that the voter may cast his ballot for persons whose names do not appear on the ballot by "inserting" the names, etc., it has been held the ballot might be prepared by using a sticker instead of writing the name; the court saying, in substance, that the word "writing" was not used in the statute, and using a sticker was a method of "inserting" the name. The language of the New York statute under consideration in People, Bradley, v. Shaw, 133 N. Y. 493, 16 L. R. A. 606, relied upon by appellee here, is, "The voter may write or paste upon his ballot the name of any person for whom he desires to vote for any office." Both these statutes materially differ from ours, and hence the decisions of those states are not in point here. Our conclusion is that the ballots to which the pasted tickets were attached were properly rejected in the count by the board of canvassers, and that appellants were properly declared elected.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to enter a decree in conformity with the views herein expressed.

1. The permanent use of a public street for a private purpose cannot be authorized by a city.
2. An awning which makes a permanent encroachment on a street is a purpresture.
3. A mere resolution or order by the city council, not passed and published as an ordinance of the city, will not constitute a repeal of an ordinance.
4. Discrimination between citizens cannot be made by a city with respect to the erection of awnings as permanent structures.
5. A mere order of the city council, authorizing the erection of an awning, which is prohibited by a general ordinance, is no more than a license, which is subject to revocation by the council at any time.
6. No estoppel can arise from an act of a municipal corporation or officer done in violation of or without authority of law.

(April 21, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin interference with an awning over a sidewalk. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hamline, Scott, & Lord, for appellant:

The council had full power to authorize the erection of the awning and supports by appellant.

The legislature represents the public, and when it or its political agent, a municipal corporation acting under due power conferred by such legislature, abridges, encroaches upon, or completely shuts up or vacates a street, no one can complain but a property owner who suffers damage to his property peculiar thereto and different in kind from that sustained by the public at large.

Smith v. McDowell, 148 Ill. 51, 22 L. R. A. 393.

The legislature delegated to the council the power to regulate and prevent the use of streets, sidewalks, and public grounds for signs, sign posts, awnings, awning posts, telegraph poles, horse troughs, racks, posting handbills and advertisements.

It won't do to say that "regulate" means prevent, as the legislature has added "prevent," and such construction would render idle the use of the word "prevent" in such connection.

If the city council has granted to anyone a license to erect a telegraph pole, or an awning, or awning post, such license legalizes what otherwise might be regarded as a purpresture.

When the council passed its order of December 19, 1887, a license was thereby given Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett, & Co. to use Wabash avenue with this awning and post, and such use of the avenue was legal, was authorized by statute, permitted by ordinance, and could not be interfered with by anyone, at least until the council rescinded the license.

Quincy v. Bull, 106 Ill. 387; Chicago Municipal Gaslight & Fuel Co. v. Lake 130 Ill. 42; Gregsten v. Chicago, 145 Ill. 451; *Matthiessen & H. Zinc Co. v. The existence of a general ordinance on the subject does not make appellants' license void.

The provision of the Constitution (§ 22, art. 4) which prohibits the legislature from "granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever," has no application to a municipal corporation.

Chicago City R. Co. v. People, Story, 73 Ill. 541; Covington v. East St. Louis, 78 Ill. 548; People v. Harper, 91 Ill. 857.

In dealing with the question of a license to sell liquor the municipal corporation acts in its public capacity, and while it may refuse to license anyone to sell liquor, or may limit the number of saloons, or carve out prohibition districts, yet everybody who is fit to receive a license, who lives within the district in which the liquor business is permitted to be carried on, is entitled to receive and may demand a license to sell liquor.

Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196.

The city may make a contract for the use of the streets by a contract ordinance, and thereby allow its occupation by gas mains, telegraph poles, car tracks, signs, awnings, awning posts, and all the other means by which the legislature has determined trade or commerce, or the public may be inconvenienced.

Chicago City R. Co. v. People, Story, 73 Ill. 548; Gregsten v. Chicago, 145 Ill. 462.

If the city can estop itself by contract or by user or by laches from objecting that the occupier has no right to occupy public property, as in Nelson v. Godfrey, 12 Ill. 22; Gridley v. Bloomington, 68 Ill. 47; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, Elgin, 91 Ill. 251, it can certainly exempt the appellant from prosecution and molestation by express grant.

The order is just as efficacious in granting a license as an ordinance.

Messrs. William G. Beale and George A. Dupuy for appellees.

Phillips, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to restrain by injunction the city of Chicago, its mayor, commissioner of public works, and superintendent of police, their agents and servants, from interfering with, removing, or injuring an awning erected by appellants in front of their premises. It appears that on December 19, 1887, the following order was made by the city council: "Ordered, that the commissioner of public works be, and he is hereby directed to issue a permit to Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett, & Co. to erect a cover of glass and iron over the shipping doors on Wabash avenue, corner of Lake street, the plans and specifications for the same to be submitted to and approved by the commissioner of public works, and the work to be done under his supervision." That thereafter appellant submitted plans and specifications to the commissioner of public works of said city, which being by him duly approved, and a permit by him given, appellant proceeded, at a cost of $3,000, to construct such awning. That said awning is supported at the side over the outer edge of the walk by iron posts, and appellant insists is not an inconvenience to anyone or in any respect a nuisance or obstruction to travel. Appellee in its answer (18) says "that said awning was constructed in violation of the general ordinances of the city of Chicago, duly adopted in pursuance of law, and that it was and is the duty of the commissioner of public works, under such ordinance, to take all steps proper to prevent encroachment upon the rights of the public in the streets and avenues of the city; that the city council can only regulate and control the use of the streets by general ordinances operating equally and uniformly upon all persons; that it has no power by any order to suspend the operation of such general ordinances in favor of particular persons or corporations, and that the order relied upon by the complainant in this case, as a justification for the construction and maintenance of said awning, was and is in violation of common and public right, and is an attempt to confer special privileges upon the complainant, and is therefore null and void, and was and is wholly beyond the lawful power of the council to pass or adopt; that as the said order is and was beyond the power of the council to adopt, and as it cannot have the effect to suspend or annul any general ordinances of the city designed for the protection of the rights of the public in the streets, and as the said awning is constructed and maintained in violation of such general ordinances, these defendants insist that they should not be restrained or enjoined from enforcing such ordinances against the said complainants." A temporary injunction issued by the court, upon notice and after argument, was upon the final hearing dissolved and the bill dismissed by the trial court, which, on appeal to the appellate court of the first district, was affirmed, and this appeal is prosecuted.

The public streets of a city are dedicated to the public for public use, and are subject to the control and management of the city council, but that body has no power to alien or otherwise incumber such streets, so long as they are public streets, but must hold them in trust for public uses only. The municipal corporation can grant no easement or right therein not of a public nature, and the entire street must be maintained for public use. Hence no individual or corporation can acquire any portion of the street for exclusive private use to the exclusion of the public. The city council has no power to grant such use. Fied v. Barling, 149 Ill. 556, 24 L. R. A. 406. While it may grant individuals or corporations a temporary use for such time and way as not to interfere with public use, yet there is no power in the municipality to sell or grant for private use a public street and exclude the public therefrom. Quincy v. Jones, 78 Ill. 331, 20 Am. Rep. 243. A permanent encroachment upon a public street for a private use is a purpresture, and is in law a nuisance. Wood, Nuisances, §§ 251, 260, 262; Driggs v. Phillips, 103 N. Y. 77; Atty. Gen., Holtz, v. Heishon, 18 N. J. Eq. 410; Smith v. State, 23 N. J. L. 180 and 712; State v. Woodward, 23 Vt. 92; State v. Atkinson, 24 Vt. 448; Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356; Com. v. King, 13 Met. 115.

Section 1492 of the ordinance of the city of Chicago provides: "All awnings in such portion of the streets of Chicago as are or hereafter may be lighted by public lamps shall be covered by cloth or leather, or light and pliable substance, and securely attached to the building and properly supported, without posts, by iron or other metallic fastenings and supports, and shall be elevated at least 8 feet at the lowest part thereof above the top of the sidewalk, and shall not project over the sidewalk to exceed three fourths of the width thereof. Any person who shall erect any awning contrary to the provisions hereof, or refuse or neglect forthwith to remove any awning or awning posts heretofore or hereafter erected contrary to the provisions hereof, shall be subject to a penalty of $5 for every offense, and to a further penalty of $5 for every day he shall fail to comply therewith after written notice from the commissioner of buildings to remove the same." That ordinance was in full force and effect at the time an order was adopted by the city council authorizing the construction of this awning. An ordinance of the city can only be repealed or amended by an ordinance of the city. A mere resolution or order by the city council, not passed and published as an ordinance of the city, would not constitute a repeal of an ordinance duly passed. Section 2, art. 5, chap. 24, 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) 2d ed., provides that "the style of the ordinances in cities shall be: 'Be it ordained by the city council, etc.'" And § 13, art. 3, of the same chapter, provides: "The yeas and nays shall be taken upon the passage of all ordinances, and on all propositions to create any liability against the city, or for the expenditure or appropriation of its money, and in all other cases at the request of any member, which shall be entered on the journal of its proceedings; and the concurrence of a majority of all the members elected in the city council shall be necessary to the passage of any such ordinance or proposition." By this provision of the statute, an enacting clause is provided for the adoption of ordinances, and a majority of the members of the city council are necessary to the passage of any such ordinance. A resolution of the city council or an order of that body may be adopted as an order or resolution by a majority of a quorum present, but such order or resolution so adopted would not necessarily require the concurrence of a majority of the members elected in the city council, and in this respect the adoption of an order or resolution materially differs from the adoption of an ordinance. The authority to erect the awning in this case was conferred on appellant by an order of the city council, and in no sense constituted an ordinance. This order amounted to no more than a license, and was subject to revocation by the city council at any time.

Where the city has authorized a temporary use which causes a temporary obstruction, one having been licensed to exercise such temporary use would not be liable for a penalty under the ordinances for obstructing the street, as it was permitted as a matter of grace or favor. That such permission was given may be implied from circumstances. Gridley v. Bloomington, 68 Ill. 47. But when the city demands the removal of such a structure, it, if permitted to remain thereafter, becomes a nuisance. State v. Woodward, 23 Vt. 92; State v. Atkinson, 24 Vt. 448; Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356; Com. v. King, 18 Met. 115. With an ordinance in existence prohibiting the erection of awnings, a resolution of this character, amounting to a mere license to this particular firm, is a special privilege granted to one by license, which, by the general ordinance applicable to all the citizens within the corporate limits of the city of Chicago, is prohibited to others; and whatever is prohibited by the Constitution of the state from being done by the legislature cannot be done indirectly through another body; and an ordinance of a municipal corporation must be in harmony with the general laws and Constitution of the state, and whenever such ordinance comes in conflict with the Constitution it is void. A municipal corporation cannot confer power upon one person to do an act which is prohibited to another having an equal right to do the same act, and ordinances cannot favor or discriminate against any person or class of persons, but must be uniform, and of general operation within the corporate limits. A license to erect an awning of this character, although it might not render the person who erected the same amenable to punishment for the violation of an ordinance of the city, is still not a license binding on the city and irrevocable. Nor is it of such a character that the commissioner of public works in the discharge of his duties may not without the action of the city council remove it, because the city had no power to grant the permanent use of the public street for a private purpose, nor can it discriminate between citizens within the municipality. Having no power to make such discrimination, or authorize the erection of such awning as a permanent structure, without power on its part to have the same removed, no estoppel can be based on mere resolution or order of the city council as enacted; because no estoppel can arise from an act of a municipal corporation or officer done in violation of or without authority of law. Seeger v. Mueller, 133 Ill. 86; Pettis v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 189; Stevens v. St. Mary's Training School, 144 Ill. 836, 18 L. R. A. 832; Day v. Green, 4 Cush. 438. The right of the public to the exclusive use of the streets for public purposes is inconsistent with the right of a private citizen to encroach thereon by the erection of a permanent structure. The streets are held in trust by the municipality, and this fact prevents the municipality from authorizing any encroachment on or obstruction of them by such structures; and the mere consent of the city council resolution or order gives no vested right. Ely v. Campbell 59 How. Pr. 383; Brooklyn v. Furey, 9 Misc. 198; Eichenlaub v. St. Joseph, 118 Mo. 895, 18 L. R. A. 590. The averment that the awning so erected does not injure or obstruct any person does not change the case. The sole question to be determined is, Is it an encroachment on the street of the city? and, if so, it is a purpresture.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

v.

1. The direction by will that a child shall be reared by the sisters of the testatrix and trained as their own is not limited by a subsequent provision for the appointment of her husband as guardian and to manage the business and property of the testatrix.

2. A man who permits the custody of his infant child to pass, in accordance with his wife's will, to her sisters, and allows the child to remain with and be reared and trained by them for five or six years, will not be allowed to reassert his right to the custody of the child, if this is not for the welfare of the child.

3. As between the claimants of the custody of an infant, the question is not, which can surround the child with greater luxury, or give him the greater amount of money or property, but with which the child is likely to be reared and trained so as to make the better man and the better citizen.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Culpeper County in favor of defendants in a proceeding to obtain possession of plaintiff's minor child which had been placed with defendants for care and instruction. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

In cases where the father has voluntarily relinquished control of an infant, to a female or other suitable relative, and the child has grown and expanded with its new life around her and become alienated, or has grown up a stranger to the paternal home, upon application to the court to break up the formed ties of affection, the case is no longer to be viewed in the light of the father's legal rights, but in the light of a careful regard to the welfare of the infant.

Mr. A. F. Robertson also for appellees.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

George F. Stringfellow obtained a writ of habeas corpus from the circuit court of Culpeper county, to which Jennie G. and Kate Somerville were made respondents. The object of the writ was to determine who was entitled to the custody of Glassell Somerville

Stringfellow, an infant of tender years, son of the petitioner, and nephew to the respondents. Ellen S. Stringfellow, who, before her marriage, was Ellen Somerville, died a few days after giving birth to the child who is the subject of this controversy. A short time before her death the petitioner, at her instance, prepared her last will and testament; so much of which as need be here considered being in the following language:

Know all men by these presents, that I, Ellen S. Stringfellow, of the county of Culpeper and state of Virginia, being of sound mind and memory, do make and declare and publish this my last will and testament.

First, I desire that my child be permitted to remain with and be reared by my sisters, Jennie G. and Kate Somerville, and trained as their own, and my husband will aid them in sympathetic affection and support.

Second, I desire that my husband be made guardian for my child, and to manage my business and property as he now does, carrying out all unfinished contracts and agreements made by me; that he shall continue the tin and stove business as long as he sees best for the interest of my child. He shall have the profits from my property to support my child; all above that to be used as he sees proper during his life; and then my entire property to be given to my son, Glassell Somerville Stringfellow.

The purpose disclosed in this will seems to have been long contemplated by the mother, and fully understood and approved by her husband and her sisters. Upon her death this will was admitted to probate, and in accordance with its provisions the infant child was delivered to the care and custody of Jennie G. and Kate Somerville, and was by them taken to their home, where it has since been reared and nurtured with the most loving and tender care. The language of the will leaves no room for doubt or construction as to the wish of the testatrix: "I desire that my child be permitted to remain with and be reared by my sisters Jennie G. and Kate Somerville, and trained as their own." What language could be more explicit? "To remain with;" to continue in an unchanged condition; to abide; to stay. The language employed is not appropriate to a temporary arrangement. No period is fixed to its duration short of the accomplishment of the purpose with which the arrangement was made. "My child," said the dying mother, is to be "reared by my sisters;" that is to say, is to be "educated," "instructed," "brought up to maturity," by them. The measure of authority which she intended to confer is conveyed in language equally apt and comprehensive. What broader terms could the mother have employed than those here used, by which she consigns her offspring, from whom she is to be taken by an untimely death, to the loving care of her sisters, to be "trained as their own?" As far as it was in her power to do so, her sisters were clothed with plenary power and duty with respect to this child, while the husband was reminded that it would be for him to "aid them in sympathetic affection and support." If her will is to prevail with respect to her child, the sisters are the principals to whom its execution is confided, and the father becomes their aid and auxiliary.

In the second clause of the will, it is true, she declares her desire that her husband "be made guardian for my child, and to manage my business and property as he now does, carrying out unfinished contracts and agreements made by me." Reading the first and second clauses of the will together, placing ourselves as near as may be in the situation of the testatrix, looking to her previously declared intention and to her full knowledge of the whole environment, we cannot doubt that the second clause has reference to the duties of a guardian with respect to the business, the property, the contracts, and agreements, in which she had been interested, and was not intended as a limitation or restriction upon the disposition which she had made in the first clause with respect to the person of her child.

Ordinarily the father is entitled to the care and custody of his infant child. Merritt v. Swimley, 82 Va. 438; Coffee v. Black, 82 Va. 587. But where the father is before the court, claiming to recover the custody of his child, the court will exercise its discretion according to the facts, and continue what will be best calculated to promote the infant's welfare. Coffee v. Black, 82 Va. 587.

In Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 699, the above principles are thus stated: "The father is the natural guardian of his infant children, and in the absence of good and sufficient cause . . . is entitled to their custody. . . . The court is in no case bound to deliver the child into the custody of any claimant, . . . but may leave it in such custody as the welfare of the child at the time appears to require."

We are not dealing with absolute rights of property. Says Judge Brewer in Chapsky v. Wood, 26 Kan. 650: "A parent's right to the custody of a child is not like the right of property, an absolute and uncontrollable right. If it were, it would end this case, and relieve us from all future difficulties." And further on he says: "The paramount consideration is, What will promote the welfare of the child?"

The question is not which of the two claimants can surround the infant with greater luxury, or which of the two will be able to give or bequeath him the greater amount of money or property, but with which of them he is likely to be reared and trained so as to make him the better man and the better citizen.

We do not care to enter upon a detailed discussion of the evidence. It is sufficient to say, as is said by the learned judge of the circuit court, that reputable witnesses do question the morality of the petitioner; and we heartily concur in the conclusion reached by the circuit court "that there can be no question that this little boy, in the home of his aunts, has been kindly cared for and properly nurtured and instructed; that all the surroundings of their home and his daily associations are all that could be desired to promote his happiness and physical development;" and we earnestly unite in the regret expressed by the circuit court that the "relations which have heretofore existed between these litigants up to a short time since had not continued to the present time, and thus avoided this unhappy controversy." The fitness of the aunts is nowhere questioned, and is beyond the reach of all challenge or debate.

Where a parent has transferred to another the custody of his infant child by fair agreement, which has been acted upon by such other person to the manifest interest and welfare of the child, the parent will not be permitted to reclaim the custody of the child, unless he can show that a change of the custody will materially promote his child's welfare. Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 699.

As far as the child is concerned, its present situation leaves nothing to be desired, and we are free to consider the rights of the father, unembarrassed by any apprehension with respect to its welfare.

We do not consider that the mother could by will dispose of or defeat the natural right which the father enjoys to the custody of the child, and the duty which nature imposes upon him to rear and support it; but, as we have seen in the beginning of this opinion, the mother had a clear and settled purpose to intrust her child to her sisters, to the exclusion of the father, so far as it was in her power to do so. Of this purpose the father was fully advised. He wrote the will which declares this intention in words too plain for misapprehension. He assented to its execution, and immediately upon the death of the mother surrendered the custody of this infant to the respondents, and in their care it has remained and "been trained as their own" from that day to the present time. Courts pay great respect to the contemporaneous construction of instruments and contracts given by the parties to, or those interested in, them; and the contemporaneous construction in this case, given at the earliest moment, and acted upon without question or protest for five years, is in accordance with the manifest intention of the mother.

It was claimed in the record and in the argument that the construction placed upon their authority over the child by the respondents subordinated them to the rights of the father, and there is some evidence to the effect that they considered that the law clothed a father with paramount authority with respect to his child, of which he could not divest himself by any contract or act of his own. There never was any doubt on their part as to what their sister intended, or as to what they or the petitioner originally intended; but, moved by the opinion expressed to them by their kinsman and friend, Atwell Somerville, they admitted the father's right, because they believed that, whatever he may have done or said, his authority was fixed by the law, and could not be surrendered or defeated. There are authorities to that effect, and it is true that no contract that the father can make will relieve him of his duty with respect to his child where the interest of the child requires the exercise of parental duties upon his part. Without doubt the petitioner could have asserted his right as father to the custody of his infant upon the death of his wife, and had he done so his demand could not have been successfully resisted; but the whole situation changes when, by his voluntary act, he permits the custody of the child to pass to the respondents, and while the will of the mother does not constitute a contract, it may with propriety be looked to by the court to ascertain the meaning, intent, and purpose actuating the petitioner and respondents when his child was placed with its aunts, and was allowed to remain with and be reared and trained by them for a period of nearly six years.

In Pool v. Gott, 14 Law Rep. 269 (Chief Justice Shaw delivering the opinion), it is said: The facts "furnished reason for supposing that the father surrendered his rights over the child by a tacit understanding, if not by an express agreement. . . . By his own acquiescence he has allowed the affections on both sides to become engaged in a manner he could not but have anticipated, and permitted a state of things to arise which cannot be altered without risking the happiness and interest of his child. He has allowed the parties to go on for years in the belief that his rights were waived."

In Green v. Campbell, 85 W. Va. 704, it is said: "The feelings and rights of one whom the father has put in the place of parent, and between whom and the child such relation has created mutual affection, are not to be subject to the whim and caprice of the father; but, unless it appears that the best interests of the child imperiously demand it, the court, in dealing with relations so delicate, so easily set ajar irreparably, will follow the discreet course of letting well enough alone."

Borrowing the language of Justice Brewer in Chapeky v. Wood, 26 Kan. 650, and applying it to this case, this record shows that this "child has had and has today, all that a mother's love and care can give. The affection which a mother may have and does have . . . is an affection which, perhaps, no other one can really possess; but so far as it is possible, springing from years of patient care of a little helpless babe, from association, and as an outgrowth from those little cares and motherly attentions bestowed upon it, an affection for the child is seen in . . . respondents that can be found nowhere else."

We do not doubt that the father and mother of the petitioner deserve all that was said in their praise in the record and during the argument, but the weight of years is pressing heavily upon them both, and in the course of nature any arrangement which devolves duties upon them must be of a temporary nature. To take this child from its present custody in reliance upon any aid which its paternal grandparents might render in its training would be doubtful and hazardous in the extreme, in view of their great age. It is wise to let well enough alone.

We are of opinion that the circuit court committed no error in rejecting the prayer of the petitioner. We are further of opinion that so much of its order as undertakes to regulate the intercourse between the father and the child would be subversive of that discipline which those clothed with the duty of rearing a child must exercise in order that they may well and faithfully discharge their trust.

We are further of opinion that there is nothing in the record to suggest any ground for apprehension that the respondents will fail to instill into the breast of this infant proper love and respect towards his father. Nor is there any reason to apprehend, as is shown by this record, that they will impede, hinder, or obstruct him in his influence over and association with his child. It is true that the kindly feeling which at one time united the petitioner and the respondents as one family seems to have been in some measure interrupted; but that interruption was due to causes which need not here be discussed, but which were wholly unconnected with the relations existing between the father, his child, and the respondents.

An order will therefore be entered modifying the judgment appealed from, and, in lieu of the specific provisions of the order regulating the intercourse between the father and the child, the judgment of the circuit court will be affirmed, with instructions that the case be dropped from the docket, with leave to any party at any time to reinstate it, and ask for any relief which a change of circumstances may render necessary or proper, either with respect to the care and custody of the child or the intercourse between the child and the petitioner.

1. Neglect of one adjoining owner to trim a hedge fence standing on part of the division line is not within Code 1873, §1490, providing that if any party neglect to "repair or rebuild" a partition fence the aggrieved party may appeal to the fence viewers, and if they determine the fence is "insufficient" they shall signify it in writing to the delinquent owner, and direct him to repair or rebuild.

2. One who plants a hedge fence on his part of the dividing line between him and the adjoining owner is not required to trim the same to prevent its growing out over the land of such adjoining owner, under the Iowa statute authorizing the growth of a hedge on the division line without specifying its height or how it shall be trimmed.

(April 6, 1898.)

NOTE.—As to trees on boundary lines in general, see note to Hickey v. Michigan C. R. Co. (Mich.) 21 L. R. A. 729; also Robinson v. Clapp (Conn.) 29 L. R. A. 582.
40 L. R. A.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Lucas County in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel defendant to trim a hedge which he maintained as a fence between his property and that of plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stuart & Bartholomew for appellant.

Messrs. W. B. Barger and J. A. Penick for appellee:

The statute makes the fence viewers a special tribunal for the adjudication of the rights and settlement of controversies of adjoining owners respecting the erection and maintaining of partition fences, and no action will lie in the courts for that purpose.

Lease v. Vance, 28 Iowa, 509.

Where parties have agreed to maintain a certain kind of fence, the trustees may determine whether such agreement has been performed, and decide as to time and manner of performance.

Huber v. Wilkinson, 48 Iowa, 458.

A fence is a lawful fence, whatever may be its height, if it is of equal strength and security with the standard under § 2340 of the Revision.

Musch v. Burkhardt, 83 Iowa, 801, 12 L. R. A. 484.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the petition we gather the following facts material to the determination of the questions presented: The parties are owners of adjoining tracts of land; plaintiff owning the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, and the defendant the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 36 in the same township and range. The lands are inclosed, and the parties maintain a partition fence between their tracts. This fence was built about fifteen years ago by agreement between the parties. It was the duty of plaintiff to maintain the east half of the fence, and of defendant to build and repair the west half. In recognition of this duty, defendant planted and cultivated an osage orange and willow hedge fence upon his part of the division line. It is claimed that, while this hedge fence is sufficient as a lawful fence, yet defendant has failed to trim and cut down said fence to a proper height, and has permitted the limbs to grow out over plaintiff's land to the distance of from 10 to 20 feet, thus depriving him of the use of that much of his land. Plaintiff also charges that defendant has allowed the fence to grow to the height of from 30 to 40 feet, creating a dense shade upon plaintiff's land for a distance of from 30 to 40 feet, effectually hindering and preventing the growth of products thereon. These acts are said to have been done willfully and maliciously, and to plaintiff's great damage. The demurrer raises the question as to the obligation of the defendant to trim the hedge. Appellee insists in argument that the fence viewers have exclusive jurisdiction of the matter at issue. This point was not made by the demurrer, and does not seem to have been presented to the trial court; but, as it goes to the jurisdiction of the trial court, we are required to consider it. Section 1490 of the Code of 1878 is as follows: "If any party neglect to repair or rebuild a partition fence or a portion thereof, which he ought to maintain, the aggrieved party may complain to the fence viewers, who, after due notice to each party, shall examine the same, and if they determine the fence is insufficient, shall signify it in writing to the delinquent occupant of the land, and direct him to repair or rebuild the same within such time as they judge reasonable." Section 1492 provides for the settlement of a controversy between the respective owners about the obligation to erect or maintain partition fences, by the fence viewers. The argument is that this case involves the maintenance or repair of a partition fence, and that the fence viewers have exclusive jurisdiction of the controversy. The fault with the argument lies in the assumption that the issue is over the neglect of one of the parties to repair or maintain his part of the fence. Such is not the point in dispute. There is no question that the fence is sufficient for the purpose intended. The complaint is that the fence, as constructed, is an invasion of plaintiff's property rights. The fence viewers have no jurisdiction of such a controversy.

2. The Code of 1878 provides, in substance, that the respective owners of land inclosed with fences shall keep up and maintain partition fences between their own and the next adjoining inclosure. It also provides that a person building a fence may lay the same upon the line between him and the adjacent owners, and that he shall have the same right to remove it as if it were upon his own land. It further provides that a certain fence, built of rails or boards and posts, or its equivalent, shall be a lawful fence. This same Code also recognizes a hedge fence as lawful, and provides for its cultivation, by allowing the owner to enter upon his neighbor's land for this purpose. There is no statute, prior to the enactment of the present Code, regulating the height of such a fence, nor any provision requiring the owner or other person to trim the same. Appellant contends that the owner of the hedge has no right to use more of his neighbor's land than is essential for the purpose of making a lawful fence, or its equivalent, and that when he does this he is liable to respond in damages. The right to plant the hedge upon the line is unquestioned, and defendant is not in fault, unless it be in failing to trim and cut down the hedge to such a height that it will answer the purpose of a lawful fence. As the statute authorizes the growth of such a fence upon the division line, and as there is no express requirement upon the owner to trim it, such duty arises, if at all, in virtue of some implied obligation. The rights and duties of adjacent owners of land with respect to partition fences are purely statutory, and as the statute expressly provides for and recognizes hedge fences, and does not undertake to specify their height, or as to how they shall be trimmed, it follows, we think, that neither party can hold the other responsible for damages incident to the natural growth of the hedge. See Musch v. Burkhardt, 83 Iowa, 801, 12 L. R. A. 484. It is a clear case of damnum absque injuria. The new Code (section 2355) remedies this mischief by requiring the owner to trim division fences.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

(.....Md.....)

1. The negligent failure of a sheriff to protect a prisoner from a mob will not make him liable to a civil action on account of the injuries done to the prisoner by the mob.
2. The failure of a sheriff to resist a mob that takes a prisoner from a jail, if caused bona fide by the fact that he was physically unable to cope with the force confronting him, does not make him liable for the consequences in a civil action.
3. The malicious act of a sheriff in aiding a mob to take a prisoner from a jail and kill him does not create any liability of the sureties on his official bond.

(April 1, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Charles County in favor of defendants in an action brought to hold defendants liable upon a sheriff's bond for the alleged negligence of the sheriff in permitting the lynching of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Greason, Randolph Barton, Jr., and Herbert B. Stimpson, for appellants:

It is the duty of the sheriff as an officer of the state appointed for that particular purpose to see that the duty of protecting the prisoner in his person and his life is performed; and if through any negligence on his part the prisoner should suffer any injury or lose his life, then the sheriff becomes liable in damages to the prisoner or whosoever may suffer thereby.

If a sheriff is held liable for his negligence in regard to mere goods placed in his custody (Cooley, Torts, p. 394 (462)), he owes an equal duty toward the life of a human being that is placed in his control and custody.

Where an individual or a municipality acts as a conservator of the peace, he or it represents the sovereign power of the state for that purpose, and is entitled to all the immunities of such sovereign; and the right to hold the state, or its duly delegated agents, responsible for a failure to conserve the peace, rests only upon express statute, and does not exist otherwise.

The facts of the declaration show that the negligent breach of this duty, as it is imposed by the statute, was the direct and immediate cause of the injury complained of, and that the death of the prisoner would not have occurred but for the violation of that duty.

Messrs. Allison Wilmer and Adrian Posey, for appellees:

The declaration is faulty in that it contains "no cause of action entitling the plaintiff to recover against the sheriff and his sureties within the condition of the official bond, according to the laws of the state of Maryland."

South v. Maryland, Pottle, 18 How. 399, 15 L. ed. 433.

There is no case to be found in England or in this country where a sheriff and his bondsmen have been held responsible for the safe keeping of a prisoner committed to his charge by due process of law, except to the person who committed such prisoner to the sheriff.

In the old ca. sa. cases the sheriff was held liable for escapes, and so when slaves were committed to the custody of the sheriff and, through negligence, they escaped. In such cases the persons committing had a property interest in the prisoners, and the sheriff and his bondsmen were held liable if through negligence they escaped.

State, Creecy, v. Lawson, 2 Gill, 62; State v. Walsh, 2 Gill & J. 406.

Where the prisoner is committed by the state the liability is to the state, and the officer is liable to punishment by indictment (South v. Maryland, Pottle, 18 How. 402, 15 L. ed. 439); if under civil process he is responsible to the person who caused the commitment, and no one else.

The person to whom the sheriff is liable is the one to whom he owes a duty. The sheriff is not liable in a civil suit for a failure to keep the public peace, whereby a person is injured.

Mr. Sydney E. Mudd also for appellees.

Page, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit on the bond of George A. Wade, sheriff of Charles county, to recover damages for his alleged neglect in the performance of his duty, whereby the father of the equitable plaintiffs lost his life.

After setting out the bond, it is alleged in the narr. that Joseph Cocking, on the 21st of May, 1896, was indicted by the grand jury of Charles county for the crime of murdering his wife, Fannie Cocking, and her sister (though he was "innocent of the same"); that thereupon he was delivered to the custody of said sheriff, to safely keep until discharged in due course of law; that owing to intense excitement throughout Charles county, and to the great danger to the said prisoner from mob violence, the said Cocking had been "removed" to the jail in Baltimore city, but on the same day on which the indictment was found, the said sheriff again "removed" him to "an old dilapidated building, used as the jail of Charles county, at Port Tobacco" (which said building was afterwards superseded as jail of the said county by a strong new building in the town of La Plata, the said new jail being delivered, ready for use, to the said sheriff on or about the 15th day of June, 1896); that on the 22d May a change of venue was granted to St. Mary's county, and this caused increased excitement to prevail throughout Charles county; that the said sheriff had full knowledge thereof, yet he refused to remove the prisoner to the jail in Baltimore city, though he was requested repeatedly so to do by the said prisoner and his counsel, or to the new jail at La Plata; that not only did the said sheriff so refuse, but also in spite of warnings by the prisoner and his counsel, the guards to the said building at Port Tobacco were removed "and the keys of the said building were placed in the custody and keeping of 'an aged and infirm negro' who did not reside in the premises," and "the said building and the said prisoner were left wholly unprotected and at the mercy of evilly disposed persons;" that on the 26th day of June, in the night time, the jail was attacked by an unknown "body of men" and the said negro, upon the request of said men, "opened the doors of said building and delivered the said Cocking to the said unknown body of men," who took him from thence and in the most atrocious, brutal, and unlawful manner conveyed him to a point near by, and there, in the "presence of the said sheriff, who had been warned by 'the negro,' and who did not offer the slightest resistance to the said unknown body of men in their unlawful purpose, hanged the said prisoner by the neck until he was dead;" so that the plaintiffs say "that by reason of said gross negligence of the said sheriff Wade in the custody of said prisoner, and his failure in his duty to safely and properly keep said prisoner as aforesaid, the violent and premature death of said prisoner was occasioned as aforesaid, and that the equitable plaintiffs, children of said prisoner, as aforesaid, have thereby been deprived of the support and maintenance of their father, the said prisoner."

The appellee demurred, the court sustained the demurrer, and the appellant appealed; so that the sufficiency or not, of this narr., is the only question before us.

It may be proper to observe that, in a case like this, whatever right of action belongs to the children of the deceased Cocking must be such only as they may have under the provisions of article 67 of the Code; and to entitle them to sue under that article, the death must be caused "by wrongful act, neglect, or default," such as would have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages if death had not ensued. It follows from this that the matter first to be determined is whether Cocking himself (had not his death ensued) would have had a right of action, under all the circumstances, to recover damages for the injuries he received at the hands of the mob.

There is no averment in the narr. that the sheriff has acted with malice or with evil purpose towards the prisoner, or that he has personally assaulted or otherwise maltreated him; but it is contended with force and ability that he should be held civilly liable for the act of the lawless mob, whereby the prisoner lost his life, because, with knowledge of the existence of public excitement about the matter, he failed to remove the prisoner from the jail at Port Tobacco to the jail in Baltimore, or the new building at La Plata, and, having allowed him so to remain at Port Tobacco, he removed the guards who had been stationed there to protect the prisoner, and committed the keys to an "old and infirm negro."

From a very early day the English law has contained provisions defining and regulating the rights and obligations of sheriffs in respect to the custody of persons charged with the commission of crime. As far back as the statute of 14 Edward III., chap. 10, the right to the custody of the gaols was "rejoined" to the sheriffs of the bailiwicks; and by 5 Henry IV. it was ordained that none be imprisoned by any justice of the peace, "but in the common gaol." In our own state, by statute passed in 1809, and now codified as § 16 of article 42, no citizen committed to the custody of an officer for a criminal matter shall be removed from thence into the custody of another officer, unless by habeas corpus or other legal writ, except when the prisoner is delivered to a constable or other inferior officer to be carried to some jail, or shall be removed from one place to another . . . in order to his discharge or trial; or in case of sudden fire or infection, or other necessity, or, etc." Mr. Alexander, in his valuable work on the British Statutes, remarks of this section, that it is "intended to prevent the vexation and danger of protracted imprisonment which might be occasioned by the removal of the prisoner from one custody to another. And it affirms, therefore, the principle that the prisoner ought to be committed to the proper prison in the first instance." This observation is supported by a fair interpretation of §§ 43, 44, and 45 of article 87 of the Code.

The first of these sections provides that the sheriff shall "safely keep all persons committed to his custody by lawful authority until such persons are discharged by due course of law;" and the place where he shall "so keep them" is clearly indicated by the 45th section. That section provides that all persons committed under the authority of the United States, the sheriff shall receive and safely keep in jail, "in the same manner and under like penalties as if such persons were committed under the authority of this state." Now the jail at Port Tobacco was the "common gaol" of the county, though provisions had been made for another at La Plata, but this one was not in use, though it was finished about the 15th day of June. The jail building at Port Tobacco was the place designated by the law for the detention of prisoners, and was the proper place for the detention of Cocking. As a public jail it was under the supervision of the public authorities. By § 22 of article 51 of the Code it was the duty of the grand jury to visit it, and inquire into its condition, the manner it was kept, and the treatment of the prisoners. If it were that in any of these respects the sheriff had failed in his duty, he was liable to be proceeded against criminally. His duty to keep safe the prisoner was not for the benefit of the prisoner; it was that he might be detained until discharged in due course of law; but the sheriff cannot, under pretense of performing this duty, avail himself of the opportunities his position affords him, to indulge an evil spirit or wreak his malice on those over whom he has control. He must keep his prisoners safe, so that they may be thence discharged in due course of law; he must guard against the prisoners' own devices; he must be prepared, as far as he reasonably can, to prevent evilly disposed persons on the outside from releasing them by force or in any wise against law; and if his jail be attacked he must interpose such resistance as he may be able to employ to defend his building, so that he shall keep his prisoners. How he shall accomplish this may often be a matter of great difficulty, and one calling for the exercise of much judgment and a high degree of courage. He will be required to take careful account of all the circumstances that surround him, estimate in cases of outside attack the forces he must encounter, and compare them with his means of defense, and after due deliberation determine what course is best for him to pursue. If he does this honestly, with a full purpose to perform his whole duty, even though he make a mistake whereby a prisoner is injured, it would be monstrous to hold him civilly responsible for damages to such prisoner. "A public officer is not liable to an action if he falls into error in a case where the act to be done is not merely a ministerial one, but is one in relation to which it is his duty to exercise judgment and discretion, even although an individual may suffer by his mistake. A contrary principle would indeed be pregnant with the greatest mischief." Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How. 98, 11 L. ed. 512; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 156, and authorities cited.

So, also, he must detain his prisoner in the common jail, unless some necessity make it proper to remove him; but it is his province to determine when such necessity has arrived; and if, in the honest exercise of his discretion, he fails to remove him in time to avert a prospective danger, he cannot be held civilly responsible. We are not concerned now with a case in which malicious motives are imputed to the sheriff, as, for instance, like that of Asher v. Cobell, 2 U. S. App. 158, 50 Fed. Rep. 818, 1 C. C. A. 698, where a United States marshal, having taken a person into his custody and shackled him, "knowingly delivered him over to incompetent deputies and the known hostility of mobs." Such conduct amounted to participation; it imputed to the marshal the wicked purpose of permitting, if not aiding, the mob in its unlawful designs, and is wholly inconsistent with the idea of an honest performance of duty. Here no dishonest or wicked purpose on the part of the sheriff is alleged, nor do the facts as set out in the declaration raise such an implication. If it could be shown that he placed the keys in the negro's hands with the purpose of facilitating the mob in the accomplishment of its purpose to seize and destroy Cocking, or if the facts alleged implied this, the two cases would be parallel. But Cocking was in the common jail, where he ought to have been kept. If a necessity arose for his removal, the sheriff had power to so remove, but it was within his province to determine when such necessity had arrived, and he cannot be made to answer civilly if he made an honest mistake.

But the case made by the narr. goes much farther than the mere safe keeping of the prisoner. It raises the question how far a sheriff should be held liable for injuries resulting from his failure to preserve the peace from a mob. Stripped of verbiage, the substance of the narr. is that the sheriff is liable in damages for injuries to Cocking, resulting from his failure to preserve the public peace. It is not an escape, for which, if it be a criminal matter, he must answer to the public (1 Bl. Com. 346); or if it be a civil case, to the party injured, as in Sle-maker v. Marriott, 5 Gill & J. 406, but a case where a "body of men," unknown and ill-disposed, in defiance of law and order, forced themselves into the jail, conveyed the prisoner from thence, and hung him until he was dead. The narr. alleges the sheriff was warned by the negro, and was present at the final scene, and offered no resistance, but there is no charge that such passivity was with malicious intent. Such an allegation, we think, was necessary; for if with adequate means to resist the attack he forebore to employ them, but quietly permitted the mob to have its will, no other conclusion would be possible than that he was a participant.

As an officer having the jail in charge, and as a conservator of the peace wielding the executive power of the county for the preservation of the public peace, he cannot stand idly by and allow the evil work to proceed at a time when he has at his command the physical means to stay it. But if his failure to do so was caused bona fide by the fact that he was physically unable to cope with the force confronting him, no responsibility would fall on him. The law applicable to sheriffs as conservators of the peace is so well stated in South v. Maryland, 18 How. 396, 15 L. ed. 483, that we will quote at length from the opinion delivered in that case. "It is," said Grier, J., "an undisputed principle of the common law, that for a breach of a public duty an officer is punishable by indictment, but where he acts ministerially, and is bound to render certain services to individuals for a compensation in fees or salary, he is liable for acts of misfeasance or nonfeasance to the party who is injured by them. The powers and duties of conservator of the peace exercised by the sheriff are not strictly judicial; but he may be said to act as the chief magistrate of his county, wielding the executive power for the preservation of the public peace. It is a public duty, for neglect of which he is amenable to the public, and punishable by indictment only. The history of the law for centuries proves this to be the case. Actions against the sheriff for a breach of his ministerial duties in the execution of process are to be found in almost every book of 40 L. R. A.

reports. But no instance can be found where a civil action has been sustained against him for his default or misbehavior as conservator of the peace, by those who have suffered injury to their property or persons through the violence of mobs, riots, or insurrections. In the case of Entick v. Carrington, 19 How. St. Tr. 1062, Lord Camden remarks: 'No man ever heard of an action against a conservator of the peace as such.' The case of Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, has been quoted to show that a sheriff may be liable to a civil action where he has acted in a judicial, rather than a ministerial, capacity. This was an action brought by a citizen entitled to vote for member of Parliament, against the sheriff for refusing his vote at an election. Gould, Justice, thought the action would not lie, because the sheriff acted as a judge. Powls, because though not strictly a judge, he acted quasi judicially. But Holt, Ch. J., decided that the action would lie: (1) 'Because the plaintiff had a right or privilege; (2) that by the act of the officer he was hindered from the enjoyment of it; (3) by the finding of the jury the act was done maliciously.' The later cases all concur in the doctrine that where the officer is held liable to a civil action for acts not simply ministerial, the plaintiff must allege and prove each of these propositions. See Cullen v. Morris, 2 Stark. 577; Harman v. Tappenden, 1 East. 555, etc.

For these reasons we are of opinion the narr. does not set out a sufficient cause of action.

We will add that even if it had been charged in the narr. that the sheriff acted maliciously, the official bond of that officer could not be held liable in a case like this. The liability of the sureties is that of an express contract that the sheriff shall well and truly execute the office of sheriff and in all things thereto appertaining, and should well and truly perform all the duties required by the law to be by him performed. This provision, it seems now to be well settled, binds the officer affirmatively to the faithful execution of his office. There is no clause to cover an abuse or usurpation of power,—"no negative words that he will commit no wrong by color of his office, nor do anything not authorized by law." State, Vanderwerker, v. Brown, 54 Md. 325, 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 556, 557.

For these reasons it follows from what we have said the judgment must be affirmed.

Bryan, J., concurring:

I did not hear the argument in this case; but, having been present at the consultation, I approve in all respects the able opinion which has been delivered. I wish to add a few words in addition to what has been so well said, not, however, as implying that the opinion needs any support.

The deceased came to his death by lynching; and his children have, as equitable plaintiffs, brought an action on the sheriff's official bond to recover damages for his death. At the threshold of the case, we naturally inquire, What is the legal foundation of their claim for damages, and under what circumstances can it be maintained? By the common law, no civil action could be maintained for the killing of a freeman. A change was made in this respect by the act of 1852, which is at present codified as article 67 of the Code. It was enacted that if anyone, by his wrongful act, neglect, or default, should cause the death of another person, he should be liable to an action for damages, and that this action might be brought in the name of the state, for the use of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the deceased. A cause of action before unknown was granted to these relatives. It depends entirely on the statute, and it must be prosecuted in the manner therein prescribed, and in no other way. It is an action of tort against the individual who did the wrong, and it cannot, by any sort of legal transmutation, be converted into an action ex contractu. It is for a death caused by tortious means; and it has no reference whatever to a contract, or a bond, or to any responsibilities arising from them. They do not contain any of the elements of the suit authorized by the statute; and it would be incompetent to set up any such cause of action under its terms. Suppose that the sheriff had executed and delivered to the deceased a bond with sureties, conditioned that he would not kill him, and he had afterwards slain him with his own hand; who could have maintained a suit on such a bond? Most certainly, it is not comprehended within the terms of the statute; and the common law would not give damages in any form of action for the killing. I do not think, therefore, that, under any circumstances, an action on the sheriff's official bond could be maintained for the death of the deceased.

BAGBY & RIVERS COMPANY OF BALTIMORE, App't.,

v.
Arthur D. RIVERS et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. The right of one person to use the name of another, given him by contract, cannot be assigned or transferred to a third party, in the absence of an express stipulation to that effect.
2. An agreement by a retiring partner that he will not engage in similar business so long as the other partner shall continue therein terminates when the latter forms a corporation and assigns to it all the rights and business of the old firm.
3. An injunction against the use of a name may be granted in favor of one who has the exclusive right thereto, although no damage is alleged.
4. An assignment to a corporation of the right to use the name of a retiring partner cannot be made by the partner continuing the business under a contract by which he is entitled to continue the use of the name of the retiring partner "in the style of the firm."

(April 1, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enjoin defendant from using the name Rivers as part of its corporate name. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William A. Fisher, Pollard & Bagby, and Frank Gosnell, for appellant:

The grant is without reservation or restriction. By it Rivers conveyed to Bagby absolutely every interest he could possibly claim in the assets, goodwill, and business rights of the firm, including the name "Bagby & Rivers."

The fact that the transfer has been made to a corporation is immaterial.

The use of any particular name by a corporation will not be enjoined unless it be clearly proved that the complainant will suffer injury.

No tradename or trademark case is reported, in which an injunction was granted, unless the evidence clearly showed that confusion of names was likely to result and consequently irreparable injury be done the plaintiff. In these cases, as in others, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff.

Upon every principle of honesty and fair dealing, Rivers is estopped from claiming that the appellant has no right to the name "Bagby & Rivers."

Clark Thread Co. v. Armitage, 45 U. S. App. 62, 74 Fed. Rep. 936, 21 C. C. A. 178.

The cross bill was filed to enjoin Rivers from violating his covenant not to resume the furniture business in Baltimore city, as such a covenant is a constituent part or attendant of the goodwill, and the appellant, having bought Bagby's business and the goodwill, now has the right to enforce the covenant as his successor.

Nor can Rivers shield himself behind his corporation.

Rivers' corporation bearing his name, coupled with the fact that it carries on business at the former location of Bagby & Rivers, is misleading to the public.

Whether or not Bagby is in business can be shown by considering the question, Under what circumstances would Rivers be violating his covenant, if Bagby had made no change in the form of his business? If one is a promoter of a corporation, and a stockholder therein, he is violating a covenant not to engage in business.

Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 490; Emery v. Bradley, 88 Me. 357; Kramer v. Old, 119 N. C. 1, 34 L. R. A. 389.

Rivers covenants that he will not go into the furniture business "so long as said Bagby continues said business." He does not covenant that he will never thereafter go into the business, or "at any time thereafter," as in Guerand v. Dandeleit, 32 Md. 564, 8 Am. Rep. 164.

Bagby as long as he conducted the business was to use the firm name, and during that time Rivers was not to compete with him, but when Bagby ceased individually to conduct the business as his own, then his right to use the name of Rivers ceased, and Rivers was allowed to enter the field in his own name.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court;

This was a bill in equity filed on the 22d of April, 1897, in the circuit court of Baltimore city, by the plaintiff Arthur D. Rivers, for an injunction to enjoin the defendant, the Bagby & Rivers Company of Baltimore city (a corporation), from using the name Rivers as a part of its corporate title. Subsequently, on the 13th of August, 1897, a cross bill was filed by the defendant corporation against the plaintiff Rivers, and the Rivers Furniture Company, to restrain Rivers from conducting the furniture business in the city of Baltimore, either in his own name or in the name of the Rivers Furniture Company, and, further, to enjoin the Rivers Furniture Company from using the name Rivers as a part of its title in the conduct of the furniture manufacturing business. The facts of the case are substantially as follows: The plaintiff Rivers and Charles T. Bagby had been for many years engaged in the manufacture and sale of furniture in Baltimore city, under the firm name and style of Bagby & Rivers. On the 1st of January, 1894, the copartnership existing between the members of this firm was dissolved by mutual agreement. The articles of dissolution were evidenced by a written agreement and a memorandum of sale. By the express terms of the agreement it is provided that Bagby shall have and own in his own right, free and clear of any interest or claim of Rivers, all the stock, furniture, etc., in the factory and warehouse owned by the firm; and, in addition thereto, the goodwill of the firm, and all business rights thereto belonging. And it further provides that "the said Rivers hereby agrees and covenants that he will permit the said Bagby to continue the use of his name in the style of said firm; provided, however, it be so used, after such necessary legal notice to be given by the said Bagby, as not to make the said Rivers liable for or chargeable with any of the debts or contracts of said business as hereafter to be conducted by said Bagby." "And the said Rivers agrees and covenants that he will not engage in the manufacture of furniture in the city of Baltimore so long as the said Bagby shall continue said business. And in the memorandum of sale, which was executed by Rivers on the same day of the agreement of dissolution, it is further provided that, in addition to the assignment of the stock of goods, etc., the goodwill of the firm, and all business rights thereto belonging or any wise appertaining, shall be sold to Charles T. Bagby; it being the intention of said Rivers to sell to Bagby his entire interest in the business as now conducted by said firm." It further appears that Bagby continued to carry on the furniture business, under the firm name of Bagby & Rivers, until March 16, 1897, when he and others formed a corporation under the general laws of this state, called the "Bagby & Rivers Company of Baltimore." He then assigned and transferred the business of Bagby & Rivers to this new company, and continued to carry on the furniture business under the name and style of the Bagby & Rivers Company. On July 7, 1897, the plaintiff Arthur D. Rivers formed a corporation, called the "Rivers Furniture Company of Baltimore City," and has been since that date conducting the furniture business; and from a decree enjoining the defendant, Bagby & Rivers Company, from using the name Rivers, and dismissing the appellant's cross bill, this appeal has been taken.

There can be no question, it seems to us, that under a proper construction of the articles of dissolution between the parties and the memorandum of sale signed in execution of this agreement, the right to use the name Bagby & Rivers was conferred upon Bagby so long as he continued the business in the style of the old firm. This was clearly the intention of the parties, as will appear from the language of the agreement itself, which is: "And the said Rivers hereby agrees and covenants that he will permit the said Bagby to continue the use of his name in the style of said firm; provided, however, it be so used, after such necessary legal notice to be given by said Bagby, as not to make the said Rivers liable for or chargeable with any of the debts or contracts of said business as hereafter to be conducted by said Bagby." But the appellants contend they not only had a right to the use of the name of Bagby & Rivers so long as the old firm existed, but they had the right to legally assign the name Rivers to the corporation Bagby & Rivers Company.

This brings us to the main question in the case, and that is, as was stated by the court below, Has a continuing partner who has acquired the right to use the name of a retiring partner, either by a grant in express terms or by legal inference arising from the purchase of the goodwill of the old firm, the right to assign the use of the retiring partner's name to a corporation formed for the purpose of continuing the same business? We are of the opinion, after a careful examination, that the contention of the appellant in respect to the assignability of the rights under this contract cannot be sustained, either from the intention of the parties as manifested by the agreement itself, or by the law applicable to the case. In the case of Arkansas Valley Smelting Co. v. Belden Min. Co. 127 U. S. 387, 32 L. ed. 248, Mr. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, says: "Everyone has a right to select and determine with whom he will contract, and cannot have another person thrust upon him without his consent. In the familiar phrase of Lord Denman, 'You have the right to the benefit you anticipate from the character, credit, and substance of the party with whom you contract.'" And in that case the court adopts the rule laid down by Pollock, Contr. 425: "Rights arising out of contract cannot be transferred if they are coupled with liabilities, or if they involve a relation of personal confidence such that the party whose agreement conferred those rights must have intended them to be exercised only by him in whom he actually confided." In the case of Horton Mfg. Co. v. Horton Mfg. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 817, a case involving the same question as is here presented, the court said: "There is certainly no authority . . . for the proposition that a partnership whose name consists in whole or in part of the name of a person who is not a member of the firm can, without the consent of the owner, transfer the right to another company or corporation to make a like use of such name. A man might willingly forego the use of his name in favor of an ordinary partnership, which, whether limited or not to a definite term of existence, is liable, upon many contingencies, to come to an end; but from such a grant there could not reasonably be inferred an intention to authorize a transfer or assignment to other companies or corporations, whereby the owner might be perpetually deprived of the control of his own name." We will not stop to distinguish the many cases upon this question, because it would extend this opinion to an unusual length, but will simply state the conclusion reached by the courts on the subject. It is this: Where the contract is for the sale of or the right to use a fictitious name, or a trade-name, or a trademark, or a corporate name, though composed of individual names, or where the goodwill of a business includes the right to use names of that character, then such right is assignable by the purchaser and follows the business. But where the contract merely gives to one person the right to use the name of another, as in this case, such right is personal, and, in the absence of an express stipulation, cannot be assigned or transferred by the purchaser to a third party. In this case it was stipulated that Bagby should have the right to continue the business under the old name of Bagby & Rivers. It was not agreed that Bagby and his executors, administrators, or assigns, or a corporation, should use it; but, in the language of the contract, "he will permit the said Bagby to continue the use of his name in the style of the firm." If more had been desired it should have been agreed upon and expressed in the contract. This court cannot infer from the language used that Bagby was entitled to transfer to a corporation the right which Rivers had conferred upon him personally. On the contrary, we think the meaning of the contract between the parties is that, so long as Bagby continued to conduct the business in the firm name of Bagby & Rivers, he had the right to use the name Rivers, but when this stopped the right to use the name of Rivers also ceased.

We come, then, to the second proposition relied upon by the appellants, and that is the right of the appellees to an injunction. This is resisted upon the ground that no damage has been alleged and no injunction will lie unless injury has been shown. In the case of Plant Seed Co. v. Michel Plant & Seed Co. it is said that when a person or business corporation has assumed the name of some other firm or corporation in the same line of business, or has adopted a name which so closely resembles that of a business rival previously established that the business of the latter is liable to be diverted, and the public deceived on account of it, it has always been recognized as within the power or jurisdiction of a court of equity to restrain such person or new company from conducting business under the name assumed to the detriment of the older company. And in Du Boulay v. Du Boulay, L. R. 2 P. C. 441, this question is thus determined: "In this country we do not recognize the absolute right of a person to a particular name to the extent of entitling him to prevent the assumption of that name by a stranger. The right to the exclusive use of a name in connection with a trade or business is familiar to our law; and any person using that name after a relative right of this description has been acquired by another, is considered to have been guilty of a fraud, or, at least, of an invasion of another's right, and renders himself liable to an action, or he may be restrained from the use of the name by injunction." And to the like effect are the cases of McGowan Bros. Pump & Mach. Co. v. McGowan, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 320; Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 14 L. R. A. 161; Hohner v. Gratz, 52 Fed. Rep. 871; Landreth v. Landreth, 23 Fed. Rep. 41; Holmes, B. & H. v. Holmes, B. & A. Mfg. Co. 37 Conn. 295, 9 Am. Rep. 324; 2 Beach, Inj. § 780; Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 189 U. S. 544, 35 L. ed. 249. There was no error, then, in the decree enjoining the Bagby & Rivers Company from using the name Rivers as part of the corporate name of the corporation.

The remaining contention urged by the appellant arises under the cross bill, which was dismissed by the court below, and involves a construction of that part of the agreement which reads: "And the said Rivers agrees and covenants that he will not engage in the manufacture of furniture so long as said Bagby shall continue said business." It is clear, we think, according to the meaning of this part of the contract, that when Bagby formed a corporation, assigned to it all the rights of the old firm, and ceased to do business as Bagby & Rivers, he was not conducting and continuing the old business, and that Rivers was entitled to resume the furniture business himself. We fully agree with the learned court below when it says that, under the provisions of the contract, Rivers has a full right to engage in the business if Bagby quits it; and I do not see how it can well be contended that if Bagby abandons the business himself as an individual, and transfers all his rights to the defendant corporation, assuming to assign to it also the late firm name, that Bagby can still be considered as conducting a business which is absolutely that of the corporation to which he has transferred it. It is no longer Bagby who is doing the business, but the corporation, no matter if he does have an interest in the latter. For these reasons the decree will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

City of MADISON, Appt.,

v.

C. M. MAYERS et al., Repts.

(.....Wis.....)

1. A street indicated on an ancient plat may be held to have been dedicated to NOTE.—Right to erect wharves.

If the right of the riparian owner to have access to navigable water exists, so that the state cannot place a wharf in front of his property without his permission, as is the general rule (ante, 508) then it is to the interest of the public, as well as to his own, that he should have the right to make wharves so long as he does not interfere with the general right of navigation. And this seems to be the rule which has been generally followed. Some of the courts have gone so far as to hold that the right of access includes the right to connect with the point of navigability.

The rule in England.

In England there were several adverse rights to be considered in determining whether or not a riparian owner had a right to construct a wharf.

First, there was the navigator's right to land his goods, with which a toll wharf interfered. This was settled in favor of the riparian owner in Lord Hale's time, for he states that a man for his own private advantage may, in a port town, set up a wharf or crane. Hale, De Portibus Maris, chap. 6. His comment is that he is merely making use of what is his own.

Second, there was the King's jus privatum in the soil covered by water. This right could not be in-the public for its entire width, although as found it does not exactly correspond to the calls on the plat, if from ancient fences and buildings it appears that the street found was a practical construction of the plat.

2. One side line of a street as dedicated to the public will not be affected by a change in the other line by widening one part of the street and narrowing another part.

vaded by the subject, and any attempt to do so was a purpresture, the effect of which was that the structure might be destroyed or seized by the King.

An information in equity will lie to abate a wharf which has been erected over the King's land without right. Atty. Gen. v. Richards, 2 Anstr. 803.

If an erection in the river is a purpresture it will be abated, although it was made by leave of the high admiral and was no damage to shipping. Atty. Gen. v. Philipot, cited in 2 Anstr. 607.

A wharf erected below low-water mark belongs to the King. Johnson v. Barret, Aleyn, 10.

Third, there was the jus publicum, which was the right to have the water kept free from obstructions for the purpose of navigation. An interference with this right was a nuisance, and would be abated as such.

In Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 2 Wils. Ch. 87, where an injunction was sought to restrain the building of a pier in the Thames, the defendant claimed the right under license from the city of London, and the chancellor said whether the soil between high and low water mark is the King's or has been granted by the Crown to the city of London, or whether a mere right of conservancy has been granted to the city, it is quite clear that it cannot be used as a nuisance to the King's subjects.

3. Mere nonuser of a portion of the width of a street will not work an abandonment of the public rights therein.
4. A city may maintain an action to enjoin abutting owners from removing materials from the unused part at the side of a street, which will make the opening of the street to its entire width more difficult.
5. The indication of a block upon a plat between a highway and a lake must give way if when the highway is located no land is left between it and the lake shore.
